The criminal justice system has been, since the early 1970s, one of the major victims of El Salvador's civil strife. While it continues to prosecute some criminal cases, it has been ineffective in crimes associated with the civil strife. The failure of the judicial system is both an effect and a cause of continued human rights abuses and will be a focus of Salvadoran reform efforts and U.S. assistance over the next year. Intimidation of judges, witnesses, and officials by the right and the left continues much as it has during the past three years. As a result, due process in cases of alleged subversion remains primarily in the hands of the military under the authority of the state of siege Decree 507. There are positive signs, however. Procedures established in Decree 507 for the investigation and prosecution of those suspected of subversion are being respected, even if basic constitutional rights have been suspended; and the Constituent Assembly has appointed a new Supreme Court.

Indices of political violence, from whatever source, are uncertain, not only because of the divisive civil strife that exists in El Salvador, but because of the differing methodology used in compiling the data. (See Appendix A for an analysis of the methodologies of these organizations for compiling statistics.) According to the various available sources, however, there has continued to be a downward trend in the monthly total of deaths attributable to political violence during the past six months. While there was a surge in March which coincided with guerrilla attempts to disrupt the Constituent Assembly election, the general trend continues to be downward for this period as it indeed has been since October 1980 when the Embassy first began monitoring press reports of violence.

Although abuses continue, there has been a demonstrable attempt on the part of government authorities to control forces which perpetrate them. These actions include efforts to bring to justice persons who have been involved in human rights abuses, especially acts of murder. The Embassy has been able to confirm that since January 1, 47 members of the military forces and at least ten civil defense members have been arrested and confined for violent abuses of authority (murder, assault, rape). Of these, 20 were arrested for murder.

To cite some specific cases, National Police officials in March arrested twelve persons accused of murdering twenty-four civilians near the town of San Pedro Perulapan, Cuscatlan Department. Among those arrested were eight members of the local civil defense unit. Four members of the local civil defense force and one member of the Treasury Police are being held for trial in Conjutapeque. The remaining three suspects were released for lack of evidence. During May and June 1982, fourteen Christian Democratic Party (PDC) members and officials were murdered. These murders were condemned by a declaration of the Armed Forces, as well as by unanimous vote of the Salvadoran Constituent Assembly. Arrests were made in two of these cases. In the case of the murder of the acting mayor of San Francisco Chinameca and her daughter, the suspected murderers, a father and son who were members of the local civil defense unit, were arrested by the National Guard on May 29. Also arrested was the local civil defense commander who was suspected of having participated in the murder of the previous mayor. The local commander of another civil defense unit was arrested in the case of the murder of the mayor of El Paisnal. Again, the arrests were made by the Salvadoran National Guard. On January 28, the same date as the previous certification, National Police arrested a wealthy, well-connected former army officer, together with six associates, suspected of kidnapping. The principal detainee, after having been dismissed from the Armed Forces, had developed a private security service suspected of serving as a cover for criminal activities. These cases are pending before the civil courts.

These actions by Salvadoran authorities are significant in that formerly crimes of this nature rarely resulted in arrests (147 Christian Democratic officials and members were killed during the Junta period with no notable success in prosecuting perpetrators). In the recent cases public security forces are relying on the civil judicial system to prosecute. In so doing they are reinforcing the ability of the civilian courts to apply the law, where in the past offenders of this sort were rarely prosecuted.

The attitude of the new President of El Salvador, Alvaro Magana, toward human rights was highlighted in his June 4th address. President Magana stated that his government's goals are pacification, democratization, confidence and security, economic recuperation, reforms, and respect for human rights. He pointed out the necessity of a policy based ". . . on the integrity and dignity of man, that includes equality of opportunity, the right to work, the extinction of fear and violence. . . ." As part of President Magana's call for pacification and respect for human rights, the Government of El Salvador is actively considering an amnesty program that will seek to reincorporate dissident elements into the political process, while guaranteeing their safety and security.

Other groups notably including the Catholic Church, have made significant contributions to improving the human rights situation in El Salvador. In April Apostolic Administrator Rivera y Damas took a significant step to reorient and strengthen the Catholic Church's role in the protection of human rights. Invoking Pope Paul VI's universal Commission for Justice and Peace, Rivera y Damas re-established the Salvadoran Commission for Justice and Peace, which had disbanded in 1977. This organization is currently charged with representation of the legal rights of the detained and disappeared, primarily through the filing of petitions for writs of habeas corpus on behalf of family members. With the full backing of the Church, it appears that the organization has had some success in locating and obtaining the release of persons detained by the security forces. The existence of the organization establishes a basis for Church participation in broader human rights activities, such as a government amnesty program now in its planning stages. The Apostolic Administrator has himself continued to speak out for the Church to condemn human rights violations and violence from both sides, consistently putting forth a plea for peaceful solutions to El Salvador's conflict. The contribution of the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) in stressing humanitarian rules of conduct to military and security forces is noted below.

In summary, although serious human rights problems continue to plague El Salvador and although progress in this area has not been as great as hoped, it is our conclusion that the strong private and public statements made on behalf of human rights by the leadership of the Government of El Salvador, the evidence of a continued reduction in overall levels of violence, and the arrests made in a large number of cases demonstrate that the Government of El Salvador is making a concerted and significant effort to comply with internationally recognized human rights.

CONTROL OF THE ARMED FORCES

There continue to be reports of human rights abuses on the part of various branches of the Salvadoran security forces. Although there has been no evidence to support periodic guerrilla allegations of large-scale massacres allegedly committed by government forces, reports of torture and execution of prisoners and the participation of individual members of the security forces in right-wing terrorist activity continue, and in some cases are credible. This is particularly true at lower levels of the military hierarchy and the civil defense. These civil defense units, which are usually recruited from and paid by local villagers rather than by the central government, provide security in the more remote rural cantons. However, they have also been a principal source of institutional violence. The Government's efforts to deal with this are hampered by the poor state of communication with far-flung units, dispersed authority among the various branches of the Armed Forces, and the independence of action of local civil defense units in remote areas of the country. The military has taken serious steps to bring the civil defense forces under tighter control and to punish abuses of power. A May 31 Armed Forces announcement soliciting public denunciations of "delinquent crime," specifically in reponse to the murder of PDC members, has touched off a series of disciplinary actions against civil defense personnel throughout the country. In at least 12 cases local commanders accused of abuses have been replaced and civil defense members removed from service or jailed.

Human rights problems concerning the military have been exacerbated by guerrilla tactics which have resulted in the deaths of non-combatants. The guerrillas routinely travel with civilians who provide logistical support for their units. When the guerrillas are attacked by government forces, the ensuing hostilities often produce civilian casualties.

In an effort to cope with the problem of official abuses, the Minister of Defense, General Garcia, issued instructions in March to all military personnel stating that violators of the military code of conduct will be disciplined. The code of conduct obligates members of the armed forces to respect the human rights of others and to exhaust all pacific means before using force (copy and related documents attached at Appendix B). Officers have been instructed that they are responsible for the acts of the men under them, and for ensuring discipline. The National Police have recently redrafted an exhaustive guide to counterinsurgency procedures, which includes sections on the defensive use of arms, rules of engagement, and respect for human rights. This guide has been incorporated into all basic police instructions, and regular indoctrination classes are held for all agents. The ICRC gives instruction to the security forces on respect for human rights in armed conflict as defined in the Geneva Convention.

Since the Junta overthrew General Romero in October 1979, over 1,000 military and paramilitary personnel have been disciplined or dismissed for abuses of authority and turned over to civilian courts for prosecution. Military records show that of 109 members of the armed forces disciplined for abuses of authority during the certification period, 71 are pending investigation or have been dismissed and remanded to the civilian courts for trial for serious crimes. Of the remainder, 20 have been subject to military discipline for abuses. Of the 109, five were from the National Guard, three from the National Police, two from the Treasury Police, one from the Navy, and the remainder from the Army. Although adequate information is not available on the total number of civil defense members disciplined for abuses of authority, at least 20 have been dismissed or remanded to the civilian courts.

A congressional delegation, during a visit to El Salvador in March, visited National Police headquarters without prior notice. The police commander unlocked cells at the request of the delegation. Prisoners in a cell selected at random were interviewed: one was found to be a petty thief and the others to be national policemen serving sentences for breach of discipline.

During the March 28 elections, the High Command of the Armed Forces issued orders to maintain strict neutrality, and ordered all active duty personnel not to vote in the election so as to avoid any possibility of partiality. Only in Usulutan and a number of small municipalities were polling stations closed as a result of guerrilla action. None of the more than 200 international observers or hundreds of members of the foreign press corps present reported that the military either intimidated voters or forced citizens to vote. They did report that the Armed Forces provided the minimum, essential protection around the polling places.

Continued training of Salvadoran troops and officers is essential for building upon the progress already achieved in increasing the level of discipline and professionalism among the Salvadoran Armed Forces. The 450 officer candidates and 1000 enlisted personnel who recently completed their training at Ft. Benning, Georgia, and Ft. Bragg, North Carolina, received 39 course hours of instruction in such topics as treatment of captured combatants and the protection of non-combatants in countering guerrilla warfare. Beyond this specific training, these themes were melded throughout the course in formal and informal instruction as well as field operations. These troops returned to El Salvador in mid-May, and there is not yet enough evidence to evaluate their human rights performance.

Given the orders issued by the command concerning human rights abuses and the codes of conduct promulgated to achieve this objective, and in light of the substantial efforts to improve the disciplinary structure of the Armed Forces, including the punishment, dismissal and prosecution of violators, we conclude that the Government of El Salvador is achieving substantial control over all elements of its own armed forces, so as to bring an end to the indiscriminate torture and murder of Salvadoran citizens by these forces.

ECONOMIC AND POLITICAL REFORMS

While the major land distribution accomplished under Phase I proceeded smoothly during this certification period, the Phase III land reform program has been through a tumultuous process. The momentum and progress noted prior to the March 28 elections, with 4,482 provisional titles being issued in March alone, slowed considerably after the election and formation of the new government. During the post-election period, elements opposed to the reforms in the Constituent Assembly took advantage of an effort to correct some of the program's genuine shortcomings to pass ambiguous legislation which cast doubt on the future of the program and contributed to a surge in illegal evictions. Simultaneously, the Minister of Agriculture temporarily and without presidential authorization suspended further taking of Phase III title applications. During this period, the organization charged with implementing the reform was at a standstill, awaiting instructions from the new government.

The Government, with the full cooperation of the military, immediately took steps to correct the situation. The ambiguous legislation was clarified. The application process was resumed, promotion campaigns began again, the first definitive titles were issued, and, for the first time, some compensation claims on Phase III lands have been settled. In addition, the new president of FINATA, the Salvadoran implementing agency for Phase III, announced plans and targets to increase substantially the volume of applications for land titles over the balance of 1982. In El Salvador's fourteen departments, the President, along with the military High Command, is making personal presentations of provisional titles and speeches stressing the Government of National Unity's unqualified support for the program. Military leaders have taken a particularly active role in these presentations and have backed up this support by issuing written orders to Departmental commanders not only to support the reform but to restore illegally evicted farmers to their land.

Agrarian reform is one of the cornerstones of the reform process. the land reform program has two active components. Phase I deals with the properties larger than 500 hectares (ca. 1235 acres) and with estates of under 500 hectares which are voluntarily offered for sale to the state. Phase II, whose implementation has been deferred since its inception, would affect farms in the 100 to 500 hectares range. Phase III of the reform allows renters and sharecroppers to buy the land they worked under those arrangements as of May 6, 1980, up to a maximum of seven hectares (ca. 17.3 acres). In practice some lands rented subsequent to that date were also affected. Although redistribution of land is the most visible aspect of the reform program, supporting services such as credit and extension are necessary to the program's success. Steady progress is being made in the provision of these services, with $51 million of the 1982 Government of El Salvador's scarce budget resources allocated in direct support activities for the agrarian reform. Of this amount, $27 million is allocated to the Agricultural Development Bank for new production and investment credit for both Phase I cooperatives and Phase III beneficiaries. (See Appendix C).

Under Phase I, 287 farmer cooperatives are working and managing former estates. Some 15 percent of the country's farmland has been taken over in Phase I, and seven percent of the rural population now lives and works on these farms. The national Agricultural Development Bank is making $46.5 million in production and investment credit available to Phase I cooperatives for the current 1982/1983 crop year.

Phase II of the agrarian reform was to have affected properties from 100 to 500 hectares. Former-President Duarte indefinitely postponed implementation of Phase II because of the widespread civil conflict, lack of qualified manpower to provide technical assistance to potential beneficiaries, and the ongoing economic crisis and lack of capital for compensation. Nonetheless, over 100 Phase II properties have been voluntarily offered for sale to ISTA, the government agency which administers Phase I. To date, ISTA has purchased 64 of these properties and incorporated them into Phase I under worker-run cooperative management.

Phase III, which is also referred to as Decree 207 or as the Land-to-the-Tiller Program, allows renters and sharecroppers to claim title to up to 7 hectares of the land they have been working. Some 32,080 provisional titles have been issued to former renters and sharecroppers. This is an increase of 11,238 titles since January and includes 4,865 provisional titles issued since the March 28 election and change in government.

Leaders of the new government have demonstrated their commitment to the agrarian reform program and to its continuation. President Magana and members of his cabinet personally led ceremonies in which 1,225 provisional titles were distributed in June and in which 640 provisional titles have already been distributed in July. In June and July, 251 definitive or final titles were issued, and the first compensation payments for Phase III of the land reform began. These final title figures are small, as is the number of owners who have received compensation; but they are significant for beginning the process of addressing key shortcomings in the implementation of Phase III.

President Magana has also appointed a commission composed of campesino, government, military, and private sector representatives to report directly to him on their recommendations for improving the legal framework and implementation of the program. Reports indicate this mechanism is functioning effectively. The commission has completed a set of recommendations for Phase III and will soon present them to the President for his consideration.

The slow pace of compensation and the absence of payments in Phase III were major causes of landowners' resistance to the reform program. Through June 1982, a cumulative total of about $6 million in cash had been paid to Phase I property owners, along with $71 million in bonds. The new government is moving to correct this situation by making available $32 million for cash payments and debt service on agrarian reform bonds over the rest of 1982 for both Phases I and III of the reform. This compensation schedule should help reduce the number of illegal evictions instigated by former owners and relieve the anxiety of beneficiaries that their ownership is clouded as long as the former owner has not been compensated. Further funding is needed to resolve compensation inequities under this program.

As noted above, Decree 6 was passed in May by the Constituent Assembly modifying Decree 207, the legislative basis for Phase III of the agrarian reform. As interpreted by the Assembly itself and by the Government, Decree 6 allows landowners to rent for one crop cycle (one year for cotton, basic grains and cattle; up to three years for sugar cane), without fear of incurring a new risk of expropriation under Decree 207, land which had not been claimed under Decree 207 or was not presently being occupied by an eligible beneficiary as of the date of Decree 6. This law relates solely to land which is used for cotton, cattle, grains, and sugar cane. Decree 6 does not annul the reform. The rights of actual and potential Decree 207 beneficiaries are guaranteed by the new law and are explicitly stated in a legislative interpretation passed by the Constituent Assembly. The effect should be to bring unused land into production and encourage agricultural productivity in a country whose economy is battered as a result of the guerrilla warfare and which is desperately in need of foreign exchange. Efforts by opponents of the agrarian reform program to interpret Decree 6 in a more restrictive way have not been successful. Widely publicized support of Phase III by the Government and Armed Forces appear to have helped dispel the initial misinterpretation of Decree 6.

A much more serious challenge to the land reform program was the surge in evictions of farmers with legitimate claims to land in Phase III. According to records of FINATA, 3,822 farmers who had petitioned for land later filed complaints that they had been evicted. Other organizations have cited much higher figures. In early June the Salvadoran military command ordered its units to assist in enforcement of agrarian reform laws. The Salvadoran armed forces have returned more than 1,900 farmers and their families to their land since June 1, and the military has pledged to reinstall all illegally evicted farmers. FINATA has instituted an advertising campaign urging evicted farmers to contact FINATA so they can be returned to their land. Despite the efforts of the Salvadoran Government to end these illegal actions, some evictions are continuing.

In addition to agrarian reform, other economic reforms are in place. All banks have been placed under majority government ownership in order to broaden control of the nation's credit system and to provide a source of financing for the agrarian reform. Compensation bonds have been issued to all ex-stock-holders who have applied for them and all interest payments have been paid as due. Compensation is based on the bank's net worth, minus a reserve for doubtful loans which will be paid to ex-owners as these loans are collected. Bonds have been issued for $100.8 million and carry a nine percent interest payable semi-annually. Assuming the Government of El Salvador meets its bond payment schedule, the question of compensation under the bank reform has been resolved. Export marketing boards have been established for El Salvador's major cash crops, coffee and sugar. However, the banking and marketing reforms are being buffeted by the problems caused by the guerrillas' attacks on El Salvador's economic infrastructure plus the low world prices for El Salvador's major exports and the high price of imported oil. In addition, there have been allegations of politicization of the banking system and mismanagement of coffee exports.

Essential political reform has been instituted in El Salvador with the holding of the Constituent Assembly election and the transition to a representative form of government. The process of political reform is ongoing and includes the writing of a new constitution by the Assembly and the holding of presidential elections.

It is our conclusion that despite the strong challenges to agrarian reform in El Salvador, there has been demonstrable progress in the past six months: Phase I has been consolidated and progress continued on the payment of compensation to former owners and the issuance of definitive titles to campesino cooperatives; and in Phase III an additional 11,238 provisional titles have been issued, the first ever definitive titles have been distributed, and compensation for the former owners has finally been initiated. Therefore, we are able to certify that the Government of El Salvador is making continued progress in implementing essential economic and political reforms, including land reform.

ELECTIONS

Elections for a Constituent Assembly were held in El Salvador on March 28, 1982. The election campaign and the application of the electoral regulations were supervised by an independent Central Elections Commission (CCE), which also tallied the ballots. The CCE is headed by Dr. Jorge Bustamante, and independent. In addition to extensive measures instituted to ensure the fairness of the election, more than 200 observers from over 40 nations and the OAS were present as was an international press corps numbering over 700.

The traditional parties of the left, right, and center including socialist and communist parties, all of which were eligible under the previous electoral law, were offered automatic eligibility upon completion of simple registration procedures. Newly formed parties participated by meeting routine procedural requirements. Six parties were on the ballot.

President Duarte and Dr. Bustamante repeatedly invited the communist-front Democratic National Union (UDN), and the Socialist International-affiliate National Revolutionary Movement (MNR), and the guerrillas' political front, the Democratic Revolutionary Front (FDR), to participate in the elections. Arguing that conditions were not appropriate for elections, and expressing doubts about their personal security should they participate, these groups refused to take part. Nor did they accept the Junta's offer to negotiate on how they could have participated with adequate security guarantees. They called for their supporters to boycott the election, and the guerrillas attempted to disrupt the elections by intimidating voters and politicians, destroying the nation's transportation system (over 250 buses, El Salvador's main means of transport, were destroyed between January 1 and election day), attacking the Central Elections Commission on election eve, and making armed attacks on election day itself. Indeed, in fending off guerrilla attempts to disrupt the electoral process, the Armed Forces suffered in March 1982 by far the heaviest casualties of any month since the beginning of El Salvador's civil strife.

The turnout on election day exceeded all expectations and constituted a major setback for the guerrillas. More than 80 percent of eligible Salvadoran voters cast their ballots in a courageous demonstration of the Salvadoran people's desire to end the violence wracking their country. Many walked miles through guerrilla roadblocks to reach the polls. The voters waited patiently in line for hours, often under direct guerrilla attacks.

Observers (three members of Congress were members of the official U.S. observer delegation) found the election process orderly and—except for guerrilla actions—peaceful. None of the international observers nor any of the poll workers and party observers reported any fraud in the conduct of the balloting or the counting of the votes. (See Appendix D for comments.) Over 1.5 million votes were cast and produced the following results:

Party	Percentage of valid votes	Seats
Christian Democratic Party (PDC)	40	24
National Republican Alliance (ARENA)	29	19
National Conciliation Party (PCN)	19	14
Democratic Action (AD)	8	2
Popular Orientation Party (POP)	1	0

Twelve percent of the votes cast were either invalidated or blank. Of this total three percent were ballots with no markings, dropped blank into the ballot box. Less than one percent were ballots where it is not clear whom the voter intended to cast his vote for—the mark was not within one of the indicated spaces for a particular party or overlapped with spaces for more than one party. Eight percent were ballots which in some way were defaced, torn, or otherwise spoiled. In past elections in El Salvador as many as 50 percent of voters in some departments have submitted blank or null votes.

Recently a University of Central America (UCA) report has circulated charging that the total number of votes cast was inflated. The report's conclusions are based upon a number of assumptions but essentially upon mathematical calculations of the amount of time necessary for each voter to cast his ballot. The charge is without foundation: it confuses the time it took for each voter to complete the entire voting procedure with the fact that several voters were assisted at each voting table at the same time. Further, the actual time to complete the process, as timed by official U.S. election observers, was less than half that reported by UCA. At the polling place itself, officials and poll watchers from competing political parties as well as international observers and press, verified the count as well as the fairness of the voting procedure. The most significant check against fraudulent count was the preparation at the precincts of the count sheets, ten copies of which were distributed to precinct workers, poll watchers and party representatives, and made available to international observers as well. In addition, international observers, after spot checking the tally in a number of precincts, found the same figures recorded on the computer printouts at Central Election headquarters. (See Appendix D for the rebuttals to the UCA report by CCE President Bustamante and Howard Penniman, one of the members of the official U.S. observer delegation.)

Because no single party gained a majority of the seats in the Constituent Assembly, a lengthy process of inter-party negotiation occurred which resulted in the formation of a Government of National Unity, led by independent Alvaro Magana and including vice presidents from the three major parties represented in the Assembly, which will govern until presidential elections are held. (See Appendix D for list of Cabinet officers.) Roberto D'Aubuisson, leader of ARENA, was elected President of the Assembly.

The March 28 election was only the first step of an ongoing political process. The tasks the Constituent Assembly faces are to draft a new constitution for the country, to write the ground rules and set the date for presidential elections—probably 1983 or early 1984—and to function as an interim legislative body. The Government of National Unity hopes that more moderate elements of the FDR can be persuaded to join in this process. President Magana has stated his intention to establish a special government commission for this purpose.

It is worthy of note in this regard that Apostolic Administrator Rivera y Damas, speaking about the Constituent Assembly election in this April 4 homily, said that ". . . one has to ask the leaders of the FDR and the guerrillas that they accept the verdict of the people in favor of peace, of democracy and justice which was massively emitted by the public on this past Sunday. The guerrillas must end their use of arms and destruction and look for other paths. . . ."

Although not directly related to the holding of free elections, the murders of fourteen Christian Democratic Party (PDC) officials since mid-May are especially troubling in their implications regarding an open and free political process. El Salvador has been a violent society; 147 PDC officials and members were killed even while PDC leader Jose Napoleon Duarte was President of the Revolutionary Junta. However, this recent spate of murders has provoked outrage in El Salvador, and, in contrast to previous killings, arrests have been made. On May 27 the Constituent Assembly voted unanimously in favor of a PDC proposal condemning the ongoing criminality in general and the most recent murders of PDC members in particular. The Assembly agreed further to charge a special commission with the investigation of these crimes. The commission took up the issue as part of the broader question of violence directed at government and political party officials. The special commission is made up of the Assembly officers (Assembly President D'Aubuisson and eight other Assembly members representing ARENA, PCN, and PPS plus PDC Deputy Rodolfo Castillo and Nelson Segovia of Accion Democratica). On May 31 the Armed Forces issued a declaration condemning these "desperate acts" and appealing to those with knowledge of the perpetrators to step forward. Six suspects, all members of the local civil defense units and including two local "commandantes," have been arrested by the National Guard in two of the cases.

We conclude that the Salvadoran Government has held free elections and to that end made good faith efforts to begin discussions with all major political factions which have declared their willingness to find and implement an equitable political solution to the conflict. Over 200 international observers were present during the March 28 Constituent Assembly election. What is more, El Salvador has during this period experienced an orderly, peaceful change of government, and the Constituent Assembly is writing a new constitution and exercising legislative responsibilities which will lead to the drafting of ground rules for a presidential election. Progress in this area has been substantial.

INVESTIGATION OF THE MURDERS AND DISAPPEARANCE OF U.S. CITIZENS [1]

There have been a number of developments in the investigation of those responsible for the murders of four American churchwomen in El Salvador in December 1980. In late 1981 and early 1982, the Salvadoran investigative team, with FBI technical assistance including a polygraph test, achieved a major breakthrough in the investigation. As a result, five suspects were dismissed from the National Guard and placed under arrest on February 8, 1982. A sixth man who had previously left the National Guard was arrested at the same time. On February 10, jurisdiction over the six men was transferred to civilian Judge Bernardo Rauda Murcia. The National Guard delivered to the court its report on the investigation of the case, as well as physical evidence obtained during the investigation. On February 13, Judge Rauda charged five of the six men with aggravated homicide and released the sixth, who was found not to have been involved in the murders. Judge Rauda then began the required judicial investigation. Pursuant to El Salvador's Napoleonic Code system, the Judge must hear testimony and evidence, study the same, and order additional testimony and examination as he deems necessary. Following this judicial investigation, the Judge decides whether to order the case to trial. Judge Rauda is still in the judicial investigation stage of the process. Even so, he has stated publicly that he expects to order the case to trial.

The Salvadoran government has also moved to reinvigorate the investigation of the murders of two American land reform advisors, Mark Pearlman and Michael Hammer, and their Salvadoran colleague, Rodolfo Viera, at the Sheraton Hotel in San Salvador in January 1981. In 1981 two individuals, Hans Adolpho Krist and Ricardo Sol Meza, were charged with the murders by the Salvadoran Government; Sol Meza was imprisoned in El Salvador and Hans Krist was located in Miami. The Government of El Salvador, on the basis of supporting documentation, requested the extradition of Krist pursuant to the U.S.-El Salvador treaty of 1911. The United States Government thereupon initiated an extradition proceeding against him in the federal district court in Miami. In October 1981, a Salvadoran judge suspended further judicial action against the two accused on the grounds that insufficient evidence had been developed to implicate them in the murders. The Salvadoran Attorney General appealed this order, but the suspension was upheld by the Court of Criminal Appeals on April 13, 1982. As a result of the affirmance of the suspension, the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of Florida on June 23 dismissed the pending extradition request against the accused in Miami (Krist) and released him from custody. The other accused (Sol Meza) had been freed from custody in El Salvador at the time of the October 1981 suspension order.

In April 1982, an investigative working group was established by the Salvadoran Government in an attempt to uncover sufficient additional evidence relating to the murders to warrant reopening the case in accordance with Salvadoran law. It held its first formal meeting on May 20, with all members present, including a National Guard officer assigned to head the group. After completing a study of files, the working group began interviewing potential witnesses in June. The FBI is prepared to provide appropriate technical assistance, including polygraph examinations at the appropriate time. It is our hope that these efforts will produce significant new evidence that will make it possible to bring to justice those responsible for these reprehensible crimes. Preliminary results are encouraging.

John J. Sullivan of Bergen, New Jersey is a free-lance journalist who disappeared while on an assignment in El Salvador. He was last seen on December 28, 1980 at the Sheraton Hotel in El Salvador. He apparently left the hotel shortly after his arrival from the United States. Immediately after his absence was reported to the Embassy, he became the object of a thorough search by Embassy officers who also alerted Salvadoran police authorities. The Salvadoran government made Mr. Sullivan the object of a country-wide alert. Mr. Sullivan's disappearance has received and continues to receive the attention of the highest levels of the Salvadoran government. President Duarte's interest in the case continued during his term of office, and he communicated his personal concern to all elements of the Salvadoran government. This same willingness to assist was shared by, among others, Defense Minister Garcia, who directed military investigators to pursue leads provided by the Embassy. At the working level Salvadoran officials have aided Embassy officers in cross-checking information received from a variety of sources. For example, senior judges have personally assisted officers in researching the closed records which contain descriptions of unidentified corpses.

[1] Section 728(e) required a determination in the first certification that the Government of El Salvador has made good faith efforts both to investigate the murder of the six United States citizens in El Salvador in December 1980 and January 1981 and to bring to justice those responsible for those murders. We have continued to address these cases in this second report, and in addition have also discussed the case of Mr. John J. Sullivan's disappearance, because these cases are of continuing concern both to the Executive Branch and the Congress.

Notwithstanding the lack of success to date, the Embassy and the Department of State continue to pursue all leads that could possibly provide an answer to the mystery of Mr. Sullivan's disappearance. United States Government concern over this case has been re-emphasized at the highest levels of the Salvadoran government, and the Department is satisfied that it has been accorded the cooperation of the Salvadoran authorities in this matter and that such cooperation will continue.

STATISTICAL METHODOLOGY

Embassy San Salvador has kept systematic records on public reports of political violence in El Salvador since September 16, 1980. For consistency's sake, these statistics are culled only from information in the Salvadoran press. The Embassy recognizes that this method does not record every death from political violence. The actual totals are certainly higher. But for all its faults this system has the benefit of consistency and allows trends and patterns to be discerned from the data thus accumulated.

The primary source for newspaper reporting of civilian deaths are the justices of the peace located in municipalities throughout the country. One of the primary tasks of the justice is the identification and registration of bodies. Except for the areas with the greatest incidence of armed conflict, justices file regular reports with the courts. To the extent that reporters check with the courts, the figures are an accurate reflection of reported deaths. Not all deaths are reported, and not all areas are covered by reporters or justices. Therefore, the figures are subject to a degree of underreporting, but do accurately reflect trends. Disappearances are reported directly to the press by family members or are taken from court records.

Casualties resulting from military operations are not included in the figures.

Other organizations compiling figures on political violence in El Salvador and their methodologies are as follows:

Soccoro Juridico. Soccoro Juridico is the legal aid office previously located in the Archbishopric and since mid-April located in the headquarters of the Baptist church. It is now known as the Soccoro Juridico Cristiano. Its figures on deaths are taken from Radio Venceremos (the guerrillas' clandestine radio station), from denunciations by family members, and from other human rights organizations. The figures may be subject to duplication of reporting by other sources.

The Human Rights Commission of El Salvador (CDHES). CDHES collects information and issues reports on human rights from its office in the Archbishopric. Its figures on deaths and disappearances are taken from newspapers, other human rights organizations, and, on occasion, personal observation. The figures may be subject to inflation through duplication of reporting by other sources.

The Committee of Mothers and Other Relatives of Political Prisoners and Disappeared. The Committee of Mothers reports on human rights and other issues from offices adjacent to the Archbishopric. Its figures on deaths and disappearances are taken from newspapers and other human rights orgianizations. The figures may be subject to inflation through duplication of reporting by other sources.

The University of Central America (UCA). The UCA acts as a human rights clearing house, taking its information from newspapers and other human rights organizations.

Archbishopric Commission for Justice and Peace. The Commission began reporting on disappearances in May 1982, after replacing Soccoro Juridico in the Archbishopric. Its figures are taken from denunciations by family members which Commission representatives present as writs of habeas corpus to the Supreme Court. Denunciations derive almost entirely from the San Salvador area.

Because of the inaccuracies inherent in violence reporting and the possibility of duplication, the reliability of the figures, except for those reported in the newspapers and disappearances reported by the Commission for Justice and peace, cannot be established. It is possible that some of the figures reported by the human rights organizations are unverified. Nevertheless, it must be assumed that verified figures underreport the actual situation.

GENERAL GARCIA'S INSTRUCTION TO THE SALVADORAN SECURITY FORCES

The following is the English translation of an instruction issued by telegram by the Minister of Defense, General Garcia, to all military department chiefs for sharing with all personnel under their command. On March 9, the High Command reiterated its message in a combined public address to the Armed Forces on March 10.

Begin translation:

The current situation which confronts our country and the proximity of the electoral event have caused observers from all over the world to turn their eyes toward El Salvador and especially towards the conduct of our armed institution. Hundreds of foreign journalists are in our country, avid for news to divulge to the outside world the positive or negative aspects.

Actions outside of legal procedures or in violation of citizens' rights must not be repeated and must be avoided at all costs. Our actions must be marked by institutional professionalism, by the political impartiality which we have so often reiterated both internally and internationally, and by the social function and the respect for the people that support us in this fight. Only by this conduct can we contribute to (the goal that) friendly countries continue offering us their support in this fight to defend our people from the attack of the traitors and mercenaries who try to submit our country to a totalitarian regime.

Any action which violates or ignores these norms of conduct must be reported immediately, in order to order the corresponding investigation, determine responsibilities, and punish the violators.

You are to communicate the preceding to all commanders and officers, classes, agents, and troops under your command in order to insure strict observation and compliance.

Acknowledge receipt.

Signed: General Jose Guillermo Garcia, Minister of Defense.

End translation.

ARMED FORCES CODE OF CONDUCT FOR ENLISTED MEN

Informal translation:

I am a representative of the Armed Forces of El Salvador.

I will meet my obligations in a military manner and will present a decorous and dignified military appearance at all times. All that I do will reflect on El Salvador, my unit, my service and my person.

It is my duty to comply, support and defend the constitution and the laws of El Salvador.

It is my duty to protect the lives and the private property of all Salvadorans.

I will respect and watch over the right of children, of the elderly and of women.

I will be courteous as possible with all citizens. I will not mistreat anybody, I will give first aid to those who need it, and, if I have to enter into action to assure the constitution and the laws of El Salvador are respected, I will have in mind the human rights of people.

To fulfill the mission which is assigned to me, I will exhaust all pacific means, being profoundly respectful of human dignity.

I will use my arms only when it is necessary to defend my life and the lives of others.

I will give all my effort to impede offenses to our patriotic symbols and national monuments that represent the traditional moral values of the Salvadoran people.

In all service activities and in my private life, I will take into account always that every individual has the right to life, to liberty, and that I provide these with security.

Note: There is a net reduction in estimates for both the direct beneficiaries or cooperative members and total beneficiaries as a result of the abandonment of or migration from cooperatives located in or near conflict zones.

AGRARIAN REFORM TRAINING

During the calendar year 1981 and the first quarter of 1982, 191 separate training activities were conducted on behalf of 8,295 agrarian reform beneficiaries under Phase I and Phase III and technicians who service the reformed sector. The training activities included the presentation of 142 courses, both on-farm and at GOES training centers, 17 field trips, and 32 seminars. Subject matter covered included presentations treating: prevention and control of coffee diseases including rust, integrated cotton pest management, soil conservation, irrigation and drainage, preservation of storage of basic grains and seeds, management and feeding of dairy cattle, fish culture, bee keeping, farm management, small farm planning, credit planning, and farm accounting.

The following tables list the number of courses and seminars presented and field trips conducted, along with the number of participants attending, during calendar year 1981 and the first quarter of 1982.

Agrarian reform technical assistance

In keeping with Government of El Salvador policy, El Salvador's agricultural extension system made it a priority to assist the productive activities of the reformed sector through the delivery of technical assistance during the 1981/82 crop year (May 1981 through April 1982).

According to data released by the Ministry of Agriculture and Livestock's Office of Agrarian Reform Planning and Evaluation, 92 percent of coffee, 82 percent of sugar cane, 85 percent of cotton, and 85 percent of the basic grains planted by the reformed sector during that crop year were serviced by the country's agricultural extension service. The table below lists commodities produced on corresponding reformed sector hectarage during the 1981–82 crop that were serviced by the extension service.

AGRARIAN REFORM TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE 1981–82 CROP YEAR

Commodity	Hectares	Percentage of reformed sector planting
Basic grains	24,271	85
Cotton	16,157	85
Coffee	17,468	92
Sugar cane	8,987	82

Servicing the technical assistance requirements of Decree 207 beneficiaries is far more expensive and time consuming than servicing the requirements of Phase I farms given the size and dispersion of the former group's holdings. To minimize the costs of delivering technical assistance to Decree 207 beneficiaries while maximizing the effectiveness of the assistance delivered, the extension service is organizing beneficiaries into client groups. During the 1981/82 crop year 16,970, decree 207 beneficiaries were organized into such groups.

COMMENTS ON THE MARCH 28 ELECTION

U.S. OBSERVER TEAM

Formal Statement by US Observer Delegation: Over and over again we heard the people say "we are voting for peace and an end to the violence." We believe this election can be a new beginning for this country. The Salvadoran people have said in overwhelming numbers that they want peace and an end to the violence.

Sen. Nancy Kassebaum: I am impressed, seriously impressed. I have enormous respect for the patience, perseverance, and courage of the people turning out today. I don't see any sign of (intimidation). Exceptionally fair.

Congressman Robert Livingston: The procedures that were implemented were as fair as any I have ever seen in any election. There was no evidence of intimidation. I firmly believe that the people of El Salvador do want freedom, do want democracy, and reject the demands of the terrorists who are trying to take over this government by force, and I hope that the American people and the United States Congress would get that message. Voter turnout was a slap in the face of the guerrillas . . . I think the guerrillas had a lot of people in the U.S. and Europe fooled, but I don't think they had the people of El Salvador fooled.

Howard Penniman: It (the turnout) was in the face of enormous opposition from the guerrilla forces and certainly not out of any form of pressure from the government.

Father Theodore Hesburgh: I asked them specifically if they were there out of fear, and they said "of course not, we're here because we want to vote." They (voters at the polls) said we're going to win against violence. We're sick up to here with violence, and we want peace in this country, and we want our jobs back, and we want to get moving. There's a passion to vote. I felt so exhilarated and really euphoric about seeing democracy working in a very difficult situation.

FOREIGN OBSERVERS

British Observer Team: The actual conduct of the election, though not free from difficulties, was fair and no credible allegation of fraud or serious intimidation by any of the Political parties taking part has to our knowledge been made or can be entertained. The massive vote demonstrated a decisive rejection of the call by the Left-wing alliance for a boycott of the election, and was achieved despite the attempts of the guerrilla forces to frustrate the election.

Luis Herrera Campins, President of Venezuela: A worldwide defeat for communism and its allies. A major step toward ending the violence and achieving peace * * *.

Jorge Marandino, Representative of the Argentinian Christian Democratic Party: The guerrillas distributed pamphlets saying "vote in the morning and die in the afternoon," and many people with the pamphlets in their hands reaffirmed their desire to vote. The people voted against the guerrillas. This extraordinary day will be an example for all America.

Jose Figueres, Former President of Costa Rica of the Costa Rica National Liberation Party (a member party of the Socialist International): A tremendous victory for the democratic process. A free election, absolutely free. It was a moving event, mile long lines. It seems to me we have unmade a myth that the guerrilla movement here was as popular as the one in Nicaragua that overthrew Somoza.

Francisco Saenz Mesan, President of the Costa Rican Supreme Electoral Commission: I was extremely impressed with the enthusiasm of the voters * * *. I believe they were freely able to vote, no pressure on them either physical or moral.

Nestor Gutierrez, Representative of the Panamanian Christian Democratic Party: The Salvadoran people have rejected violence, communism * * *. There was no pressure from the military.

Statement by OAS Election Observers: Orderly and free casting of ballots without any trace of repression. The experience of these elections * * * shows that elections are possible even under the most difficult circumstances * * *. A great triumph. The people have chosen the democratic path.

UNOFFICIAL OBSERVERS

Report prepared by the Official British Observer Delegation: The actual conduct of the election, though not free from difficulties, was fair and no credible allegation of fraud or serious intimidation by any of the political parties has to our knowledge been made or can be entertained. The massive vote * * * demonstrated a decisive rejection of the call by the Left-wing alliance for a boycott of the election, and was achieved despite the attempts of the guerrilla forces to frustrate the election.

Statement by Freedom House Delegation: A mandate for peace. No evidence * * * that this election was marred by gross fraud or that intimidation or violence dictated its result. * * * executed in a consistent and fair manner.

Declaration by the European Popular Party Delegation from the European Parliament: The people have clearly voted against violence, terror, and assassination. Neither psychological intimidation nor the brutal terror and terrorist attacks of the guerrillas during the electoral process prevented the people from voting. * * * The guerrillas have no popular roots among the Salvadoran people. The winner in this election is the Salvadoran people. The defeated are the guerrillas.

Dr. Al Thammer, German Christina Democratic Union: A very fair process of voting. (The people) rejected the violence of the guerrillas.

Horst Langes, German Representative in the European Parliament: By going out to vote, the people won.

Victor Irvine, Former Attorney General of Jamaica: A mandate for peace and prosperity. (The guerrillas will have) a tough time going on in the face of the vote.

Dr. Jean Marie D'Allet, Christian Democratic Member of the French National Assembly: * * * I thought that the people would be frightened by the threats and the presence of the guerrillas. I never saw so many people so happy to vote.

Robert Wenman, Progressive Conservative Member of the Canadian Parliament: I never saw any coercion or intimidation anywhere in any of the polls I visited. * * * It says to those who have resisted the electoral process, we have a message for you, you can shoot at us all day, you can bomb us, but we're going to vote, and that message should have been loud and clear to the guerrillas.

Tom Weal, New Zealand: I take my hat off to these people who haven't had the vast experience * * * in running a democratic process. I think they are absolutely beautiful people.

LATIN AMERICAN LEADERS

President Duarte, El Salvador: In the face of those who obstinately insist on imposing a totalitarian system with arms and have martyred the people to make them afraid to vote, here is the reply of the Salvadoran people, who have turned out en masse to vote, disregarding the danger.

President Jose Lopez Portillo, Mexico: Self-determination is a fundamental principle in which we Mexicans believe. I fervently hope the violence is eliminated. It is not for me to give an opinion * * * (but) (The Salvadorans at the polls) is a beautiful sight.

Colombian Foreign Minister Carlos Lemos Simmonds: * * * the people have chosen the path of democracy instead of the turbulent and dangerous path of the guerrillas and bullets. This is great for Latin American democracy.

Costa Rican President-Elect Luis Alberto Monge: * * * The first strong moral and political defeat suffered by the guerrillas.

Canadian Minister for External Affairs Mark MacGuigan: The fairest possible in El Salvador under the circumstances. (He added that the elections vindicated Canadian support for the electoral process.)

U.S. MEDIA

The Washington Post: One understands why the guerrillas were so eager to destroy * * * the elections. They seem to have sensed that the people would choose to take the way offered by the government to express their pent-up longing to have done with the war and to reconstruct the country. It was a tremendous victory for the political process. The insurgents were badly hurt by the elections: they failed to intimidate or dissuade the masses and were substantially spurned by them—a result that we hope will not be lost on Mexico, France, and the Socialist International, which have uncritically boosted the guerrilla cause.

The New York Times: What was most remarkable about Sunday's voting was the evident determination of so many Salvadorans to participate. Democracy may be a difficult vocation in Central America, but clearly it is not an impossible one. Despite the guerrillas' death threats and urban gunplay, an impressive majority of eligible voters * * * went to the polls.

The Los Angeles Times: The sight of citizens lining up to vote while soldiers exchanged gunfire with guerrillas a few blocks away was a remarkable symbol of a people's faith that democratic means can help solve political turmoil.

The Christian Science Monitor: No one favoring a nonviolent route to social change can fail to be heartened by the election turnout * * *. A thrilling display of courage and determination.

The Wall Street Journal: Clearly they had a real election in Salvador Sunday. The huge turnout was annoying to some American commentators because it destroyed their basic thesis about the war there, that it is simply the result of a popular uprising. It is simply not possible to square that thesis with a large proportion of the people pouring forth to vote * * *. And it is even harder to square it with the bloody efforts by the Communists to prevent a vote.

The Miami Herald: A resounding victory for the democratic process, one that many—including this newspaper—doubted possible in the midst of civil war. Three cheers for the Salvadoran people * * *.

St Louis Post-Dispatch: A vote against violence.

The Sun, Baltimore: * * * A clear defeat for the Farabundo Marti National Front and the various Marxist groups associated with it * * *. A turnout of more than eighty percent of the voters made the election a success, not a mockery.

Newsday: Display of tenacious determination * * *. A setback far more stunning than any defeat the insurgents might suffer on the battlefield * * *. Resounding repudiation of * * * their claim to represent the true aspirations of ordinary Salvadorans * * *. They would have been swamped if they had run a slate of candidates.

Philadelphia Inquirer: * * * A test of the courage of the people and their dedication to the democratic process. The heroism and patience of the voters bordered on the incredible. The chance for a negotiated settlement is greater today because of the election.

New York Daily News: The true heroes * * * were the hundreds of thousands of voters who braved the bluster and violence of lefist guerrillas to vote.

Houston Chronicle: Indisputable testimony that the people of El Salvador want to decide their government's future through the ballot box and not through violent revolution.

San Diego Tribune: The ability to carry on an election in a country without democratic traditions during an undeclared civil war is an achievement of the Salvadoran people.

Richard Threlkeld, ABC: It was the biggest and best election El Salvador has ever had and apparently the most honest.

John Chancellor, NBC: * * * The losers today were the rebels who told people not to vote.

Marvin Kalb, NBC: The elections helped legitimize the Administration policy of pressing for political and economic reform in the midst of savage guerrilla war.

Dan Rather, CBS: It was a triumph—a million people at the polls.

Joanne Omang, the Washington Post: * * * It is not possible to argue any more that fear of government reprisal for nonvoting made a considerable number of people walk for hours, dodge guerrilla bullets, and stand in line for hours to vote.

FOREIGN MEDIA

Il Giorno, Milan: * * * Yesterday something happened in El Salvador which deserves our consideration and admiration.

Hamburger Abendblatt, Hamburg: * * * Surprisingly many went to the polls—many risking their lives. They probably had the impression that these elections were not simply a farce.

Daily Telegraph, London: El Salvador rejects guerrillas.

Frankfurter Allgemeine, Frankfurt: (The elections) took place in spite of terror. In themselves they amounted to a victory.

Die Welt, Bonn: * * * The Marxists suddenly find themselves on the political defensive.

France-Soir, Paris: (The turnout) ended the fable * * * according to which the rebellion was supported by the country people.

Figaro, Paris: * * * A failure for the Marxist rebellion, which is losing its false name as supporter of the just cause of the poor and oppressed people.

Les Echos, Paris: * * * A rare example * * * which deserves reflection especially by the distant mentors who try to teach democracy.

Liberation, Paris: * * * the FMLN has lost the elections in which it did not participate.

Il Tempo, Rome: * * * The people of El Salvador have reacted to the intimidations and violence with massive participation in the electoral process. The armed party has been defeated.

Berlingske Tidende, Copenhagen: It has been fashionable to call the election a farce * * * (The people) have refused the left-wing's demand for a boycott of the election, a quite courageous demonstration indicating that the guerrillas do not by their terrorism serve the cause of the people. * * *.

Die Presse, Vienna: The appeal * * * for a boycott can be regarded * * * as a failure.

ABC, Madrid: Moral defeat for the guerrillas.

La Prensa, Tegucigalpa, Honduras: People said "yes" to democracy and "no" to pro-Soviet guerrillas' call for abstention.

La Nacion, San Jose, Costa Rica: The * * * people are offering the guerillas a civic and a political fight instead of bullets.

Daily Gleaner, Kingston, Jamaica: This election must certainly call into question the bona fides of the leftist rulers of Nicaragua and Grenada and might very well explain why, in spite of their boast that they have the support of the people, they are so shy of elections.

El Nacional, Caracas: A defeat for Communism and its allies.

Correio Brasiliense, Brasilia: * * * The Salvadoran guerrillas suffered two serious defeats: they did not succeed in obstructing the elections and the centralist Christian Democrats were the winners.

Times, London: From Europe it is not munitions which are needed but moral support. Western Europe should show * * * understanding.

TASS, Moscow: The organizers of the farce created every condition for falsification or fraud. There were no lists of electors, and a person had only to show his or her identification card to be allowed to vote. It was possible to vote many times in several polling centers. * * * A political profanation which for proportions and cynicism exceeds all spectacles of that kind.

Havana Domestic Television Service: Gunfire and absenteeism marked the attempt to hold elections in El Salvador yesterday. There are already charges that—as had been foreseen—dead and unborn voted together with the living.

Barricada, Managua: Held at bayonet point. * * * Minimal popular participation. * * * Squalid and forced elections.

SALVADORAN ELECTIONS

(By Dr. Jorge Bustamante)

(The following is the text of the rebuttal written by Dr. Jorge Bustamante in reply to the Ray Bonner articles on the Salvadoran elections which appeared in the New York Times June 4 and 6. It also addresses the allegations made by Thomas Sheehan in his OP-ED piece on June 3. Salvadoran Ambassador Rivas Gallont has submitted the letter to the Times for publication.

Recently the New York Times and other publications have raised questions about the integrity of the March 28 elections results in El Salvador. After examining some of these articles with care (including one rather loosely based on an interview with me), it becomes obvious that the basic source is a "research" report prepared by the University of Central America. We are not surprised by UCA's report—they wrote a similar report predicting fraud before the elections. We are surprised that the University's report has received so much currency without being subjected to the same scrutiny given most pronouncements from El Salvador.

The basic allegation of the UCA report is that the election results announced by the Central Elections Commission, while accurately reflecting the percentages won by each party, were approximately doubled in order to show greater voter turnout. The charge flies in the face of the findings of over 100 international observers and the on-the-scene reporting of more than 750 journalists from around the world. To quote the official report of the OAS Observers, which is representative of the reports from others, "The Salvadoran people have voted massively, equally in the cities as well as in the small towns, in a free and orderly manner, expressing the firm decision of making their sovereign right to vote count."

In spite of the fact that no one has said they know how this "fraud" was carried out, some specific charges have been made and deserve comment.

It has been said that simple arithmetic shows that 1.5 million people could not have voted during the time the polls were open since each voter needed three minutes. The fatal flaw in this argument is that it did not take three minutes to vote. The Commission studied this question before the election; we estimated 90 seconds per vote. I timed myself when I voted and I only needed 37 seconds after I got to the table.

In addition, most voting tables processed three people at the same time which further speeded the voting process.

In an article in the June 3 New York Times Mr. Thomas Sheehan makes much of a three hour halt in the announcement of results. He also says we on the Elections Commission announced that 80 percent of the results were in at that time. On the first point, he is right—we did stop announcing the results.

We stopped the public announcement of the vote count for two simple reasons. First, the voting tables each were sending the Central Elections Commission a telegram providing us with a preliminary count of the vote at their table. These telegrams, over 3,500 of them, were all trying to reach the Central Elections Commission at the same time and overwhelmed the National Telegraph System. We needed time for the system to catch up. The second problem concerned the reports in the telegrams themselves. In many of them the vote count did not coincide with the number of ballots issued to the table because of simple errors in arithmetic. When the figures did not balance the computer would reject the information. Then a Commission employee would have to review the telegram, find the error, correct it by hand, and then re-enter it in the computer. This time-consuming process caused a back-log. We stopped the announcements to allow our people to catch up. International observers, members of diplomatic missions, political party representatives and Central Elections Commission officials were present at the Commission offices all during this time. Not one person present has charged that tampering took place.

Mr. Sheehan also writes that "some hours after the closing of polls. . . the Board said that it had tabulated 881,883 ballots and that this corresponded to 80 percent of the votes cast." We made no such statement on election night. At noon two days after the election we announced that 881,883 ballots had been counted and that they represented 80 percent of the results from the voting tables. Because people were allowed to vote anywhere in the country, some voting tables were much busier than others. Thus the percentage of tables counted at any given moment did not correspond to the percentage of the votes counted at that time. For example, at the time of the announcement we had not yet counted the Department of San Salvador, which by itself produced about one-third of the total vote.

Issue has been made of the fact that we on the Elections Commission printed 3 million ballots when our most optimistic estimate of the number of eligible voters was far less than that number. There were several reasons for this. As I noted before, any citizen could vote at any voting table, thus it was impossible to know how many voters might present themselves at any given table. We made our best estimates and sent extra ballots to local elections officials in case individual tables ran short. Also, the guerrillas had promised to violently disrupt the elections. We had to provide for the possibility that some ballots might be lost to insurgent action. Furthermore, we had to allow for the loss of ballots through human error. The final reason for printing so many ballots should be obvious. To have held an election in which some citizens were denied their vote because of a shortage of ballots would have been a tragic farce.

The June 4 Times article cites an anonymous source to the effect that the "National Telephone Communication Center which was run by the Army" somehow altered the election results as the telegrams came in from the country-side. The Electoral Commission compared the results from the telegram with the results in the affidavits prepared by each electoral table. The tables sent their affidavits to the Electoral Commission directly via messenger. The comparison showed a discrepancy of less than one percent.

In the same June 4 article your reporter says that our April 13 printout shows no voting in nine villages in Chalatenango Department. But the April 14 printout shows all nine voting. This is not correct. Our printouts for those two days and the final printout of May 7 all show the same thing: four Municipalities—Nueva Trinidad, San Isidro Labrador, San Antonio de la Cruz and San Antonio Los Ranchos—did not vote. These towns were not able to vote because of heavy insurgent activity.

Other questions are raised in a June 6 article in the Times. Your reporter says, "In San Ildefonso, San Vicente 4 of the 10 voting stations reported that all of the 500 ballots it had received had been improperly marked." In fact local elections officials annulled the ballots from these four tables not for improper marking, but because they suspected fraud. The voiding of these ballots was in complete accord with our electoral law. A similar annulling of ballots took place in Suchitoto, Cuscatlan. We at the Elections Commission see nothing wrong with this in spite of the fact that it reduced the final vote count. It was the duty of the election officials to invalidate ballots when fraud was suspected.

The same article points out that in Aguilares, San Salvador, 19 of 20 tables reported an identical vote count.

Aquilares is what we call a "conflictive area" of San Salvador Department. Fighting had taken place all during election day around the town. The local election authorities were anxious to return to the safety of their homes, so they counted all the votes from all the tables and reported them in one telegram in order to speed things up. Since the total number of votes was not divisible by 20 and we could not report a fraction of a vote, we made 19 identical packages and put the remainder in the twentieth. Subsequently, when the voting table affadavits arrived at the Central Elections Commission the totals were consistent with the telegram. While the official system was not strictly observed, all votes cast in Aguilares were counted. There is no evidence that local officials were doing anything but trying to get a fair vote count under trying and dangerous circumstances. The article states that the same thing happened with nine of 10 tables in El Paisnal, San Salvador. It did. And for exactly the same reasons.

Mention is also made in this article of possible fraud in Jiquilisco, Usulutan. In this case, your reporter seems to have confused ballots issued with ballots cast. Voter turnout was heavy in that municipality and extra ballots were issued to all 18 tables. Our printouts clearly show that 17 tables received a total of 999 blank ballots each and the other table received 515 blank ballots. Our printouts do not show uniformity in actual voting results from table to table. All this was officially reported. We fail to see a problem.

One particularly troubling point is that your June 4 article makes it seem that I acknowledged the possibility of a ten percent vote inflation. Neither I nor the Commission acknowledge that possibility. I told your reporter that in any country—especially one without sophisticated electoral technology—an error of as much as 10% might be expected. We believe the margin of error in our March 28 elections to have been much less—perhaps as little as one percent.

Even if we were to concede a ten percent inflation of the vote, we would be speaking of no more than plus or minus 150,000 votes, not the 600,000 to 700,000 votes alleged by the UCA study.

We do not mind explaining apparent inconsistencies. But we find the allegations of grand conspiracies and massive vote inflation frustrating. The charges are so groundless as to be absurd on their face. But it is a shame to see the most honest, open and free elections in our history slandered. If these elections were fixed I want to know how it was done. Sweeping accusations based on unsupportable concepts, such as three minutes per vote can only impede the difficult transition to democracy in El Salvador. To say otherwise is to defraud a people who before the eyes of the world, and often at great personal risk, chose democracy.

BASELESS CHARGES OF MASSIVE SALVADORAN ELECTION FRAUD

(By Howard Penniman)

To the Editor: In his June 3 Op-Ed article, "Salvador Vote Inflated, Study Is Said to Find," Thomas Sheehan describes conclusions by a team of researchers at Central American University in El Salvador that the reported vote of March 28 for members of that country's National Assembly was roughly double the actual number of ballots cast.

The number of votes was inflated proportionally, says Mr. Sheehan, so the political parties involved in the election did not object to the fraud: each received the number of seats to which it was entitled.

The researchers, conceding that they have no "conclusive proof," rely on "converging facts and calculations":

(1) that the Election Board had calculated it would take a voter three minutes to cast a ballot; (2) that ballot counting was at one point halted (just as it was in 1972, they say, when Jose Napoleon Duarte was cheated out of the presidency); (3) that U.S. Ambassador Deane Hinton "enjoined" party leaders after the election "from discussing fraud," and (4) that there was something fishy about printing 1.5 million more ballots than the "anticipated" turnout.

If there had indeed been such a doubling of the actual vote (presumably just to bamboozle the Americans), a giant conspiracy of silence would have been required, involving all members of the National Election Council and its staff, the leaders of all political parties and perhaps as many as a quarter-million precinct officials and poll watchers (who could check their own precinct reports against the computer printout). Furthermore:

The voting in El Salvador, as in all democracies, was an assembly-line process. Each voter went through six steps, beginning with the presentation of an identity card and ending when the voter's thumb was marked with ink visible only under ultraviolet light.

The process might take three minutes, but as many as six people could and did go through the process at the same time. By my check in several places, one voter was finishing up every 45 to 65 seconds. So most voters had cast their ballots by midafternoon.

There is no similarity between the three-hour interruption in the count of the March 28 vote and the interruption for several days in 1972. This time, outsiders were in the Central Electoral Council office—which in 1972 was closed tight. This year's count picked up where it had left off—in 1972, the Government announced a result that conflicted with previous figures.

At a luncheon after the election, Ambassador Hinton asked party leaders, in the presence of official U.S. observers, not to make "frivolous" charges of fraud; he did not "enjoin" them from discussing fraud. In any case, bitter political opponents, such as Arena and the Christian Democratic Party, would never have been silent in the face of real fraud.

The Electoral Council printed three million ballots to meet the legal requirements that each of the anticipated 4,556 precincts must receive 500 ballots and that more should be available for precincts which might exhaust their initial supply or to replace ballots in the event of theft by the guerrillas.

Mr. Duarte came closest to describing reality when he said that there may have been election fraud in some small towns but rejected charges of extensive vote inflation [news story June 7].

I witnessed the spontaneous enthusiasm of Salvadorans for the election in person. Millions of Americans witnessed it on television. I verified the authenticity of the election process based on a lifetime of observing elections in the United States and in dozens of developed and developing countries.

Mr. Sheehan's article appears to fall into the trap of seeking to explain away what does not conform to prior expectations of guerrilla strength.

CAPTIVE NATIONS OBSERVANCE

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, in observance of Captive Nations Week, I would like to offer a few remarks in honor of the valiant and courageous women, men, and children of those nations as well as people in other lands whose persistent efforts help to constantly remind us of the realities of political, religious, social, and economic repression.

This distinguished Senate has frequently discussed the problems of the captive nations. We have sent many letters to the self-appointed rulers of the captive nations asking for more humane, tolerant, and democratic treatment of their captive peoples. Many of us have spoken personally with the representatives of those governments to ask them to end their repression of the captive peoples of the world. Having recently celebrated the 206th anniversary of the independence of our own Nation, it is especially painful to be reminded of the slavery which is the lot of 1 billion fellow human beings. But our own freedom is appreciated much more deeply and honestly if we realize the value of our own fight for independence as an example and a symbol for the captive nations. Their struggle for liberation is part of our own continuing struggle to maintain and expand the principles of freedom and human dignity. On the other hand, the determination of the captive nations to achieve a restoration of freedom is a striking inspiration for those who enjoy a high degree of freedom but may take that freedom for granted.

The suppression of human rights—freedom of thought, conscience, religion, and self-determination—is prevalent in many nations, but it is nowhere more total than in the Baltic States of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania. It is also oppressively present in Poland, the Soviet Union, Afghanistan, and many other lands. Yet the hunger for freedom cannot be destroyed. It will not be destroyed. Let us always remember that, though the struggle for freedom is painful, it is a battle well worth pursuing and a war that will be won.

NONDEFENSE DISCRETIONARY SPENDING WILL NOT BE REDUCED FURTHER

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I would like to call the attention of my colleagues to two articles in today's issues of the New York Times and the Washington Post. The first of these, from the Times, reports that Secretary of Defense Weinberger is proceeding with the development of his fiscal year 1984 and fiscal year 1985 budgets without regard for the outyear limitations on defense outlays determined by Congress in the prolonged negotiations over the budget resolution. That resolution was endorsed by the President. The effect of Secretary Weinberger proceeding in disregard of the resolution is to increase budget outlays by a total of $23 billion for those 2 years. In the absence of other action to either increase revenues or cut nondefense spending, the deficit will increase by $23 billion.

The second article, from today's Post, covers yesterday's testimony by CBO Director Alice Rivlin concerning the midsession review of the budget and the projections for a fiscal year 1983 budget deficit in the range of $140 to $160 billion. Commenting on her testimony, Treasury Secretary Regan is reported to have said, first, that Ms. Rivlin's projections have been reasonably good in the past. The article goes on: Asked what the government should do if deficits threaten to remain above $150 billion for the next 3 years, the Treasury Secretary said, "Cut the budget. There is room in the budget for further cuts, especially in nondefense discretionary spending."

I ask unanimous consent that both of these articles be printed in their entirety at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See Exhibit 1.)

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I will be brief. If the reports concerning the Defense Department's budgetary plans for fiscal years 1984 and 1985 are accurate, I will consider it a breach of faith. This Senator will be unequivocally opposed to any further increases in the defense budget. Apparently the military's appetite is absolutely insatiable. There is no regard for long-term planning, no concern for flagrant waste of the taxpayer's dollars, apparently no idea of the disastrous effects on the economy.

And I can assure my colleagues and the administration that I will do all in my power as chairman of the Appropriations Committee to prevent any further reductions in nondefense discretionary spending. Our committee stands second to none in reducing spending. We have made more cuts in more programs in the past year and a half than any other committee of this Congress. We have eliminated fat, we have eliminated muscle, we have conducted outright amputations of programs to do our part in getting the budget under control. I say to the Secretary of the Treasury that there is no more room to cut in the nondefense discretionary programs, and I will strenuously oppose any efforts to reduce them further.

Mr. President, if we want to talk about liberal spenders, let us realize that the new big spenders in the Congress today, the ones that have brought the budget into this terrible situation, are the military spenders. That is where the money is being spent like a drunken sailor.

We have cut the budget in areas of social security, the aged, the poor, the nutrition programs, but where we have increased has been in that insatiable appetite of the military machine that runs through this Senate without any kind of constraint or restriction.

I only want to make that point at this time because I think these articles in today's papers show where they are going to even defy the Congress of the United States in preparing for new increases in military spending. Those are the liberal spenders. Those are the big spenders today, not the people who are concerned about the social programs in this country.

Mr. President, I will have more to say on this subject at a later date. Today I simply wanted to bring these matters to the attention of my colleagues, and make my position clear.

AIDES SAY REAGAN OBJECTS TO CEILING ON MILITARY FUNDS

(By Steven R. Weisman)

WASHINGTON, July 27.—President Reagan does not feel bound by the ceilings on military spending for 1984 and beyond that were set by Congress last month with the White House's blessing, Administration officials said today.

In a step likely to hurt his relations with his Republican allies, Mr. Reagan was said to be planning to use his midyear economic report, due later this week, to signal an intention to seek higher levels of military spending.

Last month, after a long struggle with a Congress intent on reducing the Federal deficit, Mr. Reagan endorsed a budget resolution calling for $30 billion less in military spending than he had proposed for the fiscal years 1983 to 1985. An Administration official said today that Mr. Reagan had decided, in effect, that his Administration should not have to adhere to the $23 billion in cuts that affect 1984 and 1985.

RESERVES RIGHT TO CHANGE

"The President does not consider the outyear numbers to be binding as far as defense is concerned," the Administration official said. "The budget resolution that was passed was for fiscal 1983 only, the President reserves the right to change them for the years after that."

There was no official reaction from Congress, but two key aides to the Senate Republican leadership said that any step appearing to renounce the budget ceilings set in June would be viewed by some Republicans as Mr. Reagan's reneging on a promise.

"There are a lot of folks who believed the President made a deal for fiscal '83-'84-'85 on defense spending," said one Republican aide. "Cutting defense was a whole part of the budget package."

The President's decision, however, would have little practical effect in the short run, since he does not submit his actual spending proposal for 1984 until next January. After that, Congress determines what the spending level will be.

Thus, Mr. Reagan's decision not to be bound now by Congress's latest projections for 1984 was seen as a symbolic act, more of a "signal" of his intentions than an actual spending program, as one official put it.

Administration aides said a sharp debate took place before Mr. Reagan made his decision. They said it was reminiscent of last year's fight over military spending between Defense Secretary Caspar W. Weinberger and David A. Stockman, the budget director, as well as a portent of battles likely to occur later this year.

In the latest fight, according to Administration aides. Mr. Weinberger argued that Mr. Reagan need not feel he had to adhere to the military spending ceilings set by Congress. Mr. Reagan's political advisers were said to have joined with Mr. Stockman in arguing that the President would anger Congress if he backed away from the agreement made last month.

Mr. Reagan was persuaded, according to an Administration official, that the Defense Department should not be held to the future spending ceilings Congress established when it approved a first concurrent $770 billion budget resolution for the fiscal year 1983.

Moreover, this official said, Mr. Reagan had decided that the Defense Department could "assume" that its approved numbers for 1984 and beyond were those originally proposed by Mr. Reagan in February.

These called for military outlays of $253 billion in 1984 and $292 billion in 1985. In its budget resolution, Congress agreed to reduce them to $243 billion for 1984 and $279 billion for 1985, a cut of $23 billion over two years.

A Senate Republican aid said tonight that the Administration move would be seen in Congress as widening the deficit by at least that sum in 1984-85, weakening the entire bipartisan effort to reduce the deficit by trimming programs almost across the board.

In the midyear economic report, according to an Administration official, Mr. Reagan plans to say that he will determine later what the 1984 military spending levels should be. By this, he said he meant that Mr. Reagan will decide "in the normal budget cycle," in other words, in the process leading to submission of the 1984 budget in January.

"There's no great mystery to it," this official said. "It will be decided later on, and the Defense Department did not want to be held to the lower numbers until it's decided. They wanted to make it clear that they reserved the right not to be bound by those numbers."

Mr. Reagan's decision to renounce Congress's military spending cuts, subject to a review later, has no effect on spending for the fiscal year 1983, which begins Oct. 1. For that year, the level established by Congress was $214 billion in outlays, as against $221 billion in outlays Mr. Reagan had asked for last February.

The military appropriations committees in Congress are due to break down this sum into allocations for specific functions before the end of this year.

The military spending debate has been marked by myriad charges and countercharges within the Administration and Congress.

The Administration maintains that its projections for the military reflect a growth rate of 7 percent above the inflation rate with the fiscal year 1982 as a base. The Office of Management and Budget has determined that military spending is due to grow at a rate of 11 percent if one uses as a base the original 1981 budget that President Carter submitted in January 1980.

CBO Sees Far Higher Deficits

(By John M. Berry and Helen Dewar)

The federal budget deficit is likely to be between $140 billion and $160 billion in each of the next three years even if Congress makes all the spending cuts and tax increases called for in the current budget resolution, Alice Rivlin, Director of the Congressional Budget Office, said yesterday.

These deficits, far higher than the ones projected by the Reagan administration or by Congress when the budget resolution was passed, will be higher still if the moderate economic recovery forecast by CBO to begin later this year fails to occur, Rivlin told the Senate Budget Committee.

In a much delayed midyear budget review, the administration will estimate the fiscal 1983 deficit at no more than $114 billion, according to Treasury Secretary Donald T. Regan. Congress, when it passed the budget resolution, said it would produce a deficit of $103.9 billion.

Rivlin noted that Treasury borrowing to finance deficits as large as those CBO is projecting would keep pressure on financial markets, holding interest rates high and preventing a vigorous recovery from the recession.

Even as Rivlin warned of the higher deficits, bills to conform to the budget resolution made faltering progress in the Democratic-controlled House.

The Agriculture Committee approved cost-cutting amendments in dairy and wheat support programs in order to protect food stamps, while the Banking Committee rejected Republican proposals to squeeze Federal Housing Administration loan programs on grounds it had already made enough spending cuts to comply with the budget directive.

In its first floor vote on committee-proposed spending cuts, meanwhile, the House approved relatively modest economies in veterans programs, while its Rules Committee cleared the way for a floor fight later this week over the Post Office and Civil Service Committee's refusal to limit annual cost-of-living increases in federal pensions to 4 percent.

The deficits CBO is projecting are consistent with no more than a moderate recovery that would reduce unemployment slowly, Rivlin said. The unemployment rate, which was 9.5 percent in June, will average 8.8 percent in 1983 and still be above 7.5 percent throughout 1985, CBO now estimates.

On the other hand, Rivlin said, inflation should be no higher than about a 6.3 percent rate next year, as measured by the so-called gross national product deflator. That compares to a 4.8 percent annual rate in the first half of this year and a forecast 7 percent in the current six months.

With uncharacteristic bluntness, Rivlin said Congress and the president should act together to reduce the likely deficits by moderating the large planned increases in defense spending over the next few years, taking "significant action" to reduce spending on so-called entitlement programs and further increasing taxes.

Rivlin said that most of the difference between the CBO figures and those of the administration are the result of a different economic forecast, principally a slower rate of economic growth over the next three years.

In Chicago to address the National Conference of State Legislatures, Regan said he would not comment on Rivlin's projections "until I see what the economic assumptions are" for her forecast.

But he told reporters, "she's been reasonably good" in her past estimates.

Asked what the government should do if deficits threaten to remain above $150 billion for the next three years, the Treasury Secretary said, "cut the budget. There is room in the budget for further cuts," especially in "nondefense discretionary spending."

Rivlin told the Hill panel there was little Congress could do in coming months to improve the short-term economic outlook other than "hope for the best."

She resisted suggestions by some committee Democrats that rapid expansion of the money supply would help. That could renew inflation fears and cause long-term interest rates to go higher, she cautioned.

In yesterday's committee action:

The House Agriculture Committee voted tentatively to make major cuts in price-support payments to dairy farmers, thereby lessening the need to make cuts in the food-stamp program.

The committee voted to reduce price-support payments to farmers who exceed set production limits, a departure from current practice that experts said could save $1.3 billion next fiscal year and a total of $3.2 billion over the next three years.

In another departure, the committee voted to pay wheat farmers for taking part in an acreage set-aside program under which, next year, they would have to idle one-fifth of their land. The CBO estimated that this program, for which wheat farmers have been lobbying heavily, would cost $127 million next fiscal year but save $218 million during the following two years as reduced production resulted in increased grain prices and lower support payments from the Treasury.

The committee adopted similar programs for rice and corn, but refused to approve direct payments for cotton farmers.

The House Banking Committee, contending that it had already cut costs more than enough in two earlier bills, rejected more than $2 billion in savings from the FHA loan program endorsed by the Senate Banking Committee in complying with budget orders.

Instead, the committee's Democratic majority, over Republican objections that it came up with a "turkey" of a proposal, endorsed additional cost-cutting of only about $5 million for next year, largely in the Office of the Treasury Secretary. They invited Republicans to make further cuts on the floor if they wanted.

The House, by a vote of 400 to 0, approved $548 million in cuts from veterans programs over the next three years as part of an omnibus veterans compensation bill. It was the first of the budget-cutting bills to be approved by the House and it exceeded its target, although the amounts involved are modest in comparison with more controversial proposals, that are waiting in the wings.

The House Rules Committee granted reluctant Republicans a chance to champion cuts in inflation adjustments for federal retirees when a largely token savings measure from the Post Office and Civil Service Committee comes to the full House later in the week.

The Civil Service Committee refused to impose a 4 percent limit on cost-of-living adjustments for military and civilian government retirees, in effect letting the Republicans take responsibility for such a step on the floor. Republicans argued in vain that committee foot-dragging, coupled with piecemeal handling of the spending measures, stacked the deck against them and against compliance with the budget.

The Democrats are "resorting to a nickle-and-dime strategy . . . that would leave us with just that—nickles and dimes," charged Minority Whip Trent Lott (R-Miss.).

"If they [Republicans] support these cuts, they ought to vote for them," countered Rep. Leon E. Panetta (D-Calif.).

The House Appropriations Committee, wrapping up the last of its money packages for the 1982 fiscal year ending Sept. 30, approved $14.4 billion in new spending, with the largest chunk, $6.2 billion, for federal pay raises granted last October.

This measure is in addition to a scaled-down "urgent" supplemental money bill that President Reagan signed earlier this month after a protracted veto fight with Congress.

SENATOR SAM TELLS THEM

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I have reached the point that nothing really surprises me concerning the intellectual dishonesty of some of the major media of this country. For awhile, I had decided that I was in a minority in perceiving that the major media will stoop to any depth in misrepresenting those with whom these media disagree.

I have been stunned to note, for example, the incessant attacks upon President Reagan's efforts to reverse the economic crisis in this country—a crisis clearly created by 35 years of callous irresponsibility by politicians who have been using the Federal Treasury to feather their own political nests.

Any thinking American will understand that there are no instant or easy cures of the ailments the United States now suffers. Not only have most of the major media refused to tell the American people the truth, they have insisted on pretending that Ronald Reagan created the problems. Sadly many Americans have been misled.

Mr. President, this sort of thing is confined not merely to economic issues. The misrepresentations run all across the board. Anyone with whom the ultraliberal editors disagree is constantly portrayed as evil, even un-American.

Some weeks back, Mr. President, the editor of the Miami Herald published an editorial in which I was personally castigated because of my opposition to the so-called Voting Rights Act extension. That editorial was gleefully picked up on July 2 by the ultraliberal newspaper in my hometown of Raleigh. That newspaper, The News and Observer, has an editor who does everything possible to avoid publishing even letters to the editor which defend me. The able Senator from Minnesota (Mr. BOSCHWITZ) wrote a generous letter, unsolicited by me and without my knowledge, to the Raleigh paper. Did the paper publish his letter? Of course not. Instead, Senator BOSCHWITZ received a note from Editor Claude Sitton which began "Dear Rudy" and signed "Claude."

Senator BOSCHWITZ handed me the letter from Mr. Sitton, whom Senator BOSCHWITZ does not know. I had to explain the "Dear Rudy" routine—that this is Mr. Sitton's way of avoiding the publication of the Boschwitz letter.

But back to the Miami editor, Mr. President. When I saw the reprint of the Miami editorial in my hometown paper, I sent a photostat of it to Senator Ervin, with the following letter which I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, D.C., July 14, 1982.

Hon. SAM J. ERVIN, Jr.,
Post Office Box 69,
Morganton, N.C.

DEAR SENATOR: I enclose a copy of an editorial from The Miami Herald which was gleefully reprinted recently by the Raleigh paper. It may bring back memories of the cheap shots you endured when you opposed the so-called Voting Rights Act back in 1965.

I would be willing to wager that the editor of the Miami paper wouldn't think of publishing your scholarly assessment of this legislation. Instead, he probably would engage in personal invective against you, as he did against John East and me. Still, it's comforting to remember that you understand the Constitution. As for the Miami editor, it's like your friend Lum Garrison said: "He don't know nothing, and he's got that tangled up."

Dot joins me in sending our love to Miss Margaret and you.

Sincerely,

JESSE.

Mr. HELMS. Now, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Miami editorial be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HELMSMANSHIP

(Editorial from the Miami Herald)

Maybe what the U.S. Senate needs is a voting rights act for itself. Too often Senate voting is blocked by willful obstructionists using prolonged "debate" to prevent action supported by a clear majority.

A disquieting example was evident in the Senate's glacial pace on extension of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, which finally was approved 85–8 on Friday afternoon.

Test votes had indicated that the compromise measure supported by President Reagan and by leaders of both parties was backed by nearly 90 Senators. Yet for nine long days Senate action was blocked by the stalling tactics of North Carolina's two right wing Republicans, Jesse Helms and John East.

Missouri Republican Sen. John Danforth correctly termed the filibuster "a verbal sit-in." And Massachusetts Democratic Sen. Edward Kennedy aptly characterized the obstructionists as "a small band of willful opponents of civil rights holding the Voting Rights Act and the nation hostage."

The stalling is a clear violation of the spirit of the U.S. Constitution. That document requires an extraordinary majority for the Senate to act on some items—constitutional amendments, ratification of treaties—but not to pass simple legislation.

Senator Helms, however, apparently has little but contempt for the Constitution. His mean-spirited opposition to protecting that most basic of right—the right to vote—is but one example. He is also active in efforts to usurp the authority of federal courts and to undermine the wall of separation between church and state.

In one sense, however, the lengthy hollow "debate" on the Voting Rights Act may have served a purpose: It focuses a national spotlight on just how extreme and politically isolated Senator Helms is—even with a conservative, Republican-controlled Senate.

This lesson could be important, for Senator Helms has managed to parley a knack for fund-raising among right wing true believers into clout on Capitol Hill. He has used his clout for everything from protecting tobacco price supports to blocking State Department appointments.

In trying to prevent extension of the most successful piece of civil rights legislation the Federal government ever enacted, Senator Helms may have gone too far. He may have damaged his own standing within the Senate.

The situation is not without precedent. Back in the 1950s. Red-baiting Sen. Joe McCarthy eventually went so far that the Eisenhower administration and even his conservative colleagues in the Senate turned against him.

Senator Helms has been appeased and humored far more than he deserves. Both the Reagan administration and his fellow senators have done so. Now that he has been exposed for what he is—a raving extremist opposed even to the basic right to vote—he ought to be cut down to size.

Mr. HELMS. Senator Ervin, upon receiving my letter and the photostat of the Miami editorial as reprinted in the Raleigh News and Observer, sat down and wrote the Miami editor. Senator Ervin's letter is dated July 21, 1982. In a moment, I shall ask that this letter be printed in the RECORD.

But first, Mr. President, I would mention that Senator Ervin wrote to every major newspaper in my State during and before the debate on the so-called Voting Rights Act extension. Since Sam Ervin is a respected constitutional lawyer, one would think that at least one newspaper would publish his assessment—or excerpts from it—on this sorry piece of legislation. After all, these newspapers had plenty of space to publish their attacks on me for questioning the constitutionality of the Voting Rights Act. But the newspapers had no space for Sam Ervin's side of the argument.

Let us examine Senator Ervin's assessment of the legislation. You don't have to agree with Sam Ervin to recognize the duty of the major news media to present both sides of an issue.

Mr. President, this matter is now a fait accompli. Congress has passed the so-called Voting Rights Act extension. It is now law—bad law, but law nonetheless. But even in retrospect, I think my colleagues should examine Senator Ervin's analysis—not only of the legislation itself but the irresponsibility of the major news media as well.

Therefore, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Senator Ervin's letter of July 21 to the editor of the Miami Herald be published in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Miami Herald,
Miami, Fla.

DEAR SIR: I revere the Constitution because it is the most precious instrument of government ever devised by man. It was framed and ratified by the founding fathers to secure to Americans a government of equal laws conforming to its provisions.

I have always championed the freedom which its First Amendment guarantees to the press. This freedom is given to the press to enable it to communicate to the people and their officials the truth necessary to insure that the nation enjoys the system of government the Constitution was ordained to establish.

Hence, this freedom imposes upon the press the duty to be intellectually responsible in exercising its awesome power. To be intellectually responsible, the press must do the research necessary to an understanding of the truth of the opinions it expresses editorially.

I am a life-long Democrat who had the high honor of serving as a United States

Senator from North Carolina for 20 years. My sense of simple justice compels me to assert that the editorial entitled "Helmsmanship" which The Miami Herald recently published reveals a total lack of intellectual responsibility on the part of its writer and publisher.

This editorial charges North Carolina's present Senators, Jesse Helms and John East, who are Republicans, with contempt for the Constitution, and with practicing what it calls "the Red-baiting" tactics of the late Senator Joe McCarthy because they opposed the further extension of the 17 year old Voting Rights Act of 1965.

I know whereof I speak when I say the editorial was intellectually irresponsible. I have made my study of the Constitution a labor of love for 68 years, and was a member of the Senate Committee which, in 1954, investigated McCarthy's tactics and urged the Senate to censure him for them.

The Voting Rights Act rapes the Constitution in many ways. For that reason, I opposed its enactment by Congress in 1965, and cannot ignore unjustified attacks on other Senators for doing the same thing which my oath to support the Constitution required me to do while I was a Senator.

The Voting Rights Act was carefully crafted to apply to North Carolina and a few other carefully selected Southern States to outlaw by devious means their constitutional power to employ literacy tests as qualifications for voting in elections, and at the same time to permit 22 other states outside the South to continue to employ literacy tests for exactly the same purpose.

The Act convicts North Carolina and the other Southern States of denying literate blacks the right to vote in violation of the Fifteenth Amendment by congressional fiat without a judicial trial be a bill of attainder which Article 1, section 9, clause 3 of the Constitution forbids Congress to pass, and by an irrational triggering device and an irrefutable presumption totally abhorrent to the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment.

Although 60 of the 100 counties of North Carolina escape its condemnation, the Act, condemns North Carolina as a state because its irrational triggering device and irrefutable presumption impale the other 40 counties of the state, whose people are North Carolinians and whose public officers are agents of North Carolina.

I discuss the constitutional prohibition of bills of attainder and the due process clause in the reverse order of my statement of them.

The due process clause forbids Congress to create conclusive presumptions, and invalidates all other presumptions if the fact established bears no rational relationship to the conclusion presumed.

The triggering device, which makes the Act operative, embodies the conclusive presumption that a state has wrongfully denied literate blacks the right to register and vote in violation of the Fifteenth Amendment whenever the Attorney General finds that it employed a literacy test as a qualification for voting on a specified date prior to a prescribed presidential election, and the Director of the Census finds that less than 50 percent of the persons of voting age in the state were not registered to vote or did not vote in such presidential election. Originally, the prescribed presidential election was that of 1964. Congress has since extended the Act to subsequent presidential elections.

The triggering device was carefully invented to make the Act apply to Southern States and exclude other states from its coverage because the overwhelming strength of the Democratic Party in the South makes primaries determinate of political results in them, whereas the general or presidential election is determinate of political results in other areas of the nation. For this reason, voting in general or presidential elections in the South is much lighter than in all others.

The triggering device and the conclusive presumption it creates are irrefutable because the findings of the Attorney General and Director of the Census and the irrational conclusion the Act draws from them cannot be questioned, contradicted, explained, or challenged by an aggrieved state in any forum or judicial tribunal on earth.

There is no rational relationship between these findings and the conclusion or presumption the Act draws from them because the findings do not disclose the race of the persons of voting age who were not registered or who did not vote. Hence, the Act condemns a state even if the blacks of voting age residing in it were registered and voted and the non-registered and non-voting persons were white.

When it upheld the Act contrary to the Constitution and many prior sound decisions construing it, the Supreme Court virtually conceded that the Act is bill of attainder and is inconsistent with the Due Process Clause.

It side-stepped the oaths of its members to support these constitutional protections by a specious assertion that states are not persons within the purview of the constitutional prohibition and the due process clause.

In so doing, the Supreme Court ignored its prior definitions of what constitutes a state under the Constitution. Under these definitions, a state is not some kind of a mystical being. It consists of the human beings dwelling within it borders and the public officers through whom they exercise their constitutional powers. The Act applies directly to these human beings and officers, and they are indisputably identifiable as persons under the congressional prohibition of bills of attainder and the due process clause, and the decisions implementing them.

In robbing these human beings and their officers of the protections of the constitutional prohibition of bills of attainder and the due process clause, Congress and the Supreme Court assign them to a status inferior to federal officers, communists, and persons charged with treason and other crimes against the United States. This is so because the Supreme Court has rightly held that federal officers, communists, and persons charged with crime cannot be deprived of these protections.

Four provisions of the Constitution, to wit, Article I, section 2, clause 1; Article II, section 1, clause 2; the Tenth Amendment; and the Seventeenth Amendment, vest in the states and deny to Congress the power to prescribe qualifications for voting in all federal and state elections.

After condemning the selected states in violation of the constitutional prohibition of bills of attainder and the due process clause, the Voting Rights Act suspends the power of the condemned states to exercise their undoubted right under the four constitutional provisions cited to establish literacy tests as qualifications for voting in elections, and simultaneously allows the other 22 states employing literacy tests for that purpose to continue to do so. It further denies a condemned state access to any court on earth to challenge the constitutional validity of any of its provisions.

In addition to suspending the right of the condemned states to exercise the power vested in them by the four constitutional provisions, the Act decrees that they cannot change any election law without going to Washington, hat in hand, and obtaining from a nonconstitutional federal officer, the Attorney General of the United States, or the United States District Court for the District of Columbia advance permission to make a proposed change. Nowadays the Attorney General and some federal judges rule that a condemned state cannot alter a state election district or the mode of holding an election unless the change will enhance the likelihood that blacks rather than whites will be elected to office in it.

These rulings as well as the Act itself are repugnant to the Constitution, which in its present form confers equal constitutional and legal rights on all Americans of all races and forbids any public officer or body to use race as a criterion for the bestowal of any right or the imposition of any liability.

Robbing states and their people and their officers of the protections the congressional prohibition on bills of attainder and the due process clause were designed to give them in the respects set forth above is not the only rape the Voting Rights Act commits on the Constitution. It manifests its flagrant contempt for the most precious instrument of government the world has ever known in these additional ways:

1. In suspending the rights of the condemned Southern States to exercise their power to use literacy tests as qualifications for voting, the Act repudiates the soundest and most courageous Supreme Court decision of all time, Ex Parte Milligan, 4 Wall. 2, 18 L.Ed. 281, which declares and holds that the Constitution is an unvarying law for rulers and people alike; that it covers with a shield of its protection all men under all conditions; and that no notion involving more pernicious consequences was ever invented by the wit of man than any of its provisions can be suspended by government at any time or under circumstances, or in any emergency.

2. In impaling the Southern States it was devised to condemn by denying them access to any forum or judicial tribunal to challenge the validity of any of its provisions, the Act makes a solumn mockery of the Constitution and simple justice.

3. In condemning the selected Southern States by a congressional fiat without a judicial trial, the Act nullifies the due process clause and other provisions of the Constitution which decree that the federal government cannot punish any person for wrongdoing unless his guilt is first established by legal evidence in a fair trial in a federal court.

4. In invoking the Fifteenth Amendment as a pretense for nullifying the provisions of the First and Second Articles and the Tenth and Seventeenth Amendments conferring upon the condemned states the undoubted constitutional power to use literacy tests as qualifications for voting, the Act repudiates the sound constitutional doctrine that the Constitution consists of harmonious provisions of equal dignity and not of self-destructive clauses, and that no provision of the constitution can be construed or applied so as to nullify or circumvent any other provision.

5. In suspending the power of the condemned Southern States to use literacy tests as qualifications for voting and permitting 22 other states in the union to continue to use such tests for the like purpose, the Act treats with contempt the sound constitutional doctrine that all the states of the union possess equal powers under the Constitution and that no provision of the Constitution can be perverted to reduce any of them to a second class status.

6. In requiring a condemned state to obtain advance permission from The Attorney General or the District Court of the District of Columbia to make any change in its election laws, the Act ignores the indisputable truth that states do not have to obtain advance permission from the federal government to legislate, and that there is not a syllable in the entire Constitution conferring upon Congress the arbitrary power to confer any such authority upon any federal official or court.

While it bars access to any court to challenge the constitutional validity of its condemnation of any state or any political subdivision of any state by its irrational triggering device and irrefutable presumption, the Act does contain so-called "bail out" procedures which permit a state or subdivision to bring a subsequent action against the United States in one out of the multitudes of United States District Courts existing in America, namely, the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, and seek in such action a declaratory judgment adjudging that the state or subdivision may once again exercise the suspended powers conferred upon it without limitation by the Constitution.

A very good case can be made for the proposition that these "bail out" procedures deny the aggrieved state or subdivision the fair trial guaranteed to all litigants in federal courts by the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment.

The United States District Court for the District of Columbia sits in Washington, D.C., which is anywhere from 200 to 1000 miles from the aggrieved Southern States and subdivisions. The Act provides that this Court cannot enter a declaratory judgment in its favor unless the plaintiff carries the burden of showing by testimony that during a specified period of time it has not used a literacy test "for the purpose or with the effect of denying or abridging the the right to vote on account of race or color." It does this notwithstanding another federal statute denies the plaintiff compulsory process to obtain the testimony of witnesses living more than 100 miles from Washington.

The Act originally set the specified period of time at 5 years. It is now 17 years, and will be reduced to 10 years after August 5, 1984, by the 1982 amendments extending the 17 year old Voting Rights Act for an additional 25 years.

The irrational and irrefutable presumption of guilt created by the devious triggering device will remain in full effect and thus rob the plaintiff of its suspended constitutional rights until the Act expires—if Congress ever permits it to expire—unless the plaintiff is able to establish its innocence to the satisfaction of the far-removed District Court. Moreover, the decision in Gaston County v. United States, 395 U.S. 285, 23 L.Ed.2d 309, makes it virtually impossible for any southern plaintiff ever to carry the requisite burden of proof because of that Court's assumption that it produced the illiteracy of blacks by its prior discrimination in education.

I have no conscious prejudice against any human being on account of his race. In the words of the eloquent Tennessee poet, Walter Malone, all Americans of all races are my fellow travelers to the tomb and I wish all of them well.

I have always entertained the abiding conviction that all constitutionally qualified Americans of all races have an absolute right to vote, and that it is just as reprehensible to rob any of them of this absolute right as it is to steal their bread.

Notwithstanding this abiding conviction, I maintain that America suffered a tragedy in 1965 when Congress raped the Constitution by enacting the Voting Rights Act and it suffered such tragedy anew in 1982 when Congress, acting with the blessing of President Ronald Reagan, raped the Constitution again by extending the Voting Rights Act for an additional 25 years.

My concern with the Voting Rights Act does not arise out of the circumstance that it enables illiterate Americans, both black and white, to vote in the targeted states or the circumstance that unregistered illiterate Americans, both black and white, residing in such states had had 17 full years to register to vote before the Act was extended for the additional 25 years. I have personally known many highly intelligent persons who were illiterate. While I know that persons who can read and write are better equipped to acquire information than those who cannot, I do not believe that the targeted states or our country will be imperiled by extending the right of voting to illiterates. For this reason, I do not oppose the abolition of literacy tests by constitutional means.

As one who loves America and reveres the Constitution, however, I am gravely concerned by the certainties that good cannot be accomplished by evil constitutional means, and that constitutional government cannot survive in America if its rulers rape the Constitution to satisfy the demands of any politically powerful group.

It was not necessary for Congress to enact the Voting Rights Act to secure to any constitutionally qualified black the right to vote in any election held anywhere in any of the targeted states.

Why do I say this? At the time of the enactment of the Voting Rights Act, literacy among blacks and whites was constantly rising in the targeted states as a consequence of compulsory school attendance laws which had been in force for many years. In four of the targeted states, Georgia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Virginia, discrimination in voting on racial grounds had virtually ended, and such discrimination was rapidly disappearing even in the most rural areas of the other targeted states, Alabama, Louisiana, and Mississippi.

In addition to these considerations, constitutionally valid federal statutes which antedated the Voting Rights Act were sufficient to secure to every constitutionally qualified American, black or white, the right to vote in any election held in the targeted states or elsewhere in the United States, and to subject to severe punishment any election official who willfully denied him that right.

Civil rights activists did not like these existing federal statutes simply because under them allegations of racial discrimination in voting had to be proved by evidence in impartial federal courts rather than by mere political agitation before a politically-minded Congress. Hence, they demanded the Voting Rights Act and Congress heeded their demands.

When an informed lover of the Constitution meditates on the rapes the Voting Rights Act perpetrates on the Constitution, he is tempted to exclaim, "Oh, civil rights, what constitutional wrongs are committed in thy name."

In closing, I wish to make an observation and an offer. One would do well to take with many grains of salt the overblown claim of the civil rights activists that the Voting Rights Act must be credited with the registration of virtually every black who has been registered to vote since its enactment. To be sure, the Voting Rights Act has enabled illiterates, both black and white, residing in the targeted states to vote in violation of the Constitution as it presently exists. But I assert without fear of successful contradiction that the overwhelming majority of all literate blacks who have been registered to vote in the targeted states since the Act came into being in 1965 would have been registered by honest, law-abiding and patriotic election officials if the Act had never existed.

Before the recent 25-year extension of the Act, I wrote with much care after much study a 24-page article entitled "The Truth Respecting The Highly Praised And Constitutionally Devious Voting Rights Act." This article sets forth in detail the many rapes the Voting Rights Act commits on the Constitution. I hereby offer to supply copies of this article to the extent of my limited financial ability to any segments of the press which value truth more highly than intellectual irresponsibility on this subject.

Sincerely yours,

SAM J. ERVIN, JR.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

BALANCED BUDGET—TAX LIMITATION CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will resume consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 58, which the clerk will state by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution (S.J. Res. 58) proposing an amendment to the Constitution altering Federal fiscal decisionmaking procedures.

The Senate resumed consideration of the joint resolution (S.J. Res. 58).

AMENDMENT NO. 1927

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I believe that the Senator from New York (Mr. MOYNIHAN) has an amendment he wishes to offer, 1927, and there is 30 minutes to the side?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment is pending. Who yields time?

Mr. THURMOND. He is the author of the amendment, so he would control the time on his side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I thank my distinguished friend and our President from South Carolina.

Mr. President, I yield myself 15 minutes on the amendment.

I should like to begin by referring to an exchange between myself and the distinguished chairman of the Budget Committee, the Senator from New Mexico, which took place yesterday afternoon. I had asked him, did he not think that the amendment before us was one filled with words referring to complicated economic ideas, the exact meaning of which is in dispute and in flux. Their meanings change from time to time, and the choice made by Government agencies as to which particular formulation to use is always and of necessity arbitrary. They make their best judgment—accepting one, rejecting others—and, then they change their judgment with some regularity.

That being the case, it seemed to me, and I so stated to the Senator from New Mexico, that we could not fail to have this matter end up in the courts continuously—inasmuch as only they can interpret and settle disputed judgments as to what the terms of the Constitution mean.

Here is a partial statement from the Senator from New Mexico. He says:

> But it is the understanding of the Senator from New Mexico that what Congress intends is that the Supreme Court certainly would interpret to see whether we have faithfully implemented this amendment. When it comes to substituting the court's interpretation for ours on a definition, or what is a fiscal year, or what are receipts, and what is the content of the statement, then I believe that it would be chaos for this country if those kinds of issues end up being determined regularly by any court. I am confident that is not going to happen.

Mr. President, I say to you and I say in the company of distinguished Members of this body, the second most senior Member, our beloved former chairman of the Finance Committee, and the minority whip: Mr. DOMENICI's confidence is unfounded. Chaos will happen. There is no way that we can define these terms and accordingly no way that we can avoid having the courts define them for us. The courts have had this function from the beginning of the Republic. They are not likely at this moment to renounce it.

I would like to remind this body, Mr. President—and not for purposes of pantomime but in dead earnest about the Constitution of the United States—this is not a tax bill. This is not a tariff measure. This is not a proposal to name a post office. This is a proposal to amend the Constitution—something we have done but 26 times in two centuries, and 10 of those times within the next 2 years of the enactment of the Constitution.

The resolution before us has the extraordinary proposition that the receipts of the Federal Government shall not increase more than the rate of increase in national income in the last calendar year ending before such fiscal year.

Mr. DOMENICI amended slightly the calendar year-fiscal year arrangements, but left intact the term "national income."

Now, what is "national income," Mr. President? There is a widespread usage in undergraduate economics courses which begins by asking this simple question: If a man marries his housekeeper, does the national income not thereby decline?

It does. He has previously been paying her. He ceases to do so as they become husband and wife. Income disappears. National income goes down, although national activity—and the productiveness of the housewife cum housekeeper—has not changed.

If a pair of housewives choose to clean each other's house for equivalent pay, the national income goes up by their respective salaries, although there is no increase in the national activity.

The much respected professor and Nobel laureate in economic science, Paul Samuelson, says in the eighth edition of his book classic text "Economics":

> What is national income? It is the loose name we give to the money measure of the overall annual flow of goods and services in an economy. Often, instead of it, we use the almost equivalent term "national product" or "net national product" or a slightly different concept of "gross national product."

Paul Samuelson refers to four terms in one sentence to convey what national income might be.

Mr. LONG. Would the Senator mind repeating that? I just want to be sure I get that straight.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Of course. A man who served 20 years in the Finance Committee might well have difficulty getting it straight by one reading. Samuelson says:

> What is national income? It is the loose term we give to the money measure of the overall annual flow of goods and services in an economy. Often, instead of it, we use the almost equivalent term "national product" or "net national product" or a slightly different concept of "gross national product."

But I want to spare the senior Senator from Louisiana any ambiguity in these matters. I will read the official Commerce definition so he will not have any further difficulty. This is from a 1980 Supplement to Economic Indicators.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to put the whole of this text into the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

1980 SUPPLEMENT TO ECONOMIC INDICATORS

The constant dollar gross domestic product of nonfinancial corporation is the value expressed in 1972 prices.

The current dollar cost and profit per unit of output in the current dollar product divided by the constant dollar product.

Relation to other series

The nonfinancial corporation group is comparable to the similarly named sector of the flow of funds accounts of the Federal Reserve Board. It is also consistent with the net and gross stocks of reproducible fixed capital and inventories produced by BEA.

This conceptual consistency permits a wide range of analyses of corporate production, capital usage, and financing.

NATIONAL INCOME

Description of series

National Income is the aggregate of earnings by labor and property which arise in the current production of goods and services by the Nation's economy. It is the sum of five major items: (1) compensation of employees; (2) proprietors' income; (3) rental income of persons; (4) net interest; and (5) corporate profits.

Compensation of employees is the sum of wages, salaries, and supplements to wages and salaries such as employer contributions to social insurance funds and for employee benefit plans.

Proprietors' income with inventory valuation and capital consumption allowances measures the monetary earnings and income in kind of sole proprietorships and partnerships, including the independent professionals, and producers' cooperatives, exclusive of capital gains or losses on inventory or other asset holdings. Interest and dividend income received by proprietors', and rental income received by persons who are not primarily engaged in the real estate business are excluded. The farm proprietors income shown here excludes salaries paid to corporate officers which are included in farm operators' net income including adjustment for inventory changes, as shown in the section on Farm Income. The inventory valuation and capital consumption adjustments are described below.

Rental income of persons with capital consumption adjustment consists of (1) monetary income to persons from rental of real property except the income of persons primarily engaged in the real estate business, (2) imputed net rental value of owner occupants of nonfarm dwellings, and (3) royalties received from patents, copyrights, and rights to natural resources.

Net interest measures the excess of interest payments of the domestic business system over its interest receipts, plus net interest received from abroad. Interest paid by consumers and by government, including government enterprises, is not added into this computation because it is not treated as a factor cost of production. Net interest can also be defined as interest received by the personal sector less interest paid by consumers plus net interest received by government. In addition to monetary interest flows, net interest includes imputed interest arising in connection with the operation of financial intermediaries. A portion of imputed interest is equal to the value of financial services received by persons without explicit payment; the remainder represents property income received by life insurance companies and noninsured pension funds less profit of life insurance companies. Imputed interest is also earned on individuals' pension and life insurance reserves.

Corporate profits with inventory valuation and capital consumption allowance is the earnings of corporations organized for profit and of mutual financial institutions which accrue to residents of this Nation measured before Federal and State profit taxes, but without deduction of depletion charges and exclusive of capital gains and losses. (For a more extended discussion, see section on Corporate Profits.)

Corporate inventory valuation adjustment measures the excess of the value of the change in the physical volume of corporate inventories (valued at average prices during the period) over the change in terms of book values. This adjustment is made to profits to remove the inventory profit or loss that occurs in business accounting when the book cost of inventories differs from the current replacement cost. Valuation in current prices of the cost of inventories used puts sales and costs on a consistent basis, and is necessary to derive measures of national output in current prices.

Capital consumption adjustment is the tax return based capital consumption allowances less capital consumption allowances that are based on estimates of economic service lives, straight-line depreciation, and replacement cost. It corrects reported book profits for the effects of the miscellaneous mixture of accounting techniques valued at historical cost by converting them to a consistent accounting basis valued at current replacement cost.

Statistical procedures

The methods of estimating national income are described in detail in Readings in Concepts and Methods of National Income Statistics, Business Statistics, Gross National Product Data Improvement Project Report, and the Input-Output article in the February 1979 Survey of Current Business. Personal income and personal outlays are described in an article in the November 1979 Survey.

Compensation of employees—reliable data are available each year from the unemployment insurance system, with current monthly estimates resting chiefly on employer reports on employment and earnings to the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

Proprietors' income is estimated from income tax returns to the Internal Revenue Service with current quarterly data derived from analysis of trends in noncorporate as well as corporate sales and corporate profits in individual industries.

Rental income of persons is estimated from a variety of Census Bureau, Internal Revenue Service, and other data on rents paid and on the distribution of property ownership and rental income between persons and business.

Net interest is estimated from reports on interest and debt to the Internal Revenue Service, Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, and other agencies.

Seasonally unadjusted estimates are not available for the income components of the national accounts, with the exception of corporation profits. This is due to the fact that the basic data source does not provide a completely unadjusted monthly series for wages and salaries and because in the case of proprietors' income and net interest actual income data are lacking altogether on a quarterly basis.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. But so the Senator will understand, I read:

NATIONAL INCOME

Description of series

National Income is the aggregate of earnings by labor and property which arise in the current production of goods and services by the Nation's economy. It is the sum of five major items: (1) compensation of employees; (2) proprietors' income; (3) rental income of persons; (4) net interest; and (5) corporate profits.

Compensation of employees is the sum of wages, salaries, and supplements to wages and salaries such as employer contributions to social insurance funds and for employee benefit plans.

Proprietors' income with inventory valuation and capital consumption allowances measures the monetary earnings and income in kind of sole proprietorships and partnerships, including the independent professionals, and producers' cooperatives, exclusive of capital gains or losses on inventory or other asset holdings. Interest and dividend income received by proprietors' . . .

The Senator gets the point. You follow it. It is complicated. It goes on for many more pages.

Now, here are two important facts, just to get an idea of how stable the very category "national income" really is.

Before the 1980 revision, the earnings of domestic corporations arising from rents, royalties, and services abroad were not included in the national income. They are now, and they increase national income by $1.6 billion in 1972 and $3.2 billion in 1977. They summarily were out, and they summarily are now in.

Before 1980, insurance payments resulting from accidental damage to fixed business capital were not included in corporate income, part of national income. They are now so included. That added $1.6 billion to corporate profits and three-tenths of $1 billion to nonfarm proprietors.

From the view of the Constitution, at least, these are arbitrary questions which can arbitrarily be decided and have to be so decided.

I should like to discuss a simple definition. This is simple. I have said that we are putting algebra into the constitution. This is a statement of the algebraic terms that have to be involved in order to deal with the provisions of this resolution.

National income is a function—this is the only algebraic phrase we have here. National income equals gross national product, minus depreciation—technically, capital consumption allowances—minus indirect taxes. You have to take out indirect taxes, because you have taken indirect taxes out. According to the Commerce Department definition of national income. They have to come out, just as depreciation comes out.

A defined in this amendment, national receipts, must not grow greater than the change in national income. Y is income. Y-1 is income of the previous year. Price changes: P with a dot means the change in ratio. P is the number at a given time.

Allowed receipts under this amendment would be personal income for the previous year times the tax rate for the previous year, plus corporate income for the previous year, times the tax rate for the previous year, times the inverse of 1 plus the personal income for the present year, minus personal income for the previous year, corporate income for the present year, minus income for the previous year, and inverse of income for the previous year.

That is the third lesson in algebraic functions.

Yet, every one of these items is subject to argument about of what it does, in fact, consist.

Do I have to tell the former chairman of the Committee on Finance that what a tax actually is, is repeatedly litigated in courts?

You write it as clearly as you can, and yet it goes to court. Tax lawyers take it to court saying, that is not what the law meant.

These are aggregates. Any economist will tell you, the best aggregates come in at perhap plus or minus $15 billion. OK, would you like to estimate what the tax rate for the American economy is? How many tax rates are there? Would you imagine there could be fewer than 50,000 tax rates? No.

At my last recollection, we had 1,300 counties and about 50,000 towns and villages, and every one of them has a tax rate, or rather, different rates for everything: water, lighting, lands, school taxes, property taxes. There are excise taxes. There are income taxes.

There are probably 100,000 tax rates in the United States. To apply this amendment to the Constitution, they all will have to be reduced to one number, called here T, unless you want to make it a function of 100,000 numbers. But you will have forgotten 1,500, you may be sure. And you will be mistaken about 1,400. And by the time you get your list together, 20,000 will have changed. It will not work.

One of the great blessings of Simon Kuznets, who developed the whole concept of gross national product at the League of Nations in the 1930's, was that he taught us to think in these terms. They are very new. Gross national product was not measured in this country on a formal basis until the late 1940's. We began to track the unemployment rate on a shadow basis also in the 1940's. We had numbers in 1946, and we began publishing them in 1947. They are very new.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KASTEN). The Senator's 15 minutes have expired.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

We have given to them a concreteness which they do not truly merit and which those who put them together never claimed for them.

I served as Assistant Secretary of Labor under President Kennedy and President Johnson. I was nominally in charge of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, which is the oldest such organization in the world. It was established in 1887, in response to the demand of the labor movement that Government should measure wages and should measure the cost of living, so that employees could bargain against actual living costs, things such as how much it takes to raise a family.

Today, we know how porous these statistics are. We, and the BLS, know that the best you can do with them is give an arbitrary definition and then denote how that number rises or falls.

The unemployment rate is a very questionable rate, and there have been long debates about it. There is not a year that the American Economic Association, at its regular meetings, does not hold a panel on unemployment data. Long papers are delivered on specific questions, with respectable arguments on both sides. The economists will say that if you give it a certain arbitrary definition, you will learn something from the rise and fall of these consequent numbers. But never persuade yourself that you actually know precisely how many people live in the United States, precisely how many people are at work, precisely what the tax rate is, precisely what the income is, precisely what corporate profits were.

Ask any statistician, and he will speak only in terms of degrees of probability, and there are arguments there too.

What will be the result of enshrining "national income" rates in the Constitution? Decisions in Congress will be challenged. They will go to court. The courts will decide, and the result will be what the Senator from New Mexico said: chaos.

With what degree of responsibility do we bring chaos to the most stable political system in the world? We are frittering away the stability of the American Republic. We are doing it for a transparent motive to conceal the fact that the ladies and gentleman on the other side of the aisle have brought us the highest deficits in the history of the Nation, having proclaimed that they would bring us none at all.

In the morning papers the day after we begin serious debate on forcing the Government to stick to its rules, we are told that the President has announced he will not be bound by the budget resolution with respect to military spending. Read the New York Times this morning. The White House knows what the budget resolution says, but it is not going to affect its decisions. When he does that—today—you have a political argument and perhaps an argument over the interpretation of the law. He does that in 6 years' time, and he will be in gross violation of the Constitution and subject, I do not doubt, to impeachment. That will be a pretty spectacle, perhaps a pleasure—if we begin impeaching Presidents over line items in the budget.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time and thank my colleagues for the courtesy in listening to what is scarcely enlightening. I do not say anything they do not know. But it is a sad commentary that what is so obvious so clearly will not be accepted in this body.

I do not even propose to ask for the yeas and nays on a matter of this kind. Let this be on the conscience of the Senate, not on its record. I would be ashamed to see what the record would show.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I now look forward to an answer to questions which I believe I have reasonably propounded and I hope I will learn I was misinformed or made a misjudgment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina is recognized.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I believe the distinguished Senator from New York thinks he is back at Harvard teaching again. He has brought forth here a complicated formula which would be entirely inappropriate to place in a constitutional amendment, but it is very interesting to hear him make such a distinguished presentation anyway.

Mr. President, we oppose this amendment for two reasons:

First, the amendment is not suitable for a constitutional amendment and is a complicated formula that probably only a few economists understand. This amendment, if passed by Congress, must be ratified by three-fourths of the States. The people of this country will not ratify such a complex amendment and one that they may not easily understand.

Second, Senate Joint Resolution 58 is simple, straightforward, and flexible enough to permit national incomes to be defined by Congress each year.

We think this amendment is entirely inappropriate to be added to a constitutional amendment and, therefore, we oppose it.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THURMOND addressed the Chair.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I am sorry. I did not hear the last statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on this amendment.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold?

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I will withhold for a moment.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I said earlier I would not ask for the yeas and nays. It is early in the day. I was not going to ask for the yeas and nays. A voice vote would do.

Mr. THURMOND. I wish to ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment. I will move to table the amendment.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Fine. By all means. We can stay here for a long time.

Mr. THURMOND. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield?

Mr. THURMOND. I am pleased to yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from South Carolina a question.

The Senator from South Carolina said that the proposed amendment is too complex to be in the Constitution and that few would understand it. I have been endeavoring to understand the report of the committee. On page 48 it uses an algebraic formula, also on page 49 and also on page 50.

In order to understand a bill that has been reported, it is necessary to understand the report that describes it. Could the Senator interpret the algebraic formula there that appears at the bottom of page 48 in the committee report?

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, that is a part of the committee report. We did not include any formulas in the amendment. We do not intend to. We think that it would be a mistake to do so.

Mr. CRANSTON. I understand that, but I am just asking if the Senator could explain the formula that appears on page 48. I took algebra in high school. I have not had much use for it since, although on occasion I have been compelled to try to understand a formula. But in order to understand the report and the amendment reported by the committee, I wish to understand and make sure that I understand correctly the algebraic formula that appears on page 48 of the committee report.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, with regard to that, I wish to say that that portion of the report was prepared by the staff and I think it is self-explanatory. It provides:

> The rate of increase in statement receipts, r, may be expressed symbolically as

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THURMOND. Where R(y) represents the statement, the formula here tells what it does.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Why does not the Senator tell us what it does?

Mr. THURMOND. The formula in the Senator's amendment does not even tell what it is.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. It does.

Mr. THURMOND. Where R(y) represents the statement receipts for the yth fiscal year and R(y-1) represents the statement receipts for the preceding or y-1th fiscal year.

The rate of increase in national income, n, may be expressed symbolically as—

In other words, the report explains clearly what the formula is.

But, Mr. President, it is entirely inappropriate to put any kind of a formula in this constitutional amendment. We have a very simple constitutional amendment. It can be understood by anyone.

Mr. President, as soon as those who care to talk talk I intend to move to table the amendment.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I yield myself 2 minutes to take rather firm exception, if I may, to my friend from South Carolina.

He said my amendment does not say what is involved.

If the Senator will look at page 2—may I ask the Senator to look at page 2—there is a very precise statement of the meaning of the terms and, as I state, apart from the first statement on that blackboard, there is no algebraic function whatever in this amendment. There is simply a statement of terms.

As the distinguished Senator from California has observed, there is right here on pages 48, 49, and 50 of the report three actual algebraic functions. One cannot explain this constitutional amendment without referring to algebraic functions in the report. That is because the report is full of terms which in actual practice are to be derived only by algebraic functions which involve arbitrary choices and which will be decided in the courts. And which will result in chaos.

Those are the precise words of the Senator from New Mexico just yesterday.

Trying to avoid what is going on is a very interesting tactic. One hears from the other side that is too complicated for people to understand. It happens to be high school algebra. And, second, the whole exercise is based upon the degrading, demeaning, and unworthy thought that the people of the United States are not clever enough to see through what is going on. They are in fact more than sufficiently so. At least, they are in the State of New York.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I simply wish to say that speaking about the report, if the Senator wants it stated simply, it says to look at the receipts at the beginning of the last fiscal year and then at the end and if it were 10 at the beginning and 12 at the end, there is an increase of 2, or 20 percent.

At any rate, as I say, we have no formulas in this amendment, and we do not believe it appropriate to include any formulas in the amendment.

I yield to the distinguished Senator from Arizona.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from New York has brought to us an amendment that certainly deserves consideration as it is getting and receiving today, but he mentions, and I cannot remember his exact words, but soemthing to the effect that the public knows what is going on. Indeed, they do know what has gone on in this body over at least the 6 years I have been here and prior to that. They know what is going on with this administration submitting the highest deficit in history. They know what has gone on in the past administration with the same type of deficit expenditures and budgets that have been submitted.

Always proclaiming we are going to balance the budget, there is not anyone in this body who has not voted for deficit dollars, whether you are on the right, the left, the middle, moderate, or what have you, and I think the public does know what is going on, and I think they know we have not balanced the budget except once in the last 21 years.

I think the public understands, as we understand, and it is difficult, I am sure it is difficult, for the Senator from New York, as it is for me, to stand on this floor and make public admission that we cannot balance the budget because, in fact, we cannot. We have not been able to do it. We have not been able to do it in the 6 years the Senator from New York and the Senator from Arizona have been here, and I dare say many other Senators who have been here before.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I served in an administration that balanced the budget. It can be done. All you have to do is do it.

Mr. DECONCINI. I would like to suggest to the Senator from New York there has not been anyone who has done it, and for that reason——

Mr. MOYNIHAN. President Lyndon Johnson balanced the budget in his last year in office.

Mr. DECONCINI (continuing). It is necessary for us to move in a very determined manner, in my judgment, and enact a constitutional amendment.

Now, relative to the amendment, Mr. President, while I am always impressed by the excellent presentation and the intellectual capacity of my good friend from New York, I respectfully suggest that the substance of the present amendment is better left for implementing legislation by Congress rather than putting it in, attempting to put it into, a constitutional amendment.

Further I would suggest that the present amendment is better served by retaining its flexibility. If there is one general obligation under this amendment, it is to insure that receipts do not regularly increase at a faster rate than the economy itself.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Faster than national income.

Mr. DECONCINI. Than the national income itself because, as the report will point out, the national income—I would also suggest that the amendment before us may be confused in equating the general term "national income" in the amendment with a specific accounting term of national income.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DECONCINI. I would be glad to yield.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. The amendment does say "national income."

Mr. DECONCINI. That is correct.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. You are saying I have confused the general term "national income" with an accounting term? Would the Senator tell us what the term does mean?

Mr. DECONCINI. Well, as the Senator from New York pointed out earlier in a quiet discussion near his desk, it is very difficult to determine what the national income is, granted. Nobody here can stand up with certainty and say this is the only formula to determine the national income.

My point is that this constitutional amendment is not a panacea. It is not a problem solver for all of our problems regarding overexpenditures by our Federal Government, both legislative and executive. But I dare say it is simple enough to bring home a point and to require Congresses in the future, once it is approved by the States, that they must live within their income and their receipts and expenditures, and that only under extreme emergencies and a three-fifths vote or a vote of the constitutional majority can this be altered.

Now to me, Mr. President, this is very important. We are not here to debate every word, to dot every "i" and cross every "t" in an attempt to make a perfect amendment that would satisfy the Senator from New York, the Senator from Arizona, the Senator from California, the Senator from Louisiana, and others, because this body is deliberate, it must spend time in an attempt to formulate a consensus. It must attempt to have the input of every Senator as he sees the best way to balance the budget.

This amendment represents that, and it is not the exact amendment that I would like to see. As a matter of fact, the distinguished former chairman of the Committee on Finance had an opportunity some years ago when I had an amendment on the floor to balance the budget by automatically raising the income tax, in his words it was something that we need a constitutional amendment on, but not the way the Senator from Arizona was proposing it at that particular time, and I respected that.

That is why I believe that now to attempt to implant in the amendment the formula offered by the Senator from New York is not in the best interests of implementing a constitutional amendment that will be understood and one that will certainly deliver a message to the people of this great Nation that finally Congress is going to stop the excesses that have prevailed in this body for far too many years.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I yield myself 2 minutes, and I ask my friend from Arizona if he would listen to me. First of all, we know very well this provision is not going to be included in the amendment. But we say to the Senator that, when he uses the term "national income"—that is the term the Senator is using, I did not make that up—that is the term of the Department of Commerce.

You say it is very difficult to determine national income. You have rarely said a more accurate statement on the floor of this Chamber, and you are not known for fuzziness in pronouncements. It is not only very difficult. It is, of necessity, arbitrary.

Yesterday a group of more than 170 of the most distinguished economists in our country issued a statement pleading with us not to do this, saying it cannot be done, you cannot do this in the Constitution. You can do it by statute, yes.

They issued a series of eight points. I will read No. 4:

4. Precise definitions of "expenditures," "revenues," "deficit," "national income" and related concepts are not included in the present draft amendment. Thus, the Amendment would need to contain (or the Courts would need to supply) such definitions. The relevance of any particular set of precise definitions changes materially over time. The Constitution cannot be periodically amended or reinterpreted to keep up with changing fiscal concepts and practices.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed the whole of the economists' statement and their names in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ECONOMISTS' OPEN LETTER OPPOSING A CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT REQUIRING BALANCED FEDERAL BUDGETS AND LIMITING FEDERAL TAX RECEIPTS

The undersigned professional economists, who hold a variety of views regarding national economic policies, nevertheless are united in opposing enactment of the proposed Constitutional Amendment embodied in Senate Joint Resolution 58 and House Joint Resolution 350. Our reasons are given below. We are not all equally impressed by each of these reasons; and some of us have still other reasons for opposing the Amendment. But we are unanimous in our conviction that such an amendment is not in the national interest.

1. Whether a given expenditure budget and set of tax provisions will produce a deficit or a surplus depends to an important degree on the state of the economy over a period that will end considerably more than a year from the time when appropriations and tax laws are enacted. This future state of the economy will be significantly influenced by the budget itself; but it also depends on many other events and circumstances that cannot be foreseen. Achieving the purpose of the proposed Amendment—i.e., avoiding deficits—thus implies an impossible accuracy in economic forecasting. Of course, Congress could deliberately evade the purpose of the Amendment by making economic assumptions that its members knew or suspected were unlikely to be realized. Such devious procedures clearly should not be encouraged by an unworkable Constitutional provision.

2. Even if Congress were able accurately to foresee the state of the economy, and able accurately to predict the revenues and expenditures associated with any economic forecast and any set of tax laws and appropriations, it is bad public policy to enact a budget that would be balanced in a fiscal year foreseen to be characterized by excessive unemployment and deficient sales, production, and incomes. Such a balanced budget could, in those circumstances, itself markedly increase unemployment and further depress production and incomes.

3. Similarly, if the fiscal year for which the budget and tax rates were being determined were expected to be a year of strong demand, high production and employment, and rising inflation, the provision of the proposed Amendment that would limit the percentage rise in tax revenues to the previous year's percentage increase in national income could require tax rate reductions that would further increase demand and further fuel inflation, leaving tight money and high interest rates as the principal weapons for attempting to stabilize demand and prices.

4. Precise definitions of "expenditures," "revenues," "deficit," "national income" and related concepts are not included in the present draft amendment. Thus, the Amendment would need to contain (or the Courts would need to supply) such definitions. The relevance of any particular set of precise definitions changes materially over time. The Constitution cannot be periodically amended or reinterpreted to keep up with changing fiscal concepts and practices.

5. Constitutional limits on the use of budgetary policy for purposes of economic stabilization could in many cases be evaded by the use of regulatory policies or tax differentials designed to achieve the same ends. Regulatory provisions are normally far less efficient than economic incentives, and regulations or tax differentials seriously distort private economic choices. Inventing new forms of "off-budget" expenditures or financing would be another easy but undesirable means to frustrate the intention of the Amendment.

6. Interpretation of the Constitution—including this Amendment, if approved—is a function of the judiciary. We believe it unwise to involve the courts in the interpretation of economic theory and economic policy. It often takes years to develop a judicial construction sufficiently thorough to comprehend the full range of issues, arguments, and conflicts inherent in a new legal situation. Moreover, it often takes years to adjudicate the cases that arise to test the scope and application of a new legal concept. To be effective, economic policy must be flexible, and respond to changing economic conditions, institutions, and relationships; bringing the courts into the policy process would severely undermine the necessary flexibility.

7. The proposed Amendment demands a three-fifths vote of the full membership of each House of Congress in order to permit a Federal deficit under any circumstances other than a formal declaration of war. A special majority would also be needed to raise tax revenues by more than the previous year's increase in National Income (which might be a decrease). In a national emergency other than war, a prohibition of deficits or tax increases might make it impossible adequately to protect the national interest. A national-security emergency does not always (or, in recent history, even generally) involve a formal declaration of war; and a threat to national security may not always be so obvious that three-fifths of the members of each House will perceive it and actually vote that it exists. Further, acknowledgement of such a threat by so explicit an action might be highly inappropriate or even dangerous. The debate and confusion involved in such a major and unprecedented policy decision could preclude immediate response to an imminent danger.

8. Most of us agree that Federal budget deficits can be and often have been incurred unwisely—at the wrong times, or in the wrong amounts. However, we do not believe that the quality of our economic policies will be improved by amending the Constitution. Rather, they will be improved only through better and wider public understanding of the economic elements in national policy, and by electing public officials who are competent, responsible, and responsive to the will of the elaborate.

The motivation for Congress' sudden interest in amending the Constitution to prohibit deficits appears mainly to reflect frustrations associated with its inability to enact a fiscal-year 1983 budget that would be balanced in a year that it officially predicts will be marked by vigorous economic recovery. As the Washington Post noted editorially on June 21, "It is grotesque for senators and a president who cannot get their current deficit under $100 billion to support, piously, constitutional language putting it at zero."

The undersigned are all professional economists, engaged in research, teaching, consulting, or staff capacities. We sign this statement as individuals; our institutional affiliations are provided only for purposes of identification, with no implication that we represent anyone's views other than our own.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I thank the Chair.

I say to this body that the men and women whose profession is economics plead with us "Don't ask it to do more than it can do."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. CRANSTON. May I have some time?

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. DECONCINI. I just want to point out that this country, unfortunately, and Congress have not done well by following the advice of many of the experts that the Senator from New York has just put into the RECORD here. As a matter of fact, the supply-side economics and many of the other programs that have been tried, in my opinion, have not worked well. We might do better to use commonsense, and commonsense tells this Senator from Arizona that it is high time we balanced the budget, notwithstanding the intellectual recommendations, well-intended recommendations. of economists that the Senator from New York cited.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DECONCINI. I will yield in just a moment. I believe, Mr. President, it is time we tell the American public there is some commonsense right here on the floor of this Senate, and today, tomorrow, and up until Wednesday we are going to debate these amendments, and they will all be given serious consideration. Some may be adopted or accepted. But the time is upon us, the time is here. There is going to be no avoiding it, and it is long overdue for commonsense to prevail.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one question?

Mr. DECONCINI I yield the floor.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I know in a sense of fairness the Senator would want me to ask it.

Mr. DECONCINI. I yield the floor.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Let me ask a question: Is the Senator under the misapprehension that the economists who wrote this paper yesterday are against a balanced budget? They are as much for as against. They made no pronouncement as such on that subject. They believe the economy has to be balanced over time. But what they say is that you cannot use the Constitution to define the terms.

Mr. DECONCINI. If the Senator will yield, where are these great economists' solutions to this problem? Why have they not offered an amendment that would help us come to a conclusion? They have not because they do not have one. We are here today debating whether or not it is necessary to have one, and I am taking the position——

Mr. MOYNIHAN. The debate is over whether you can do this through an amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on that point?

Mr. DECONCINI. I would be happy to yield.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, how does the time stand?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York has 4½ minutes remaining and the Senator from South Carolina has 16½ minutes remaining.

Who yields time?

Mr. HATCH. I thank the Senator for yielding to me. I am convinced that if you asked every one of the 535 Members of Congress if they believed in a balanced budget, each one of us would say, "Why, we certainly do!" But that is not the way we vote.

I am also certain that if you asked every economist in this country if they believed in a balanced budget, almost every one of them would say, "You bet; we certainly do!" Even Lord Keynes would agree—in fact, he even believed that during times of prosperity there ought to be surpluses.

The precise concept of national income is intended to remain subject to the discretion of the Congress. Currently reported concepts include gross national product, net national product, national income, personal income, disposable personal income, and gross domestic product. Any of these may be chosen, as might some new measure determined by Congress.

For the purposes of the amendment, there is no requirement that the concept of national income, its definition, or its computational procedures remain immutable through time. If some new concept, definition, or computational method is adopted, continuing compliance requires only that there be a transitional period during which the new concept be phased in so as not to undermine the plain purposes of section 2 of the amendment.

I suggest that everyone wants a balanced budget. The important question is: How are we going to get there? Shall we continue doing as we are now and only balance the budget once in the next 23 years? Or are we going to require Congress to stand up and face the issues and make the necessary choices between competing programs, funding only those programs that are the most important and beneficial to the people of the United States. The amendment takes the second option, the option to solve the problem rather than avoid the issue.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HATCH. Yes.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I know how deeply he is concerned in this matter. But reading from page 49 of the committee report, which begins with an algebraic formula, he has read us the paragraph that suggests that the Congress is actually asking the American peole to accept an amendment to the Constitution in which there is a key phrase called national income. An absolutely key phrase in section 2. The report states that there are six possible definitions of this phrase.

Now, how can my friend from Utah say this? Six possible definitions. How could that not end up in court?

Mr. HATCH. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I am asking a question.

Mr. HATCH. I think it is important to point out that "national income" in the amendment is in lowercase. In the amendment, national income is not used as an accounting term.

As I said earlier, Congress may choose any form of national income it wishes. To lock in one computational method in derogation of all others should not be done in a constitutional amendment. That should be done in a statute.

Let us assume that the computation that the Senator from New York suggests is the best computation. There must be implementing legislation under this amendment. At that time the Senator will have every right to do everything he can to put his particular computational approach into that implementing legislation.

It is far more appropriate to place a computation in a statute rather than locking somebody's formulation, into the Constitution. The Constitution is not the place for economic computations.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Could I ask the Senator from Utah what he meant when he said the term "national income" is in lowercase?

Mr. HATCH. It means that we are not citing that as an accounting term within the amendment itself. It means precisely what it says on page 49 of the committee report—that almost any definition that the Congress chooses to use may be used.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from New York has expired.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. May I ask the Chair: I was under the impression I was asking questions of the Senator from Utah and that he was yielding on his time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah has no time.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I thought the Senator was yielded time from the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. CRANSTON. The Senator from Arizona can yield time on the bill to the Senator from New York.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, how much time is remaining to the Senator from South Carolina?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina has 14¾ minutes remaining.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I will be glad to yield time on the bill if the Senator wants to keep his time. How much time does the Senator want?

Mr. CRANSTON. Does the Senator from South Carolina intend to use his 14 minutes? Could he yield any part of that to us since we were asking questions?

Mr. THURMOND. How much time does the Senator want?

Mr. CRANSTON. I would like 4 minutes and Senator MOYNIHAN would like 2 minutes.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from New York and 4 minutes to the Senator from California.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California is recognized.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I urge the Senate to consider thoughtfully the issues being raised by the Senator from New York in his proposal to define, as accurately as possible, national income by means of an algebraic formula.

Because, in fact and practice, that is how national income generally is defined by the majority of members of the economic profession—that body of social scientists to whom the Senate would turn over the fortunes of the Nation by means of Senate Joint Resolution 58.

And I note again that the committee felt it necessary to use algebraic formulas to explain the amendment, although I also note that the committee does not find it easy to explain those algebraic formulas. If that is the case, who are we ever going to find to explain or understand this amendment? The amendment pending, without the amendment of the Senator from New York, would lead to incredible confusion and court action, involving the courts in the budget process in ways very deleterious to the separation and balance of powers upon which our liberties rest.

Senate Joint Resolution 58 assumes that economic forecasts are accurate and economic measurements are exact. Economic assumptions are major factors in determining whether a budget statement is balance.

The assumptions could prove wrong. The administration did not expect inflation to fall so quickly this year until, unexpectedly, it skyrocketed upward last month.

The administration did not expect interest rates to remain so persistently high. Such failures of predictability in the economy translate into unpredictability of receipts and outlays.

The effects of incorrect economic assumptions can be enormous.

The resolution ties Federal revenues to national income. During inflationary times Government revenues rise faster than incomes. This basic economic fact would violate the balanced budget amendment.

There is more involved than economic forecasting of the future.

Equally difficult is economic measurement of the past.

The resolution would limit tax increases to previous year's increases in national income.

There are several measurements of national income, but the resolution does not specify which measurement shall be used.

The term "national income" is left undefined.

And that is the point of the amendment of the Senator from New York. To define "national income."

The amendment raises seriously the issue of whether we can adequately define national income and whether we ought to even attempt to do so in the Constitution.

In my view, the Constitution is no place for tying our well-being of the Nation to an economic formula devised by social scientists who do not always know what they are talking about. Sometimes economists make sense and sometimes they turn out to be wrong. They do not claim infallibility, yet Senate Joint Resolution 58 and its sponsors naively ask that economists be infallible predictors and be skilled determinists of the future. That kind of wisdom is not given to mankind.

The point of all this is that "national income" really has no fixed definition nor can it have a fixed definition.

I have no doubt but that in the future better, more accurate and more telling definitions will be put forward for use in the profession of economics and econometrics.

At best, the authors of the amendment have turned over the fiscal policy of the Federal Government to the economics profession which may or may not progress in knowledge and wisdom.

I am confident, for example, that the chief sponsors of Senate Joint Resolution 58 do not, most emphatically, do not agree with the Nobel laureates in economics who yesterday condemned Senate Joint Resolution 58 in words best put by Henrik Houthhaker of Harvard, who said he would favor limitations on Federal expenditures, but he said, "the constitutional amendment is the wrong way to go."

The Washington Post this morning quoted Mr. Houthhaker saying:

> It is as phony as a $3 bill. It's phony because if Congress wants to balance the budget it can vote a balanced budget. If the President wants to balance the budget he can propose a balanced budget.

I agree. The Senate should agree and should vote to drop this charade of balancing the budget through a constitutional amendment.

I applaud the Senator from New York for his ingenuity in coming up with that amendment which portrays so startlingly the nonsense in which we are engaged.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from California for his comments. The body will remember his courage and so will the people.

If I can refer to his reference to that distinguished Dutch economist Henrik Houthhaker, he was a member of the Council of Economic Advisers under President Johnson and stayed on the Council under President Nixon. He is a Republican. He said, "This amendment is as phony as a $3 bill."

It is precisely the economists of the Nation who are saying to us, we do not have the knowledge to implement this kind of amendment. It is a hoax, as referred to by George F. Will, scarcely a member of Social Democrats, Inc.

The report with the algebraic formula refers to national income, to be placed in the Constitution, by six different possible definitions.

Amendment XIV begins, "All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States." Can you imagine that report saying, "We recognize five definitions of persons and 16 possible definitions of citizens?"

Mr. President, this amendment is as phony as a $3 bill and it ought to end.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, does the Senator prefer a direct vote on his amendment?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I think that is our practice.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, how much time remains to the opponents?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eight and one-quarter minutes remain to the Senator from South Carolina. The time of the Senator from New York has expired.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, if the proponents are ready to vote, I will yield back the remainder of my time and we can proceed with the vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time having been yielded back, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New York. The yeas and nays have been ordered and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Colorado (Mr. ARMSTRONG), the Senator from Alabama (Mr. DENTON), and the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. DURENBERGER) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Alabama (Mr. DENTON) would vote "nay."

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Nevada (Mr. CANNON) and the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. MATSUNAGA) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. TSONGAS) is absent on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who desire to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 13, nays 81, as follows:

Mr. DECONCINI. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

AMENDMENT NO. 1994

(Purpose: To provide for a waiver of the provisions of the constitutional amendment in times of national emergency)

Mr. CRANSTON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California.

Mr. CRANSTON. I ask that amendment No. 1994 be called up for consideration at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the amendment, but first the Senate will be in order. The Senate will be in order. Will Senators please take their seats.

The Senate will be in order. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from California (Mr. CRANSTON) proposes an amendment numbered 1994:

On page 4, line 7, strike out "declaration of war" and insert "national emergency declared by the President or the Congress".

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, this amendment is deisgned to deal with what I think is the most absurd and the most dangerous provision in Senate Joint Resolution 58, the proposed constitutional amendment.

The only exception specified in the amendment where defense spending can occur is if there is a declaration of war.

Mr. President, I submit that there may be times and circumstances when we would want to spend significant amounts on national defense without having to declare war on the Soviet Union or some other perceived foe. It is very dangerous to suggest that we can only have defense spending under this one exemption in the constitutional amendment, that is if we declare war.

When war is declared, a number of unusual provisions of the law which are absolutely vital in time of war are triggered. Some of them are not desirable except in times of war. Do we want to trigger all those extraordinary provisions?

Mr. President, I believe it is recognized in the White House—I know it is recognized in the White House—that there should be some modification of this provision in the pending constitutional amendment. A number of Senators met with the President of the United States and some of his staff just a few days ago to discuss the constitutional amendment. The question came up: Is it wise to require us to declare war in order to spend in a deficit way? David Stockman stated that he favored an amendment along the lines of that I have now proposed—in fact, exactly that. The President did not disagree. The President did not demur.

Administration policy on this matter is not precisely clear, because the administration, on July 13, in a document headed "Statement Of Administration Policy," stated:

The administration does, however, believe that section 3 should be broadened and would support the following change: "The Congress may waive the provisions of this article for any fiscal year in which a declaration of war is in effect or there is an unforeseen imminent threat to national security."

I am glad that the administration recognizes the need for changing this particular provision in the constitutional amendment. I regret that their formal policy, as set forth in this statement of administration policy, does not accept my particular approach, as David Stockman apparently does, but suggests instead that we be able to waive the provisions of this article for a balanced budget if there is an unforeseen imminent threat to national security.

What is an unforeseen imminent threat to national security? This suggests that our intelligence agencies might be very lax in foreseeing an imminent threat. Why should we be able to spend in a deficit mode only if there is an unforeseen imminent threat? What would the imminent threat be? Would it not be one that would suggest that it would be wise to declare a national emergency? I should think it would be. I suggest that my amendment would be far wiser and far more explicit and far more clear.

One of our purposes in offering various amendments is to try to make clear what this constitutional amendment means, what it would do, and what it would not do. I say that the proposed amendment in its present form is dangerous to national security, because who can know how easy it will be to persuade Congress, under the three-fifths rule, to come up with appropriations necessary for national defense under all circumstances. That would give 41 Members of the Senate an opportunity to block any such expenditure. It would give a like ratio in the House the opportunity to block.

The committee report states on page 51:

The Committee intends that ordinary and prudent defense appropriations and preparations for a war perceived by the Congress to be imminent be funded fully within the limitations imposed by the amendment although Congress may establish higher levels of spending and/or deficits for these or any other purposes under sections 1 and 2.

It might not be as easy as the authors of the report and the members of the committee contemplate to obtain the three-fifths needed for national defense purposes. We already have a dispute now between the President and Congress. Congress placed certain limits on national defense spending for the next 3 fiscal years. The President, this morning, is reneging on an agreement he had made previously about national defense spending and now calls for more. He may find it difficult to get more from Congress.

This simply spells out and makes rather starkly clear the pitfalls in the proposed constitutional amendment.

Furthermore, there may be national emergencies requiring defense spending for reasons other than matters that relate to war and peace. There could be a catastrophic earthquake in this country. There could be a famine for one reason or another. There could be an emergency of a sort that we cannot presently foresee.

I think it would be far wiser to provide that if there is a national emergency declared by the President or Congress, whether it be for a foreign or a domestic reason, we can then spend what we need to spend in order to deal with that national emergency.

(Mrs. HAWKINS assumed the chair.)

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Madam President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CRANSTON. I yield.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. The Senator from California has raised the matter which is on the front pages of papers across the Nation.

At a minimum, the President is at odds with the spirit of the effort he has asked to go forward with, to bind Congress and the President to rigid levels of spending.

We have a budget resolution—to which the President agreed—calling for $30 billion less in military spending than he had proposed for fiscal years 1983 to 1985. Now a spokesman for the administration says that the President does not consider the 1-year levels for 1984 and 1985 to be binding so far as defense is concerned.

If a President can defy his party and his own previous agreement in a matter where we have only a budget resolution involved, are we not creating a situation here and now where a genuine constitutional crisis will arise, when he defies a constitutional amendment?

The very President who has proposed an amendment to the Constitution appears at a rally the following week on the steps of the Capitol and says, essentially, "Help me before I kill again." Here, the next week, he is saying, "No. I said I would do it, but I have no intention of doing it."

Are we not building into the normal tensions between the legislative and executive branches the prospects for recurrent constitutional crises, as against merely political contention?

Mr. CRANSTON. I believe we are.

Madam President, I believe that the Senator from New York, in his usual direct way and dramatic way, has put his finger on one of the fundamental problems. A constitutional crisis could emerge between the President and Congress, and there could be a crisis in which we have a national emergency we cannot deal with effectively and swiftly because of this constitutional amendment, if enacted in its present form. There could be a difference of opinion over the nature of the emergency. There could be regional problems about whether or not to deal with it. If it takes three-fifths of the House and three-fifths of the Senate to approve, we might not be able to approve, and we would let down the people of the country.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I am vice chairman of the Committee on Intelligence. There could be disparities in intelligence matters between what the President knows and what Congress knows.

Mr. CRANSTON. Exactly.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. It might impel him to action in violation of the amendment to the Constitution, in defense of the Nation.

That is quite an elegant arrangement to set up—is it not—just to get the majority through the next midyear congressional elections?

Mr. CRANSTON. It most certainly is.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Is there no sense of shame in this city?

Mr. CRANSTON. No, there is none. [Laughter.]

Madam President, I mentioned earlier that when war is declared a number of unusual provisions of law which are absolutely vital in time of war are triggered, and let me expand upon that.

We might well want to spend more for national defense because of perceived problems without having to declare war on some perceived foe in order to be able to do so. It is ridiculous to suggest that we should have to declare war in order to spend what we must spend on national defense.

It is also unwise to have such a provision because of the consequences of a declaration of war, apart from what it does for the relations on the nation upon whom we declare war.

The full range of laws involving espionage and protection of national security information is triggered once we declare war. The President has statutory emergency powers when war has been declared, and his constitutional powers as Commander in Chief are greatly enhanced.

We may not want to enhance those powers just to spend more on national defense when we do not want to actually go to war.

Military government can be imposed when there is a declaration of war, and drastic actions can be taken by local military commanders as was the case in World War II when Japanese Americans were removed from their homes by military order and taken to relocation centers and what might better be called concentration camps. That happened to many of my constituents back in the days when we declared war on Germany, Italy, and Japan.

Madam President, the purpose of this amendment is to retain the ability of Congress and the President to respond swiftly and effectively to national emergencies. It is constructed to ask why Senate Joint Resolution 58 deletes the balanced budget requirement during a declared war. The reasonable answer is that a declared war demands immediate, decisive, and costly action.

Apparently, the framers of the constitutional amendment pending, recognize that this proposed constitutional amendment impedes such decisive action. That is why the resolution is a dangerous straitjacket, a handcuff on congressional ability to respond to a wide assortment of emergencies.

We may want to spend more on national defense purposes, as I have stated, to deal with some real threat to our national security without declaring war on some other nation.

Many efforts by the United States abroad are controversial at home. Peacekeeping forces, patrols, responses to emergencies—these events require Federal expenditures that may be impossible under the resolution and, therefore, we will not do what we should do in our own interest for national defense purposes.

The resolution will drastically limit the ability of the United States to respond quickly and effectively to any serious international crisis short of war. It establishes a constitutional link between the conduct of foreign policy and the constraints of economic policy. And this is a dangerous absurdity.

Section 3 of the Senate Joint Resolution 58 ignores the occurrence of nonmilitary domestic emergencies which may require equally quick and costly governmental intervention. No allowance is made at all for natural disasters or economic emergencies here at home that may require unexpected outlays.

This amendment remedies that oversight, and it is an oversight by the framers of Senate Joint Resolution 58. It allows deficit spending during times of national emergency declared by the President or declared by Congress. This amendment helps the Federal Government to judge the needs of the Nation, and it helps it respond to those needs.

I wish to note that the administration-proposed alternative does not spell out who declares or how "an unforeseen imminent threat to national security" is to be determined.

My amendment says national emergency declared by the President or declared by Congress, and that is the way it should be.

If this amendment is not adopted, I think we create a national emergency, and if it were adopted in the Constitution I then suggest that we at once declare a national emergency.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Madam President, I wonder if the Senator will respond to two questions. One of the possibilities of world emergency which has come only in our own time, and is so new it has not yet occurred but could so occur, is a nuclear emergency. A major nuclear disaster in one part of the world could lead to a worldwide response or worldwide disaster. And there is no provision for this in the resolution before us, is there not save by the Senator's amendment?

Mr. CRANSTON. There is no provision unless my amendment is adopted. We could have a nuclear emergency that was not an act of war. It could be a mistake. It could be an accident. There could be a terrorist act. We are not prepared to deal with any of them under the proposed constitutional amendment.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. It could be the most deadly emergency the world has known.

Mr. CRANSTON. That is right.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. We are to sit here saying "Sorry, we have this amendment."

Mr. CRANSTON. Exactly.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. If I could ask the Senator one other thing, from his long and learned study of history, is it not the case that from the beginning of the modern era one of the qualities of the aggressive warmaking leaders of this world, and one of the sources of war in the world, has been a head of government who found he could not solve his economic problems at home. And so, he starts a war abroad to distract his people from these problems?

Mr. CRANSTON. That has been one of the major causes of conflict, war, and devastation.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Over and over we have seen leaders who, not being able to solve their domestic problems, went to war. We are now making that grim lesson of history a principle of the American Constitution.

Mr. CRANSTON. If we adopt this amendment that is pending to amend the Constitution, that is precisely what we would do.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Is there no sense of history in this city?

Mr. CRANSTON. No. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I congratulate the Senator for his courage and for his knowledge.

Mr. CRANSTON. I thank the Senator.

I wish he would explain one loophole that he has perceived in the constitutional amendment where we could declare war not on the Soviet Union but on some lesser nation as a way to permit deficit spending under any circumstances. It is an absurdity but it is a very ingenious, particularly Moynihan-ingenious solution to a problem that would confront us if this amendment is adopted in the form presented by the committee.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Madam President, it may be we are going to have to live with this calamity and do our best. I suggested earlier that, since Presidents are going to repeatedly need exceptions from the amendment, they are going to repeatedly have to declare war. We should anticipate and establish a planning group in the Department of State to find a country that would be willing to have us declare war on them, in return for some modest reparations in the aftermath and a minimum of engagements in the interval.

Mr. NUNN. I suggest to the Senator from New York there may be some States that would allow that.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. There would be States, but if the Senator would provide an amendment to the Constitution that a State could choose to have war declared on it, and then get reparations, I will offer the amendment in conjunction with him. Does he wish one?

Mr. NUNN. I will think that over and consult with the Governor of my State.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. We will talk.

I nominated Iceland as a friendly nation that is sufficiently removed by sea. The problem is that it would be an attack on a NATO ally, and then we would have difficulty with Spain and the Federal Republic. Perhaps we could negotiate it.

Liechtenstein, it seems, would deny the seriousness of the case.

Iceland is probably the best arrangement and the troops who get sent there would have to occupy it a little bit. Troops have always enjoyed Iceland. Reparations could be reasonable and would enhance their gross national product, a return from the United States for war from the United States. There would be yet more complicated calculations involved; but the Icelanders learn algebra in the 9th and 10th grade, so they could handle it.

I offer the thought that this all will now be possible. And I welcome the Senator from Georgia's suggestion. I can just see it now: Ronald Reagan at the head of what are his remaining troop of economists—I think there is one economist left in Government—marching through Georgia [laughter] and thereby not only adding military valor but increasing the resources available to his depleted exchequer.

Mr. NUNN. Georgia has had that term before in history, so that would not be unprecedented.

As I understand, if I may ask a question of the Senator from California, this amendment is an amendment where the Senator would simply be substituting the words "national emergency" for the words "declaration of war?"

Mr. CRANSTON. That is right. Slightly beyond that, just to cover it precisely, we would strike article 3 which now reads as offered by the committee:

> The Congress may waive the provisions of this article for any fiscal year in which a declaration of war is in effect.

I would strike by my amendment "declaration or war" and insert "for any fiscal year in which a national emergency declared by the President or the Congress is in effect."

Mr. NUNN. Would the Senator interpret "national emergency" to include war so that the words could be broader but inclusive?

Mr. CRANSTON. Of course.

Mr. NUNN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CRANSTON. I rest my case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. THURMOND. Madam President, I rise in opposition to the amendment being proposed by the distinguished Senator from California to add "national emergency" to Senate Joint Resolution 58 in lieu of "declaration of war."

The Senator believes that an exception to the provisions of Senate Joint Resolution 58 only for war may be too narrow. Thge Senator must understand why we believe any other definition is too broad.

I can recall that not too long ago Congress enacted several laws entitled the National Defense Education Act, the International Energy Conservation Policy Act; on the Federal statute books right now are laws such as the Emergency Energy Conservation Act, the Emergency Insured Student Loan Act of 1969, the Emergency Interim Consumer Products Safety Standards Act, the Emergency Natural Gas Act of 1977, and the Emergency School Aid Act.

Madam President, there are other laws on the books with titles that have been invoked in the name of a national emergency or an apparent national priority. Under the amendment of the Senator from California a simple majority vote would result in the waiver of the effect of the proposed constitutional amendment.

If Congress decides that a spending priority is so important, so necessary, to the national welfare, then it can very easily vote under the provisions of this proposed constitutional amendment to incur a deficit for that specific purpose.

I now remind them of that provision we have in this constitutional amendment which reads this way:

> Whenever three-fifths of the whole number of both Houses shall deem it necessary, Congress in such statement may provide for a specific excess of outlays over receipts by a vote directed solely to that subject.

Madam President, that gives the authority the President needs if he requires it. It gives the authority to the Congress if Congress needs it. If we open up this amendment with a loophole, as is suggested by the Senator from California, then this effort to force Congress to achieve a balanced budget may be in vain. It will be too easy to simply designate legislation of national emergency and gain a simple majority for passage.

Madam President, that is the very thing we want to avoid. If we have a war that is another thing. If we do not have a war then the President or Congress can come in by a three-fifths vote here and accomplish their purpose, and that is the very thing we are trying to protect in the provisions of Senate Joint Resolution 58.

You will never have a balanced budget if one President after another wants to use one emergency after another. It has been done time and time again. It has been done by these congressional acts I just referred to. It has been done by acts of the President, and we think it will be a great mistake to permit such exceptions in this amendment.

For those reasons, Madam President, I oppose the amendment and shall vote against it.

Mr. CRANSTON. Madam President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THURMOND. I would be glad to yield.

Mr. CRANSTON. Have there not been a number of times when on a defense issue the Committee on Armed Services has supported one weapons system or another that may have been very expensive, and they have won by a very narrow margin, 55 to 45 or something like that, and cannot the distinguished ranking member of the Committee on Armed Services envisage some difficulty perhaps in getting a three-fifths vote in this body and also in the House to enable him and those who share his convictions on national defense to do what they think is necessary for national defense?

Mr. THURMOND. Well, Madam President, I think my position on national defense is well known. For years I have supported a strong national defense. I think it is the only answer to the Soviet threat today. It is the only way we can keep this country safe and keep our freedom.

But I would see no need of doing what the Senator suggests. In my judgment, if the President felt it necessary, why, he would make that recommendation to Congress. If Congress felt it was necessary they could act themselves. I am sure if there is a national emergency we will be able to convince three-fifths, that is only 60 percent, to take the action necessary to defend this country.

Mr. CRANSTON. Having seen many national defense decisions made by votes that were less than three-fifths, I marvel at the confidence of the distinguished Senator that he can always marshal the three-fifths needed for what he would feel is required for national defense.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. DECONCINI. Madam President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. THURMOND. I yield such time as the able Senator requires.

Mr. DECONCINI. I would like to ask the distinguished Senator a question: If we went along with this particular amendment would it not be similar to the problem we faced with the Harry F. Byrd amendment that a simple majority could declare a national emergency and placing us in a position to spend a great deal of deficit dollars once again?

Mr. THURMOND. I think the Senator is correct.

Mr. DECONCINI. Is it not also the Senator's feeling that if we really want to put on some restraints—and that is on military expenditure as well as other expenditures—we have to have a procedure that is going to force this Congress to make a determination that the priority is so great, the need is so great, that we must justify such a need by getting three-fifths of both Houses to vote?

Mr. THURMOND. Madam President, in response to the able Senator I would say that we are interested here in trying to get this budget balanced. We are interested here in mandating it in the Constitution. We have fixed the figure at three-fifths. That has been generally agreed upon as a reasonable figure. If we can do by a majority vote what is being talked about we do not need the constitutional amendment.

Mr. DECONCINI. I think the Senator is correct.

Mr. THURMOND. This is to prevent a mere majority from spending money and spending money, as they have been doing. The budget has not been balanced but one time in the last 21 years, and we want to stop that and we want more than a majority to accomplish that purpose.

Mr. DECONCINI. Madam President, if the Senator will yield, the Senator in this amendment wants to apply that same tough principle to the defense expenditures and all other expenditures. We are not going to present an open checkbook to anybody by a mere majority unless we have a declaration of war.

Mr. THURMOND. That is exactly correct.

Mr. DECONCINI. I thank the Senator.

Mr. HATCH. Madam President, will the Senator yield for a question from the Senator?

Mr. THURMOND. I would be very pleased to yield to the able Senator from Utah.

Mr. HATCH. Is it not true that if a three-fifths majority vote to allow deficit spending for the military cannot be obtained that Congress can simply raise taxes by a constitutional majority in order to pay for military expenses?

Mr. THURMOND. The Senator is correct.

Mr. HATCH. Is it not also true that if there were a national emergency the people in this country and the Members of this body would do what must be done during the national emergency and get the three-fifths vote?

Mr. THURMOND. I do not think there is any doubt about it because, after all, public opinion controls. As Abraham Lincoln said, "With it, you can accomplish with it, and without it you can accomplish nothing."

I am sure if we had an emergency in this country, the public opinion would be so strong that we could get not only 60 percent but more than that.

Mr. HATCH. Might it not also be true that if Congress could not get a 60-percent vote, there is not a sufficient national emergency?

Mr. THURMOND. I think the Senator is right.

Mr. HATCH. But even then there still is, under this amendment, no provision prohibiting Congress from raising taxes to pay for the additional expenses.

Mr. THURMOND. That is exactly correct.

Mr. HATCH. Whether it is military or anything else.

Mr. THURMOND. But if they are going to spend more than they take in, they have to do it by a three-fifths vote of both bodies or raise taxes.

Madam President, we have had this thing going on now, as I have stated, for years and years and years that we have gone on an unbalanced budget. No individual could stay in business operating like this Government has been doing, no corporation could stay in business operating like this Government has been doing, and this Government cannot keep on doing it that way, either.

We are at a crisis in this country. We have to take drastic steps. We feel this is the most reasonable drastic step.

Mr. HATCH. Will the Senator yield again?

Mr. THURMOND. I am pleased to yield.

Mr. HATCH. I was amused by the suggestion made by the opposition to the amendment that assuming this amendment becomes part of the Constitution they could avoid the requirements placed on Congress by the amendment by simply declaring war against a small country.

I personally take a more serious view of the Constitution. I feel that Members of Congress will want to support the Constitution and its provisions and will not try to find ways around it, because it is the basic document of this land.

If Members of Congress are going to make a ruse out of the Constitution by declaring war—of course, I do not think anybody would actually do that—would this not, in fact, make a bigger loophole to get around what is a clear-cut constitutional amendment?

Mr. THURMOND. I think the Senator has put his finger right on it. He is absolutely correct.

Mr. HATCH. We are not talking about a mere statute. We are talking about the Constitution of the United States. And should this amendment become part of it, I cannot imagine any Member of this body as constituted now or in the future who would not want to stand up and speak fairly in defense of the Constitution.

We may have legitimate disagreements on what the Constitution means, but we do not disagree with regard to our respect for the Constitution.

Mr. THURMOND. That is correct.

Mr. HATCH. I personally think it is ridiculous to even consider that Members of Congress would use such means in an attempt to circumvent the Constitution or its provisions.

Mr. THURMOND. Every Member of this body held up his hand and put his hand on the Bible and took an oath to support the Constitution of the United States. And that is the oath every judge, every district attorney, every marshal, and everyone else in an important position takes. I do not feel that any Member of this body will not respect that. They may construe it differently, as the Senator said, but I do not feel they would wish to intentionally ignore the Constitution.

Mr. NUNN. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HATCH. Yes.

Mr. NUNN. The constitutional amendment I have introduced on this subject contains the words "national emergency." The Senator from Pennsylvania and I had a constitutional amendment, part of which has been incorporated in the one before us now, and it contained the words "national emergency," instead of "war." Yet I recognize the validity, frankly, of what both sides have said on this subject.

I think the Senator from California and the Senator from New York have made a couple of good points on this. I think that the Senator from Utah and the Senator from South Carolina have, also.

The thing that I think is important here—and I really do not know the answer to this and perhaps the Senator from Utah does—is how many years since World War II has this Nation been in a national emergency as declared by Congress? There is something back in my memory that indicates we were in a period of national emergency from about 1950 to sometime in the 1970's in terms of an official declaration by Congress.

Now, if that is the case, if historically—the Senator from New York said we did not have a sense of history here in this body and I think too many times he is correct on that—but looking at the history and trying to have a sense of history on this amendment, if, indeed, we have been in that period of national emergency for some 20 or 25 years since World War II, are we in danger of really creating a loophole that would render this constitutional amendment almost fruitless? I have not decided on how I am going to vote on this.

Mr. HATCH. The Senator has put his finger on the precise issue.

Let me give you some history of the evolution of this amendment, Senate Joint Resolution 58. When the Senator from Georgia and Senator HEINZ filed their constitutional amendment which was referred to the Constitution Subcommittee, it did have this language in it. This language was very influential in the debate, on both sides of the aisle in both the House and the Senate. And it had great influence in the writing of the language in Senate Joint Resolution 58.

We felt that the problem with the national emergency language is that it would create a major loophole for those who would want to circumvent the real intent of this amendment, which is to require Congress to stand up and face the problems of America and try to balance the budget or vote to increase taxes, or vote to increase the deficit, or both.

Now, this amendment may seem simplistic in the eyes of some of the editorialists, but it is not simplistic. It covers a lot of problems which have existed in the past. And the major problem in this body happens to center around the fact that we have not been able to choose between competing programs, all of which may be good, some better than others. We just fund them all because we know we can always dip into that till and borrow against the credit of this country, or we can count on inflation pushing us into higher tax brackets and thus increasing taxes through bracket creep. That is what has been happening in this country for some time.

As we got into this debate, some were opposed even to the declaration-of-war exception. They did not want any exceptions. Others supported a two-thirds provision, a three-quarters provision on declaration of war, and some wanted to make it impossible to increase military spending. They were a distinct few. But the fact of the matter is that we had people on all sides of this issue.

In an effort to find the best language, we asked for input on the language from as many Members of Congress as we could, and the consensus was that the language in Senate Joint Resolution 58 is the best language to solve this problem. When there is a national emergency, then there will be a three-fifths vote. When there is not, we may not be able to get those votes. If we make it simple for Members in Congress to declare a national emergency when, in fact, it is simply a spending emergency, as has often happened in the last 50 years, then all the work that has been put into this amendment will have been in vain.

Mr. NUNN. My sense of history is that we had a national emergency declared during the Korean war. I think there is some merit, I suppose in a modern age, a nuclear age, to shy away from declarations of war, although I think in both the cases of Korea and Vietnam it probably was a mistake.

But, nevertheless, we did go through that period where we did not declare war and we had two actions that were, in all eyes, tantamount to war.

Mr. HATCH. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. NUNN. Yes.

Mr. HATCH. If my history is correct, I think we had a national emergency declared for about 10 years after the Korean war.

Mr. NUNN. This was my next point that I wanted to make. The fact that we did not declare war in those two instances, which was tantamount to war, causes me to lean toward support of this amendment, frankly. But the thing that works in the other direction is, once the Korean war was over, there was no repealing of that national emergency. And if we pass the Cranston amendment, while it makes sense in that sense, it does not make sense in the overall context that it went on and on and on and, in effect, if you would have had this constitutional amendment in effect in 1948, 1949, and 1950, we would have had a national emergency for the Korean war and the constitutional amendment would no longer be in effect. The deficit spending would have had no constitutional sanction, at least, and that would have gone on not during the war itself but for 10 years after that. That gives me great pause on this amendment.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Will the Senator yield for a comment? He would know this better than I.

There is a new world of international conflict. Is it not the case that the Korean war continues, that we have an armistice, and that we have meetings at Panmunjom?

Mr. NUNN. Technically the Senator is correct.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. That is the world in which we live.

Mr. NUNN. I think the Senator makes a good point. On the other hand, I do not think that is relevant to the question of whether we should be having deficits in the 1982 timeframe, or, for that matter, I do not think the question of whether the Korean war technically continues is relevant to the question of deficits in 1985, 1986, 1987, and 1988.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. If I can have a few moments to comment on the statements of my friend from Georgia, and no one commands greater respect in this Chamber on military matters. If there is one controlling principle in the American Constitution, it is to limit the power of the executive branch. It was written in the aftermath of a revolution against what was seen as an all-powerful monarchy. That was the constitutional result. There have been a succession of difficulties as we have found that the limitations in an 18th century time mode must be adjusted. I think the Constitution was ratified during a 4-month period and had already happened before some States knew it. It was that age of transportation.

We live now in a world in which war can take place in 10 minutes or 20 minutes.

Is it really wise to circumscribe the limited powers of the Presidency still further as, of necessity, we do here? We have no choice but a Commander in Chief who may have to respond in seconds, in minutes. It is not something they want or that we want. But can we avoid it? We can make it more difficult than it is.

Mr. NUNN. My general answer to the Senator from New York would be no. I am not sure how that directly relates to this question, though, because as I recall in the period of declared national emergency that lasted 10 or 12 years, or maybe longer, the President and the executive branch had extraordinary powers long after the declaration should have, by rights, expired. So that was a huge delegation of authority to the President. If I am not mistaken, when a national emergency is declared, the executive branch acquires a number of extraordinary powers they would not normally have.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. HATCH. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. NUNN. I do not know that I have control of the time. I will just yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina has control of time on his side.

Mr. THURMOND. Madam President, I yield such time as the Senator from Utah may require.

Mr. HATCH. Madam President, I suggest to the Senator from New York that if there is an overriding provision in the Constitution it is not just to limit the executive branch of Government but to limit all branches of Government. One reason why we, both Democrats and Republicans, are proposing this constitutional amendment, is that at least two branches of Government, and possibly all three branches, have been running wild with regard to deficit spending and inflation over the last 50 years. Especially in the last 23 years.

The fact is that if we put this proposed language into the amendment, we will be creating an escape clause through which the President or the Congress could declare a national emergency and run a huge fiscally irresponsible truck through any time they desired. That is the weakness in this language. That is why the Democrats and Republicans in both Houses who developed the amendment concluded that the language we have is the best language. If there is, in fact, a national emergency, three-fifths of the Congress will declare it to be so. If there is not, then they will not. That is what the language is intended to resolve.

We do not disagree on the fact that a genuine national emergency might justify a deficit budget. The only disagreement is in how to define such an emergency.

The Cranston amendment would leave that definition totally undefined. The present constitutional amendment would define what constitutes a national emergency by whether or not Congress can get a three-fifths vote. The logic behind the amendment is that if Congress is going to declare something, we ought to stand up and openly vote for it. If we are going to allow deficit spending, we ought to stand up and vote for it. If we are going to increase national spending, we ought to stand up and vote for it. The consensus of Democrats and Republicans is that Members of Congress should take the responsibility for the votes they make.

I personally wish there was a way (easier than our present language) to increase defense expenditures. But there is not an easier way. This is a reasonable amendment and a reasonable approach, it may be the only way we have to reach the right balance in our fiscal affairs. The amendment challenges everyone who wishes to get a piece of the economic pie to prove that their particular program is the best program. And then we in Congress are required to make a decision and vote if we want to increase spending in this country.

Mr. CRANSTON. Madam President, I would like to say to the Senator from Georgia that I believe that my amendment would cause greater discretion in declaring national emergencies, and it would cause Congress to think twice about letting national emergencies run on indefinitely, once they have been declared.

The emergency declared when we were at war with Korea, I think, people just sort of forgot about and only repealed it when it was brought up by someone who thought it was about time to end that national emergency.

The Congress would certainly be reluctant, if we had a constitutional amendment in place requiring a balanced budget, to frivolously declare national emergencies or leave them long standing just as a device to get around the constitutional amendment. I do not think that would be done.

One problem with the matter of expecting we can easily get three-fifths when needed to permit spending for national defense purposes or otherwise is the difference of opinion over what circumstances confront us. There may be those who perceive a national threat and there may be those who do not perceive a national threat. There may be those who perceive a national emergency other than a national defense emergency and there may be those who do not perceive it. The requirement for a three-fifths vote in order to be able to meet our needs under those circumstances I think places an undue burden upon the Government and the responsiveness of the Government.

I would like to also point out that—and this is in response to the question raised by the Senator from Arizona—if there is serious doubt about the need to declare a national emergency, then it would not be done by a majority vote. There would be a filibuster. We get right back to the need for three-fifths or 60 votes in the Senate before we would declare a national emergency. You would have to get cloture before you could proceed.

So I do not think we have to worry about this opening a debate loophole.

I would also like to point out again to the Senator from South Carolina who thinks it would be so easy to get three-fifths any time there are those who perceive there is a national emergency requiring significant defense spending absent my amendment, we have had some very, very close votes in the history of our country on momentous matters that required defense expenditures. If we had not been able to proceed without a three-fifths vote, we would not have proceeded. For example, on the eve of World War II, there was an incredibly close vote on whether or not to adopt Selective Service. It passed the House by only one vote. It would not have passed the House by a three-fifths vote, and, plainly, some heavy expenditures were needed. It passed the Senate by a very narrow vote.

Then we came to Lend-Lease. Lend-Lease was blocked for a long time in this body. Eventually, it was approved, again by a very narrow margin. This is an example of where the majority prevailed and prevailed wisely.

If they had needed three-fifths to take those steps, they might not have been taken in a timely fashion. Our casualties might have been far greater in World War II, a war for which we might not have been as well prepared if we had not adopted Selective Service or not adopted the Lend-Lease Act.

The world was in flames at that time. Our allies were in desperate trouble. But there was not an overwhelming majority that favored taking those moves that were vitally necessary for our defense. I therefore urge my amendment, which would require only the declaration of a national emergency by the Congress or the President in order to permit us to do what we must do when we face a national emergency.

Mr. DECONCINI. Madam President, I ask the Senator from South Carolina to yield me 2 minutes.

Mr. THURMOND. Madam President, I yield such time as the able Senator from Arizona may require.

Mr. DECONCINI. Madam President, I think we can conclude that there is a difference of opinion as to what status the country must be in before we might institute a deficit-spending provision. That is what this debate boils down to. Those of us who authored this resolution have come to the conclusion that we need to insure that there is a protective measure such as this in place so that it will not be simple or easy to spend deficit dollars. The distinguished Senator from California makes his point that we are talking about national defense expenditures. Certainly, we do not want to hamstring our national security, or, as pointed out by the Senator from Georgia, hamstring ourselves when other valid national emergencies arise.

My point, Madam President, is that we need the discipline offered by this amendment. We need this curtailment. We need to be confronted in Congress, as well as does the President, to make a determination: Do we have the will to balance the budget? Is the determination here to spend deficit dollars by a three-fifths vote or to increase the taxes to pay for it?

I come down on the side that the amendment is well drawn for the purpose of insuring that if we spend those deficit dollars or if we raise taxes, there is going to be more than just a simple majority in justification for it. The reason is simply that, in the past, Congresses have not acted responsibly. Well-intentioned Members including this Member have voted for billions of dollars in deficit expenditures, but, in fact, we cannot afford that any more.

Mr. THURMOND. Madam President, how much time is left to each side?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina has 5 minutes. The Senator from California has 4 minutes and 27 seconds.

Mr. THURMOND. I say to the distinguished Senator from California, I am prepared to yield back my time.

Mr. CRANSTON. I am prepared to yield back my time if no one else wants to speak.

I yield back my time.

Mr. THURMOND. Madam President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Alabama (Mr. DENTON) and the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. DURENBERGER) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Alabama (Mr. DENTON) would vote "nay."

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Nevada (Mr. CANNON) and the Senator from Ohio (Mr. GLENN) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. TSONGAS) is absent on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUMPHREY). Are there any other Senators in the Chamber wishing to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 34, nays 61, as follows:

So the amendment (No. 1994) was rejected.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HATCH. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

AMENDMENT NO. 1941

(Purpose: To permit Congress to waive the balanced-budget requirement during periods of national economic emergency)

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I call up amendment No. 1941.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follow:

The Senator from Illinois (Mr. DIXON) proposes an amendment numbered 1941:

On page 4, line 8, after "effect", insert: "or in any fiscal year in which a joint resolution declaring a national economic emergency is in effect".

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, section 3 of Senate Joint Resolution 58 gives Congress the power to waive the balanced-budget requirement and the requirement limiting the growth of receipts for any fiscal year in which a declaration of war is in effect. That provision is sensible and greatly needed. However, it does not go far enough. There are other circumstances short of war, where it is vital to be able to waive the provisions of the proposed amendment.

An editorial from the June 21, 1982, Washington Post makes the point very well. It states that:

By enforcing the rule of a balanced budget, this (proposed constitutional) amendment would leave no discretion whatsoever to a President and Congress to combat recessions. Theoretically, the amendment would allow a deficit by a three-fifths vote in each House of Congress. In reality, governments are always slow to acknowledge economic trouble ahead, and it is utterly unlikely that Congress could react sufficiently quickly, or unanimously, to avert real damage. Under the iron commandment of continuous balance, a recession like the present one would quickly turn into a true depression on a scale that this country has not seen since the 1930's.

The amendment I am offering is an attempt to remedy this problem. It is simple and straightforward. It permits Congress to waive the provisions of the proposed constitutional amendment in any fiscal year in which a joint resolution declaring an economic emergency is in effect.

Mr. President, I believe that adoption of my amendment is imperative if the Federal Government is to retain any ability to generate economic growth in recessionary times. It must be remembered that, during recessionary periods, spending tends to rise and revenues fall, without any specific actions by Congress. Income tax revenues fall as more people lose their jobs, and spending for programs such as unemployment compensation automatically rises. In fact, estimates are that each percentage point increase in unemployment increases the deficit by $25 to $30 billion.

A study by the Council of Economic Advisers in 1979 points out the potentially disastrous consequences of balancing the budget during recessions. The study concluded that if the Federal budget had been balanced during the 1974–75 recession, real GNP would have plunged by 12 percent in 1975 rather than 2½ percent and unemployment would have shot up to 12 percent rather than 8½ percent.

A recent report of the Congressional Research Service reinforces the conclusions of the CEA study. It states that:

A rigid adherence to budgetary balance could severely constrain the stabilizing influence of fiscal policy. For if lower general economic activity generated lower Federal tax receipts and threatened to cause a budgetary deficit, the commitment to balance the budget would necessitate a reduction of expenditures or an increase in taxes, either of which would further reduce economic activity—a destabilizing process. Equally, if there were the same obligation to avoid surpluses, higher income and higher tax receipts might require high expenditures at the very time when stabilization policy would call for less, or at least not more, Federal spending. Alternatively, higher tax receipts could be considered as a reason for a cut in tax rates, a stimulative action at a time when restraint might be more appropriate.

Even OMB, Mr. President, sees the need for flexibility in Government policy in dealing with deficits. An OMB paper on the balanced budget amendment states that:

An inflexible annual balanced budget policy rule may not be compatible with the business cycle "facts of life" which tend to produce automatic large deficits during recessions. During fiscal year 1982, the projected deficit increased by $40 billion due to the recession-induced fall of receipts and rise of unemployment-related outlays. As written, S.J. Res. 58 requires a super majority (60 percent) to create an annual deficit—yet consensus opinion for several decades has held that recession-induced deficits are either desirable or at least tolerable.

Since business cycle contractions and expansions are inherent in a free economy, the proposed policy rule would create artificial policy choices and political conflicts on a recurring basis; i.e., whether in the face of a contracting economy to: raise taxes; radically reduce spending until recovery raises receipts; or achieve super-majorities to validate recession deficits.

Now I understand that it can be argued that a three-fifths majority can approve a recession-induced deficit and, therefore, that my amendment is unnecessary. However, I think it is clear that the three-fifths requirement will make it much more difficult for Congress to respond to national economic emergencies—to severe recessions—in a timely manner.

Senate Joint Resolution 58 itself seems to admit there is a problem in this area. It permits waiver of the balanced budget requirement by majority vote during fiscal years in which a declaration of war is in effect. If we were at war, Mr. President, is there any doubt that a majority of Congress, a three-fifths majority, even a three-fourths majority would approved necessary wartime deficits? I am sure that approval would be unanimous—to suggest anything else is to imply that Congress would act in an unpatriotic fashion during wartime.

The wartime exception, therefore, is probably the least-needed exception. An exception for national economic emergencies is far more necessary than the wartime waiver if the Congress it to meet its responsibilities in the economic policy area.

I am disturbed by the implication in Senate Joint Resolution 58 that the Federal budget does not influence economic activity in the United States.

The Federal Government consumes about 24 percent of our total gross national product. Decisions on the level of Federal spending and the size of the Federal deficit are factors that are not irrelevant to the future course of the U.S. economy. To the contrary, they are extremely important factors in influencing the rate of GNP growth. In fact, the whole theory of Senate Joint Resolution 58 assumes that Government spending and Federal deficits are the cause of our current economic difficulty, and that smaller, balanced budgets will generate steady noninflationary economic growth.

I agree that we must restrain spending and that the budget should be balanced. I think Congress is abdicating its responsibility for the economy, however, if it puts itself in a straitjacket requiring it to balance the budget every year, regardless of the state of the economy.

Many in Congress object to the monetary policy now being pursued by the Federal Reserve Board. We all know of the devastating impact high interest rates have had on the economy. Yet if Senate Joint Resolution 58 becomes law, the only economic policy weapon that effectively will be available to meet economic problems—either inflation or unemployment—will be monetary policy. Congress will have foreclosed the opportunity to make effective use of fiscal policy to meet economic emergencies.

Mr. President, I do not think the American public wants to put Congress into this straitjacket. The American public wants balanced budgets, but no Americans want a balanced budget every year at the cost of economic depression.

I think we can balance the budget in most years. I think we should do all we can to insure that the budget is balanced over the course of the business cycle. But I do not believe we should leave economic policymaking solely to the Federal Reserve Board.

Congress has a responsibility to help manage the economy. My amendment helps insure that Congress will have the tools necessary to meet its responsibilities, without undermining the goals of Senate Joint Resolution 58.

Mr. President, I urge the adoption of my amendment.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, in many respects this amendment is even worse than the last one.

I was interested in my friend from Illinois' indication of a study done by CEA in 1979 showed that if the Federal budget has been balanced during the 1974-75 recession, the real GNP would have decreased by 12 percent and unemployment would have risen by 12 percent.

This particular study was done with a DRI econometric model, a subject I have been very much interested in as a member of the Budget Committee over the past number of years.

This DRI econometric model is a model that is well known for its dependence on deficits to achieve stimulated growth in the economy. I think it is wrong to rely on these Keynesian models which have been discredited by more balanced economic theories.

I do not think that study stands for anything other than that if you do not go the Keynesian route, and you do have deficits to achieve stimulated growth in the economy, then you are going to have the GNP resulting in higher unemployment.

I think that is an unmitigated falsehood, not on the part of the distinguished Senator from Illinois but on the part of those who would rely on these defective econometric models.

Frankly that has been one of the most difficult problems the Budget Committee has had. We have had these econometric models we have relied on in the past that basically have never been right, and these models have been invariably relied upon to support deficit stimulation of the economy.

I have little doubt that that may work during a time of low inflation and low monetary supply, but I have no doubt that it does not work during the period of high inflation and large monetary supply which we have had over the last number of years.

So I hope our colleagues in the Senate will reject this amendment as they did the last one because this amendment, it seems to me, would make it impossible to ever effectuate or to ever exercise the mandate that this constitutional amendment would impose upon Congress, that mandate being that Congress is going to have to stand up and vote if they want to deficit spend or if they want to increase taxes. They are going to have to vote rather than rely upon fictions, as we have the past number of years.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield me time?

Mr. HATCH. Yes, I yield to the distinguished Senator.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, I dislike to take issue with my distinguished friend from Illinois. I think Senator DIXON is an outstanding Senator and a real asset to this body. This amendment, however, I feel would be most unwise.

If it is adopted, I foresee that the constitutional amendment would probably be almost totally ineffective. We are in crises of an economic nature almost all the time. Certainly we are in a crisis at the moment, and I think we are in a very serious economic crisis at this moment now, and it was brought about, in my judgment—others have different views—by continuous overspending by the Federal Government.

Just today the Federal Reserve Board Chairman, Paul Volcker, testified before a congressional committee that during the next 6 months the Government must borrow $100 billion to finance the deficits created by Congress. That is $100 billion in 6 months.

How are we going to get interest rates down with the Government going into the money markets so consistently for such huge sums? If we do not get interest rates down, interest rates which are devastating to our economy, how can we expect a recovery in the housing market, in the automobile market, two major elements of our economy?

The able Senator from Illinois said he feels that we must restrain spending, and I certainly agree with him; that we should have balanced budgets, and I certainly agree with him.

But the whole record of the Congress of the United States in the last 20 years is one of unrestrained spending. We have had only one balanced budget in 22 years. The deficits have accumulated and accelerated. The Congress is totally without discipline.

I would like to see the budget balanced without a constitutional amendment. As a matter of fact, I was in this body for quite a few years before I brought myself to the conclusion that we should have a constitutional amendment. But I do not know of any other way to bring about a semblance of discipline to the membership of the Congress other than by the adopton of a constitutional amendment.

That may not do it, I do not know. But certainly we have tried the statutory route. Congress enacted and the President signed into law legislation mandating a balanced budget beginning with fiscal year 1981; 1981 has come and gone, and it had a huge deficit.

Now we are into 1982, and the deficit this fiscal year will well exceed $100 billion, it will probably run $110 billion, $112 billion, or $114 billion.

Then for the upcoming fiscal year the budget the Congress is now working on, the Director of the Congressional Budget Office asserted yesterday that the deficits will be in the neighborhood of $130 billion to $140 billion to $150 billion, just unbelievable deficits.

So while I suppose most individuals in the Senate would prefer that there not be a constitutional amendment on this subject, I think a majority and, hopefully, a two-thirds majority, have reached the conclusion that this is probably the only way that Congress can be restrained.

So I hope the amendment offered by the able Senator from Illinois will not be adopted. The previous amendment was defeated by almost a 2-to-1 vote, and it dealt with national emergencies of a defense or military nature. This amendment pending deals with a domestic economic situation or situations. I just feel our country is in a dreadful condition brought about, in my judgment, in large part if not major part by the unwillingness of Congress, the Congress of the United States, to discipline itself in regard to spending, and the unwillingness of the Congress of the United States to operate within its means and within a balanced budget.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. DIXON. I yield.

Mr. BUMPERS. I am not a member of the Budget Committee so I did not hear Dr. Rivlin testify yesterday about how grossly understated the deficits for 1983, 1984, and 1985 are.

We stayed here until 5 a.m. last Friday morning to pass a tax bill, a measure that will raise about $100 billion over the next 3 years. It was a very painful exercise, but it was necessary because we were assured by the Budget Committee that this would give us a budget deficit in fiscal year 1985 of about $60 billion.

When you stop and think about it, its incredible that 3 years from now, we are hoping the deficit will be $60 billion. And yet Dr. Rivlin said yesterday that, given all the cuts in spending that have been proposed under both the President's budget and the Budget Committee's recommendation here which has been adopted, and given the revenues that this tax bill we passed is anticipated to generate, we will still have over $100-billion deficits in 1985. Further unless we do something more, we will only have a mild recovery now, and will probably have another recession in 1985.

The reason I asked the Senator from Illinois to yield to me for a moment was to ask some of my colleagues, particularly those who are proponents of this amendment, how they would vote right now on Dr. Rivlin's proposals to eliminate these colossal deficits. She said not one, but all three of the following things must be done: No. 1, we must scale back defense spending. No. 2, we must do something about entitlement programs, especially social security, according to Dr. Rivlin.

We all know what that means.

We are going to have to take a close look at and perhaps cut back on the cost-of-living increases entitlements and retirement programs, including those for Members of the U.S. Senate and past Members.

No. 3, we are going to have to raise taxes, even more than we just did last week.

The amendment of the Senator from Illinois provides that if there is a national economic emergency and the Congress passes a joint resolution so stating, then the requirement for a three-fifths vote to have a deficit is waive. Is that a correct statement?

Mr. DIXON. That is correct.

Mr. BUMPERS. I cannot imagine anybody taking strong exception to this amendment unless one believes that he would rather see the economy of this country collapse, than to have a budget deficit.

We have a tendency to look at things with tunnel vision. The problem is that most of us are not going to be here very long. I dare say the majority of the Members of the Senate will not be here the first time we have to line up and vote to unbalance the budget, nor will President Reagan be the President of the United States. Yet, a good argument can be made that the impetus and the motivation for this whole thing is of a temporary nature.

My question is: How many of the proponents of this amendment are willing to vote right now to raise taxes, scale back defense spending, and to cut entitlement programs, bearing in mind that November 2 is just 3 months off?

I am not going to ask anybody to answer that. We all know what the answer is. You could not get 20 votes in the U.S. Senate right now to do all three of those things. So what are we going to do? We are going to watch Dr. Rivlin's predictions come true.

I voted against the first budget resolution because I thought it was as phony as a $3 bill, and that is what Dr. Rivlin said yesterday. The economic assumptions were false and most people knew they were false.

Two weeks ago Business Week magazine reported that the White House is in a real stir because they know that deficits for 1983 and beyond are going to be far greater than the Budget Committee of the United States has predicted. The deficits are going to be far greater than they were predicted to be even after we increased taxes $100 billion. Apparently, the internal White House debate is whether to just let it all hang out at one time or give it to the American people in little, slow pieces so they will not notice what the deficits will be.

The day after I read the article, Donald Regan, Secretary of the Treasury, stated that the budget deficits were going to be a little bit higher than they thought they were and they could run as high as $115 billion next year.

Obviously, we are going to get it in bits and pieces, because yesterday Dr. Rivlin literally blew the whistle on this whole charade by saying that the deficits are not going to be $110 billion, they are not going to be $115 billion, they are going to be more like $140 billion to $150 billion next year. She has given the prescription to cure it—scale back defense, scale back entitlement programs and raise taxes. And, you know how many votes that is going to get.

How many Members of the U.S. Senate will vote to unbalance the budget in an election year, knowing that their opponent is going to hammer them over the head from the day of the vote until the day of the election? Oh, you can hear them now: "My opponent stood up there and defied the way the people of America feel. He defied the Constitution to vote for an unbalanced budget." That is going to be the political issue in every campaign from now on, even though we have 10-, 12-, 14-percent unemployment, because those people will always insist that the reason we have 10-, 12-, 14-percent unemployment is because of these big deficits.

The reason we are going to have a big deficit this year and next year and the following year is that for every 1 percent unemployment we have in this country, it costs the U.S. Treasury $25 billion in lost tax revenues and unemployment compensation. It is like a dog chasing its tail.

People say we have to quit spending, and I agree that there is unnecessary spending. But, a lot of people who were in job training, a lot of people who were depending on programs that have been cut out, no longer have jobs. They are no longer taxpayers; instead, they have become wards of the State.

It is very delicate trying to find a balance between fiscal responsibility and a monetary policy that is compatible with full employment and a viable economy. It is very tricky. We have not figured out how to do it in this country consistently. That is why the amendment of the Senator from Illinois makes eminent sense. We can at least stand here and vote for a resolution saying that there is a national economic crisis. It does not seem to me like that is asking too much.

The strength of this country depends just about as much on the viability of our economy as it does on how many planes and tanks and guns we have. The strength of this country is in a viable economy.

Are we going to sit here and say that, just because there are maybe 12 million, 15 million, 20 million people out of work, we cannot use fiscal policy to try to do something about it and stimulate the economy? That is all he is trying to do and that is what this amendment would allow. It makes eminent good sense to me, and I am going to vote for it. I hope some of the people listening back in their offices will do likewise.

I thank the Senator for yielding to me.

Mr. DIXON. I thank the Senator from Arkansas. I appreciate very much his enlightenment of the Senate on the intention of this amendment.

Mr. President I wish to point out that we voted a moment ago on amendment No. 1994, offered by my distinguished friend, the senior Senator from California, that would have amended section 3 by striking out the words "declaration of war" and inserting instead "national emergency declared by the President or the Congress."

It would have permitted the Congress or the President to declare the emergency. The national emergency would cover anything that either the Congress by a majority vote or the President by his will would declare to be a national emergency.

But this Senator's amendment is much narrower. I ask you to listen for a moment as I explain it once again.

We are talking about section 3 of this constitutional amendment. What does section 3 do now, Mr. President? It says there is one exception, only one, to the three-fifths rule. That exception, the one exception, to the three-fifths rule is a declaration of war.

Well, I say that is important, profoundly important; of course it is. But is it not true that a national economic emergency, such as the Great Depression, is a profoundly important question as well? All this Senator's amendment does is add to section 3 after "declaration of war" these words: "or in any fiscal year in which a joint resolution declaring a national economic emergency is in effect."

So it requires the passage of a joint resolution by the Congress, a majority vote in both Houses, and it requires the signature of the President of the United States.

That is all it does. It says that there are two grave things in this country, not just one, that can occur to tear at the guts of our society. One is war and the other is a horrible depression like the one that we had in the 1930's when 25 percent of the people in America who wanted work could not find work.

I am here to say to my colleagues that there is value in this amendment. It is supported by a majority of the American people. I am sure that this Congress will work its will in the interests of the people of this country. I want to say, however, that each time I return to my State and have townhall meetings and answer the questions of the folks in the audience, I have said that one of my principal reservations about this amendment is that it waives the three-fifths rule for a declaration of war when you can get 100 percent, but it does nothing about the economic emergencies.

People rise as a body and say, "I cannot believe that," because they know and they understand the desperate circumstances of those times.

Our country is in those kinds of circumstances now and I suggest to you, Mr. President, that the people of the country are looking at what we do here.

This is a narrow, carefully constructed amendment that will insure the viability of Senate Joint Resolution 58. It will not hurt it; it makes it workable.

It makes section 3 apply to the two serious consequences we face in this country: war and depression.

Let me just say this in conslusion: My friend the distinguished Senator from Vermont has a number of amendments laid down that we will shortly vote on in which he challenges the Senate. He says in amendment 1, would you waive it if unemployment was 20 percent and 22 million people were unemployed?

Then he goes down the list through a lot of other amendments. I must say to my friend that is probably not the kind of thing that ought to be in the Constitution, but I know what he is trying to say. He is trying to say when is it so desperate that the Congress will response in the proper manner? I say to you that ought to be a judgment call of the Congress and the President. That is why I have offered you the opportunity to adopt this language, this very restricted language, which says that in addition to a declaration of war that we may waive it in any fiscal year in which a joint resolution, adopted by both Houses of the Congress and signed by the President of the United States of America, declares that a national economic emergency is in effect.

Mr. President, I earnestly solicit the support of my colleagues in the adoption of Amendment No. 1941 to Senate Joint Resolution 58.

I yield back any remaining time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, how mush time have I remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 20 minutes.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise in opposition to this amendment. The amendment is narrower than the Cranston amendment, but it is still a loophole. What is a national economic emergency? That could include just about anything. As I have mentioned previously today I can recall not too long ago Congress enacted several laws pertaining to emergencies. One was the National Defense Education Act. Another was the National Energy Conservation Policy Act. Another was the Emergency Energy Conservation Act. Another was the Emergency Insured Student Loan Act of 1969. Another was the Emergency Interim Consumer Product Safety Standards Act. Another was the Emergency Natural Gas Act of 1977. Another was the Emergency School Aid Act.

Mr. President, we can see that if we adopt this amendment we are allowing a loophole in which many, many legislative steps could be taken to offset the purpose of this amendment.

The purpose of this amendment is to require a balanced budget. Since Congress had not shown the restraint to do this but one time in the last 21 years, but twice in the last 25 years, we feel the only way we are going to get it done is to put it in the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. President, if there is a national economic emergency of such importance to the country, then I have no doubt Congress will vote by three-fifths to approve legislation to meet that emergency.

The Dixon amendment would simply provide a constitutional waiver, not requiring any vote by Congress.

Mr. President, I am convinced that we cannot afford to adopt this amendment. We want to get this budget balanced. I think we have to pass this constitutional amendment to do it. We do not want any loopholes.

The only thing we have now is in case of war or if both bodies of Congress vote three-fifths. If there is a real emergency existing, do you not believe that both bodies will vote three-fifths? If they do not do that, it is probably not the emergency it is purported to be.

Mr. President, I hope the Senate sees fit to kill this amendment and I shall vote against it.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, will my distinguished friend from South Carolina yield for a question?

Mr. THURMOND. I yield.

Mr. DIXON. The Senator has suggested the question of economic emergencies is one of some debate. I would ask the Senator, are there circumstances under which the Senator believes it would be appropriate to vote an unbalanced budget in a fiscal year in which there was a serious economic emergency in this country? Does the Senator see such a circumstance?

Mr. THURMOND. In response to the able Senator from Illinois, I would say there might be some time when there would be an economic emergency or some other kind of emergency.

In that event, I think three-fifths of both bodies would vote to recognize that emergency and take action to offset it.

Mr. DIXON. Would my distinguished friend further suggest his view concerning whether three-fifths of the Congress would vote for an unbalanced budget in a time of war? The Senator believes that would occur, does he not?

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, in time of war, this amendment does not apply.

Mr. DIXON. Why should we have section 3 as a loophole now in the amendment, I ask the distinguished Senator from South Carolina, if he is so confident such a vote can be obtained? Why have such a loophole in there such as section 3, which waives it in the event of declaration of war?

Mr. THURMOND. After the Korean conflict, we had an emergency that lasted 10 years. We do not want the power to exist to carry on an emergency for 10 years. We never will get the budget balanced if we do not make up our mind we are going to take the steps to do it.

I believe if a real emergency arises, we can get three-fifths of both bodies to take the action necessary to offset that.

Mr. DIXON. Does the Senator not believe that we can do that for a war, obtain three-fifths for a war?

Mr. THURMOND. It is not necessary to get it——

Mr. DIXON. I realize it is not, Mr. President. I respond to the distinguished Senator, for whom I have the greatest personal regard, that if we can obtain three-fifths for the greatest economic emergency of a country, we can surely obtain three-fifths when we are in flames and there is a war going on. Why did he make a loophole for one, why contradict his own most stirring arguments by making a loophole for wars when he does not make one for depressions?

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, if we have a declaration of war, I say to the Senator, if we have a war going on, the whole country has to rally around that. It is against an external enemy which could destroy our freedom. I think it is absolutely necessary that this amendment be waived in time of war. I think it would be unwise not to.

Mr. DIXON. I do not quarrel with the distinguished Senator's remarks in that regard. I suggest that 100 percent of us would vote for an unbalanced budget in the event of a war. I suggest that that is the obvious one. We are including in this amendment the very thing that is so obvious it does not need to be in there. I am suggesting that if we would permit a waiver for a declaration of war, surely we should permit it for the declaration of an economic emergency requirement after both Houses of Congress and the President of the United States have declared it.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I cannot agree on that because there would be too many requests for economic emergencies. I just read seven or eight a while ago, where it was said there was an emergency, a national emergency of some kind or another. This could be used as excuse just to establish an emergency when, probably, no real emergency exists.

War is different. Our very liberties are at stake, our lives are at stake, our property is at stake. We have to waive it in time of war. These other matters in which someone may declare an economic emergency is a different thing. But that can still be done if we get three-fifths of both bodies.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator from South Carolina yield me 3 minutes?

Mr. THURMOND. I am very pleased to yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, I have already spoken in opposition to this amendment, because I feel it would really render ineffective the proposed constitutional amendment to mandate a balanced budget. But I want to make a few brief comments on the speech made by the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. BUMPERS).

I thought he raised good points. Many of those points I agree with. He made one statement which I certainly hope will come to pass. He asserted that he felt that, if this constitutional amendment is ratified, when it comes to waving by three-fifths vote the requirement for a balanced budget, that would become the issue in all of the congressional campaigns.

I want to say that I hope that that will be the case, Mr. President. I am not sure it will be, but I hope it will be the case. Assuming it is the case, I think that is one of the most compelling reasons, one of the most important reasons, for supporting the balanced budget amendment now before the Senate.

The Senator from Arkansas also said that he voted against the Senate budget resolution. I want to say the Senator from Virginia also voted against the Senate budget resolution. That budget resolution, Mr. President, provides for spending which will increase the national debt by 44 percent during the 3 years and 5 months ending September 30, 1985.

I am very glad that I did vote against that budget resolution. The deficits set out are beyond reason and the figure in the budget resolution calling for a national debt of $1,522 trillion by September 30, 1985, is a figure that I could not and would not support. It is because of the uncontrolled spending by the Congress itself that something needs to be done. I do not know of any other method of bringing some discipline to the Congress than by a constitutional amendment.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I commend the able Senator from Virginia for his remarks—not only his remarks on the constitutional amendment but for the stand he has taken here for years and years. He has taken the stand that his father, Harry F. Byrd, Sr., took. That is a sound stand.

That has been to operate on a balanced budget, to exercise fiscal restraint, to show fiscal responsibility. No man has been sounder on this question of fiscal policy than the distinguished Senator from Virginia (Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR.).

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HEINZ). The Senator has 8½ minutes.

Mr. THURMOND. I am willing to yield back my time if the able Senator from Illinois is willing to yield back his time.

Mr. DIXON. I yield back my time, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. DURENBERGER) is necessarily absent.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Nevada (Mr. CANNON) is necessarily absent.

I further announce that the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. TSONGAS) is absent on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber wishing to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 67—as follows:

NOT VOTING—3

Cannon	Durenberger	Tsongas

So the amendment (No. 1941) was rejected.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. THURMOND and Mr. MATTINGLY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina is recognized.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

AMENDMENT NO. 1930

(Purpose: To limit budget outlays for a fiscal year to not more than 20 per centum of gross national product for such fiscal year)

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, I call up amendment No. 1930 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Georgia (Mr. MATTINGLY) for himself and Mr. MCCLURE proposes amendment numbered 1930.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 4, between lines 5 and 6, insert the following:

"'SECTION 3. Total outlays set forth in a statement of receipts and outlays adopted pursuant to section 1 of this article for any fiscal year shall not exceed an amount equal to the greater of—

"'(a) the difference between—

"'(1) an amount which bears the same relationship to the gross national product of the United States at the close of such fiscal year as outlays for the preceding fiscal year bear to the gross national product of the United States at the close of such preceding fiscal year, and

"'(2) an amount which is equal to 1 per centum of the gross national product for such fiscal year; or

"'(b) 20 per centum of the gross national product for such fiscal year.'".

On page 4, line 6, strike out "3" and insert in lieu thereof "4".

On page 4, line 13, strike out "5" and insert in lieu thereof "6".

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, I shall speak on an amendment to Senate Joint Resolution 58, the constitutional amendment to balance the budget, and my amendment and Senator MCCLURE's amendment with reference to the gross national product.

First, we all have to admit that we have grave economic problems in the United States. Problems that have been blamed on the budget process, Federal reserve policy, the need for more taxes, off-budget spending by the Federal Financing Bank, recessions, inflation, not enough jobs, declining foreign trade, and many other reasons. But the real problem stems from only one element, and that is Government overspending.

The answer to that problem is to stop the Government from overspending. And how do you do that?

We could pass a constitutional amendment limiting the terms of Senators and Representatives. That might be the only way Congress would be able to resist pressure from special interests promising campaign contributions and votes in exchange for more Federal spending in their pet area. Certainly, the history of Congress is evidence of its inability to say no.

That would be one solution. But I have yet to see a groundswell of support in Congress for that idea.

The second sure method of reducing Government spending would be to pass a constitutional amendment to balance the budget such as we are considering here today. But we must add one provision. There must be a mandate to reduce Federal spending as a percentage of the gross national product by 1 percent per year until such outlays equal 20-percent of the gross national product.

A balanced budget loses its allure if it allows the Federal Government to take one-fourth of the gross national product. That does not lift the burden of a bloated Government from the backs of the taxpayers.

The Mattingly-McClure amendment would require that the level of Federal spending be reduced by 1 percent per year until that level is no more than 20 percent of the American gross national product. Why 20 percent? I did not just pick that number out of the air. As a matter of fact, history shows that the 20 percent figure is the optimum spending level for the Federal Government. During the greatest period of modern economic growth in America * * * the post World War II period of the fifties and sixties * * * economic growth averaged between 4 and 7 percent. During that same period, inflation averaged around 2 percent and productivity growth averaged about 3 percent. What was the level of Government spending during that period? It was between 18 and 20 percent of gross national product.

In the seventies, the level of Federal spending began to grow, going over 20 percent of gross national product for the first time since the war economy of the 1940's. During the 1970's, inflation went into double digits, average economic growth fell to 3 percent, and productivity growth fell to less than 2 percent. Today we have a Federal budget that confiscates more than 24 percent of gross national product. And what do we have? We have zero growth and falling productivity. In short, we have a shrinking economic pie.

There is another reason for choosing the 20-percent level. At 20 percent of gross national product, each American worker must work 1 day of each week to produce the goods and services that pay for the Federal budget. Now I ask my colleagues, do you want to tell the American worker that is not enough? He must also work Tuesday morning, or all day Tuesday as well, or part of Wednesday before he can take home any of his paycheck?

While the current fiscal year spending will run over 24 percent of the gross national product, our tax revenues will be about 20 percent. This gap is expected to produce a budget deficit of over $100 billion, the biggest in history. The percentage limit on spending and outlays will strengthen the credibility of the Reagan program by promising to lower deficits without further tax increases. But, it would also show that the Congress intends to be responsible for the first time in many years in the spending area.

We all know that tax revenues are going to continue to rise each year through fiscal year 1985. However, outlays or spending are increasing each year through 1985 by much larger amounts. Spending growth over revenue growth is the true cause of the growing basline deficit on which the budget debates and resolutions have focused. The key to further reductions lies in the expenditure side of the budget. But unless we legislate economic control and limit spending to a lower percentage of the gross national product, nothing will work. The old economic principles have been failing and are no longer reliable.

We in Congress labor through budget and appropriations calendars that are full of really meaningless and changing deadlines and nonbinding actions with confusing results that propel our country toward economic chaos by way of short-term initiatives. This problem must be faced and corrected.

The country's legislative process is in danger of becoming ineffective because of the actions being taken in lieu of binding, responsible, and fundamental reforms that would give stability and certainty to the people that we represent, the national economy, and our international responsibility.

To the hard-working U.S. citizens, to those who are really concerned in Congress, the question is: Is the Government functioning? The taxpayers ask the question: Why not bring to the floor of Congress and debate legislation that is in favor of the taxpayers, our national interests, and our international interests? In short, why can Congress not act to stop this cycle of inflation and recession?

I believe that thought or question should bring into our minds the realinement of our own sense of duty. What is the duty of a U.S. Senator? I feel that we must recross the gap of what we have become to what we were mandated to do by the Constitution. What we have become are Representatives who are avoiding decisions instead of really aiding our contituents. We do our jobs based more upon press and pressure groups than reality.

How should we really restore our priorities? Although there are many ways we all could answer this, one way would be to reinstitute our ability to listen, to study, to create, and to represent as citizen-legislators and to carry this debate in the Halls of the U.S. Senate. The constitutional amendment to balance the budget, with its percentage limit on the spending of the gross national product, is ready-made for this time in the history of our country. This could be Congress' finest hour. Today, we are faced with economic conditions that are putting some of the best-managed American companies on the economic ropes. Capitalism, a system that built America, where Americans could invest today and get more back tomorrow, will simply not work with high interest rates and stagnant business conditions—unless, the gross national product is growing and continues to grow in a stable way.

The time has come to change our course. To get long-term interest rates down permanently, savings must be increased. This means controlling prospective Government deficits. The problem with the deficits is that they are a subtraction from national savings. Although there may be debates about whether the Federal Reserve Board should be part of the Treasury Department, the President and Congress have the economic power that belongs with political responsibility to control Government spending.

The interest rates can come down two ways. We can either bring them down with good economic policies or they will come down in the wake of a collapsing economy. Reality is that we have a budget that is uncontrollable and the past promises are in conflict with that reality.

"To govern is to choose." We have to choose what we can do. We have to discipline our good will. The people of the United States and the economy want a sense of control. Our budget and appropriation processes are not controlled. The current concentration by us in Congress on raising additional revenues could undercut the need for responsible fiscal policy. If we all could stand aside and observe, we could see that the markets and citizens would like to see three things addressed by the Congress: First, the entitlement programs; second the impending social security emergency, and third the concept of indexing. The Congress tackling those three issues straightforwardly would resolve our economic problems.

Those can only be brought about by the balanced budget constitutional amendment and a percentage limit on spending. By increasing taxes, the size of Government will be increased, not decreased. The critical issue once again, is the expenditure side of the ledger. The country has fallen victim to political economics. The core idea is to stimulate the private sector and trim the role of Government. We have been irresponsible for too long. The answer is here—a constitutional amendment with a reduction in Federal spending as a percentage of the gross national product by 1 percent per year until spending equals 20 percent of all of our goods and services production.

When this amendment—with our addition—is passed, legislation will then be searched out in earnest to spend the American public's money in Washington as frugally as people outside of Washington spending their money. We will be adopting many reforms that have long cried out for passage. They can only happen successfully after the passage of this bill.

Our Nation has a most basic problem—our lack of growth. We have not grown because the sources of growth have been obstructed by Federal policies such as the Tax Code, interaction with inflation, and the appropriation and misuse of resources by the Government.

The only beneficiary of all this has been the Federal Government, which has received a windfall for so many years from inflation, bracket creep—a reward for Government's failure to control inflation. The choice now is to raise taxes to reduce the deficits or to find a new and better way.

Whether the Government borrows or whether it taxes, the funds are pulled from the private sector in either case. But the taxes impose a larger cost in terms of reduced incentives for real growth. The lack of growth is what is responsible for much of the current deficit. Anything that would reduce real growth will tend to worsen the budget picture.

Very often, what the Congress may do will look good on paper, but will buy little or no progress toward stopping a budget problem, especially when it is compared to the economic costs to the whole Nation. I feel that we are in a position now with the economic recovery program that we should be extremely careful of generating major new revenues by changing the Tax Code. The facts are that the American public will be faced with rising taxes again in 1985 due to a scheduled payroll tax increase. If major budget changes are to be made, they should be made on the spending side. Increasing taxes does two bad things: First, taxes weaken the economy and are partially offset by slower growth. They encourage higher spending. Therefore, if this Government hopes to balance the budget by restraining spending and encouraging growth through a stable incentive-creating tax program, we have accomplished one-half of that program.

The expenditure side must be addressed by the balancing of the budget and by a percentage limit on this percentage of the gross national product. For the private sector to plan and have economic recovery, they must have stability in all policy.

I support the constitutional amendment to balance the budget. I support it because, first, it imposes a needed element of discipline on the Congress, an element of discipline that many Members of Congress seem incapable of accepting on an individual basis. Second, it will send a needed signal to the working men and women of this country, a signal that the Congress is finally willing to take concrete action to restrain the growth of the Federal budget, a signal that Congress is finally going to restore fairness and equity to the system.

But a constitutional mandate to balance the Federal budget will be worth no more than the paper it is written on if Federal spending is not tied to some reasonable limit. In fact, I can envision some Members of Congress gleefully voting for tax increase after tax increase only to go back home and justify the votes by claiming the Constitution made them do it. Although revenues are tied to national income in the balanced budget amendment, that can be set aside by a simple majority of Congress. That is not much of a limit.

We can have a reasonable balanced budget and a growing prosperous economy, or we can have a Federal budget that is balanced, but confiscates half of the American economy, stifling growth, institutionalizing inflation, and discouraging the creation of jobs. We can have a Federal budget that is tied to 20 percent of a growing, robust, economy or we can have a Federal budget that is 24 percent, or 25 or 26 percent of a static, shrinking, sick economy.

The decision is ours. The choice is simple. The consequences are great. I urge my colleagues to vote for this amendment, to vote for a real constitutional limit on the Federal budget.

Mr. THURMOND addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I will allot myself such time as may be required.

It is with great reluctance that I must rise to speak in opposition to the amendment being offered by the able Senator from Georgia. I know of no other Senator in this body who is more committed to restricting Government spending.

In the few years we have been fortunate to have the Senator from Georgia in the Senate, he has consistently voted against liberal spending programs and has voted for fiscal restraint.

Mr. President, the amendment Senator MATTINGLY proposes today is a reasonable amendment. He seeks to restrict the growth of the Federal Government and to curb the constant rise in tax increases to pay for that growth. I am sympathetic with that objective and stand arm in arm with the Senator in his efforts to achieve that goal. But I cannot do so on this pending resolution.

Mr. President, this amendment is suitable for separate legislation which, I believe, has been introduced previously by the distinguished Senator from Georgia. If considered as a separate measure, it would have my support. The amendment proposes to inject a formula into the pending constitutional amendment which would define outlays as they relate to the gross national product.

This formula, although a means to place limits on Government spending, would not be appropriate for a constitutional amendment. It would tend to lock a fixed economic theory into the amendment. We have tried to avoid doing that in Senate Joint Resolution 58 under consideration.

We have tried to avoid doing that in Senate Joint Resolution 58. We want to reverse the spending inclination, which we do in section 2 of the proposed amendment, but we do so in a flexible manner that allows for adjustments for a change in economic conditions.

Mr. President, I know the Senator from Georgia is sincere in his efforts to amend Senate Joint Resolution 58, so that Federal spending can be checked. He has a good idea, but, in my judgment, one that is just not appropriate as a part of this constitutional amendment. I must oppose the amendment.

Again, I must say in opposing this amendment that I hope he will consider withdrawing it and offering it as a statute.

I yield such time as the Senator from Utah may require.

Mr. HATCH. I thank the distinguished Senator.

Mr. President, I have enjoyed listening to the distinguished Senator from Georgia and I agree with the majority floor manager of this bill, Senator THURMOND, that his ideas are good ideas.

As I understand it, the distinguished Senator has incorporated these ideas in another piece of legislation numbered S. 2664. I feel inclined to support that legislation and to support him in legislation rather than on this constitutional amendment.

I personally feel that his amendment, if added to this constitutional amendment, would be totally inconsistent with the intent of Senate Joint Resolution 58 to create a more neutral budget process, one that is not biased toward higher spending and taxes, but one that is equally unbiased toward lower spending in taxes.

The proposed amendment would sharply skew the system in favor of lower spending and taxes. What we are trying to do is even up the system with this constitutional amendment to require a balanced budget or at least push toward a balanced budget.

While I personally support the policy of the distinguished Senator from Georgia—I do not believe that it is appropriate to incorporate it in the Constitution.

The purpose of this amendment, I emphasize again, is to create neutrality and to eliminate biases, one way or the other. The premise of the present constitutional amendment is that the Congress should not be able to increase spending without voting to pay for such spending.

If Congress is willing to vote for spending, then it is not the business of the Constitution to prevent the elected representatives of the people from doing this.

The Mattingly amendment would write in an ultimate 20-percent limit into the Constitution and I think, in terms of this particular amendment at this particular time in this particular debate, it would be inconsistent with the overall objective of what we have tried to do in this constitutional amendment which, by the way, is the first constitutional amendment in the history of this country to be brought to the floor of either body of the Congress concerning balancing the budget.

So I feel that, although I would support S. 2664, I would have great difficulty supporting the amendment with regard to the present Senate Joint Resolution 58. I certainly applaud the Senator for his good work in this area and his desire to get spending under control. I will support him on S. 2664 when the time comes.

I do hope that he will consider withdrawing this amendment when the time comes, as well.

We do have a spending limitation in here—an indirect but a very real spending limitation derived from the fact that Congress will be able to engage in new spending under this amendment only if it is also willing to stand up and vote for the necessary taxes. That is a real spending limitation.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, I will speak to that after the other supporters of this amendment come forth. I will speak about withdrawing the amendment at that time.

Mr. ROTH. Will the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. MATTINGLY. Yes.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I, too, would like to congratulate the distinguished Senator from Georgia for raising this issue. I think one of the most important problems this Nation faces is to bring the Federal budget under control, both by constitutional and statutory means.

As one who has long felt that it was important that we reduce to 18 percent the percentage of gross national product set by the Federal Government, I think that it is in order that you raise this proposal in the deliberations of the constitutional amendment.

I point out to the distinguished Senator from Georgia that, as part of the legislation introduced by JACK KEMP and myself to reduce the marginal rates of taxation by 30 percent over 3 years, I also included a provision that would have required, by statute, the Federal Government to reduce spending until it reached a maximum of 18 percent. Under our proposal, we would have reduced spending by 1 percent a year. Unfortunately, because of the difficult problems in the economy, we have seen the percentage of expenditures increasing despite a number of notable steps this Congress has taken to reduce spending.

I say to the distinguished Senator, who is also a member of the Government Operations Committee, of which I am chairman, that this legislation is pending before our committee and it will be given serious consideration. I look forward to working with him to see its ultimate adoption.

Mr. MATTINGLY. I thank the distinguished Senator from Delaware for his kind remarks. Senator MCCLURE and I will look forward to early hearings on S. 2664.

Mr. President, I say to the Senator from Utah that it is the intent of Senator MCCLURE and myself to take the amendment down and not be voted on at this time.

There is a reason for that. First, we both support the constitutional amendment that the Senator from Utah and Senator THURMOND has put forth very strongly, as the Senator well knows. But we do not want to see the constitutional amendment fail. And any excuse that could be given by the other body for this constitutional amendment, once it passes the U.S. Senate, to not come forward must be well thought out and no one would want that to happen.

We do not want to see the constitutional amendment bogged down by a flimsy excuse. The amendment that we offer is a serious amendment, as the Senator has said, but we also are cognizant that we do not want another Boston Tea Party in this country either. I think a constitutional amendment to balance the budget is one way to prevent that, and also to restore order to our country.

Mr. HATCH. I appreciate the comments of the Senator from Georgia. I think it is apparent that this amendment has good potential for passing by the requisite two-thirds vote. This amendment is long overdue. We have biases in Congress toward borrowing against the interest of this country, and toward deficit spending.

One reason this constitutional amendment has such a good opportunity for passage is that it is a bipartisan consensus amendment worked out over a long period of time with the help of our colleagues on the other side of the aisle. It began with Senator DECONCINI's bill. He deserves a great amount of credit on this particular issue, as do other Senators on the Democratic side of the aisle, for presaging what really is happening here today.

One of the issues which came before us as we considered well over 40 proposed constitutional amendments to require a balanced budget was whether or not we should have a spending restraint or spending limitation put into this. The consensus was that we should not write economic theory into the Constitution, and that we could not get a consensus if we did.

I think the reason those who oppose this amendment are having so much difficulty with it is because economic theory is not written into the Constitution. The Senate and the House can do whatever they want economically once this amendment is passed and ratified by 38 States. What they cannot do, however, is continue to deficit spend without openly voting for deficit spending. They cannot continue to increase taxes through automatic tax increases caused by inflationary bracket creep without a vote. They will have to vote to increase taxes. Provisions in the amendment require a super majority of a three-fifths vote before there can be an increase in the deficit and a constitutional majority of the whole number of each House, 218 Members of the House and 51 Senators, is required in order to increase taxes.

Because of these provisions we feel very strongly about holding the floor with regard to amendments.

Mr. MATTINGLY. I agree with the distinguished Senator from Utah. I believe we both agree that the Mattingly amendment would probably be adopted by the Senate, but in the long term, when it gets to the House, it would probably be precluded from getting to the rest of the country. It is for that reason that we bring the amendment down.

Mr. President, I ask that those Senators who wish to add their comments, Senator DOMENICI and others, in support of this amendment, be allowed to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MATTINGLY. I do not mean to slight the Senator from Arizona, Senator DECONCINI, on the tremendous amount of effort he has put in, that he would not want our amendment to pass.

Mr. DECONCINI. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. MATTINGLY. Yes.

Mr. DECONCINI. I compliment the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Idaho for the efforts they have put forth on behalf of this amendment. The Senator from Georgia has restated his commitment time and time again to reduce Federal spending as it relates to the GNP. He has set an example, along with the Senator from South Carolina, in consistently doing that. It is to their credit.

I agree with the Senator that I would like to see this spending limitation as a percent of GNP be implemented in legislation, and the sooner the better as far as this Senator is concerned. It would be no easy task to live with it, reducing from the present 24.5 percent as a percentage of GNP down to 20. It would be difficult. But it would force us to really look at the priorities of this country. I think that is what the Senator has very astutely brought to the attention of this body. I thank him for doing so. I hope he will be satisfied if we can do it someplace other than on this constitutional amendment because of the practicality of needing to pass this amendment in substantially the form it is in today.

Mr. MATTINGLY. I thank the distinguished Senator from Arizona.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ANDREWS). Who yields time?

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I would like to congratulate the Senator from Georgia and I rise in support of his amendment. I am an active supporter of the constitutional amendment to require a balanced budget, but the problem with the amendment is that it does not strictly limit total Government spending. The big spenders in Congress will still be able to purchase political prosperity at the expense of the taxpayers. They would be able to avoid responsibility for the tax increases required to cover such excessive spending by blaming the Constitution.

The Mattingly amendment would restrain the growth rate of Federal spending by limiting it to a specified share of the economy. Federal spending as a percent of the gross national product would be reduced by 1 percent a year until spending is no more than 20 percent of GNP.

While these limitations would curb the growth rate of Federal spending they would not require slashes in Government programs. These limitations would merely give the economy a chance to grow out from under the Government.

The spending limitations will also restore Government spending levels as a percent of GNP to the levels in effect prior to the spending excesses of the last 5 years. In the last 5 years spending has exceeded 22 percent of GNP. The last time that spending was less than 20 percent was in 1974. In the 20 years prior to 1975, spending as a percent of GMP averaged 19.3 percent. During the 1962-66 economic boom, spending average 18.5 percent of GNP.

It is important that ths amendment be adopted. I hope very much that we will have a rollcall vote on this amendment because it puts teeth into the concept of a truly balanced budget.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I compliment the Senator from Georgia for his amendment. I think his amendment would strengthen this constitutional amendment. I think it is possible that we may achieve the same goal, however, without this amendment, because there is definitely built into this constitutional amendment a bias in favor of those of us who wish to get a balanced budget and reduce the total burden of taxation in this country on money that is spent and consumed and the productivity of the country that is spent by Government. I think that, definitely, will happen once this constitutional amendment becomes ratified.

I compliment the Senators who are on the Committee on the Judiciary who brought this to the Senate floor. I welcome the opportunity to vote in favor of this constitutional amendment.

Of course, the amendment of the Senator from Georgia brings up what I think is a very interesting point; that is, why not have a limitation to the percentage of the gross national product that the Government and the politicians in Washington, D.C., can confiscate, take, consume, whatever, from the American people? But I do believe that what will happen is that the amendment, even in its present form—and, Mr. President, I predict that this amendment will be ratified if the American people are given the opportunity and if the State legislatures of this country are given the opportunity either to ratify or reject this amendment. This is something that the American people have long, long been asking for, some fiscal responsibility in Washington, D.C. It is something they have not yet been able to get.

While I have the floor, Mr. President, I wanted to ask the distinguished floor manager of this bill, the Senator from Utah, to engage in a discussion with me.

I had a discussion with the chairman of the Committee on Finance (Mr. DOLE) yesterday about the fact that it takes a three-fifths vote, under the amendment as written, three-fifths of both bodies, the House and the Senate, to have the country go further into debt. Is that correct?

Mr. HATCH. That is correct, Mr. President.

Mr. SYMMS. Is it the Senator's understanding that the reason it is not necessary to have three-fifths but only a majority vote to increase revenues is the other safeguards such as a Presidential veto or the use of a filibuster in this body, or whatever tactics could be used in the House?

Mr. HATCH. The Senator states it very clearly. In addition to that, there is a natural reticence on the part of Members of Congress to vote for a tax increase.

As the distinguished Senator from Idaho saw, what we decided on the floor is if there is a true national emergency, we will get the three-fifths vote. If there is not, we will not. It is as simple as that.

With regard to raising taxes, if we need to raise taxes to meet a particular spending program, then we shall be able to get the constitutional majority of the whole number. But there is going to be a natural reticence to do that because we know the folks back home do not like tax increases.

The requirements of a three-fifths majority or a constitutional majority, are generally agreed to and I am certain that this consensus amendment is going to fly.

Mr. SYMMS. I thank the Senator from Utah and compliment him on the effort he has made and his contribution.

I also want to say I cosponsored legislation with the Senator from Arizona which would lead us to the popular appeal that the flat-rate income tax now has. We had before the Joint Economic Committee yesterday two gentlemen from Stanford who discussed and testified to the flat-rate income tax.

I was thinking that this amendment, coupled to the Constitition and then, at some time, major reform in the income tax so that the general public feels that it is involved equitably in the tax system and paying a marginal rate on taxes on all earned income, somewhere between 15 and 20 percent, would certainly make it more simple for the general public to decide just what they want their Government to do for them or not do for them

I think the Senator makes an excellent point on the three-fifths vote in terms of an emergency. Who knows, it might even be that this constitutional amendment could be called the peace amendment, because there may be some time in the future when Congress would have to go into debt to finance or be engaged in some conflict in a foreign country and they simply would not want to do it. That would keep us out of foreign entanglements in a way we had not even thought of. So it could be that, in addition to fiscal responsibility, coupled with tax reform so it is out on top, I can see this might even be a peace amendment.

Mr. DECONCINI. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SYMMS. Yes, I yield.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Idaho makes a very valid point. The time is now for moving toward further equity, efficiency, and simplicity in our tax thinking as well as some real restriction and discipline on our expenditures of Federal dollars.

I hope the Senator is correct that passage of this constitutional amendment, along with a rethinking and restructuring of our tax system, will bring us to a point where people will have confidence in their Government once again. That is what is lacking in this country today. By the fact that we cannot discipline ourselves and control the budget, conmbined with the fact that the tax code is plethora of loopholes and a labyrinth for the unwary, the confidence of the people who have to pay the bill is lacking today both in this body and in the whole tax system.

We have an opportunity by first passing Senate Joint Resolution 58, and then, hopefully, through the tax reform the Senator is talking about, to have a more equitable situation where everybody will pay a fair share. I might add that the Senator from Idaho is a cosponsor of my bill S. 2147, creating a flat-rate income tax, and he is a strong supporter of that concept.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Georgia has expired. The only time remaining is that of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Would the Senator from South Carolina be willing to relinquish some of his time?

Mr. THURMOND. Let me say a word, first, Mr. President.

The Senator from Idaho asked a question. As the manager of the bill on this side, I should like to say another word to him about this.

Section 1 addresses the element of the spending bias related to the Congress' unlimited accessibility to deficit spending. An extraordinary majority—in this case a three-fifths majority—is necessary to overcome this element of the bias. Section 2 addresses the second element of the spending bias related to the availability of automatic tax increases. An extraordinary majority was not essential in this section in order to overcome this bias, simply the requirement that Congress go on record before tax increases were imposed upon the people. The requirement of a constitutional majority in section 2, i.e., a majority of the entire membership of each House of Congress, is designed to ensure that any tax increase vote takes place under conditions of maximum political visibility.

We think that explains the question the Senator propounds. I hope it does.

Mr. SYMMS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. McCLURE. Will the Senator yield 5 minutes?

Mr. THURMOND. I am very pleased to yield to the distinguished Senator from Idaho.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Will the Senator yield so I may make one comment for the record?

Mr. McCLURE. I am happy to yield.

Mr. MATTINGLY. At any place in this record where we refer to S. 1930 or the word "amendment," I ask to have it correctly read the Mattingly-McClure amendment.

Mr. McCLURE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. THURMOND. How much time does the Senator want?

Mr. McCLURE. Five minutes.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Idaho.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho is recognized.

Mr. McCLURE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I am proud to rise today to introduce with my distinguished colleague from Georgia (Mr. MATTINGLY) an amendment to the proposed constitutional amendment to balance the budget. Let me make it clear that I am, and always will be, a strong supporter of a balanced budget. Government spending is bleeding our Nation dry. Those on both sides of the aisle see it and now must address it. The American people delivered a clear message in November of 1980. They are tired of wasted tax dollars, they are tired of inefficient agencies, and they know that deficits are strangling our economy and their livelihood.

However, I sense, as many of my colleagues do, that the American people feel that this is a superficial gesture by Congress that is riddled with loopholes and inequities that will easily be bypassed. We all agree that it is imperative the Federal Government adopt and stick to a policy of spending no more than it takes in as revenue. This is a give and we all agree with this. It means that accomplishing this goal is what we disagree on. Limiting the size of Government is essential if we are to get the economy moving at full capacity again.

I saw the irresponsible direction Government spending was taking as a freshman Congressman and supported a measure in the 90th Congress to require a single appropriations bill so that we might more closely examine total Government spending and facilitate its control. Throughout my service in Congress, I have supported legislation to limit expenditures from exceeding revenues. For too long we have failed in any attempt to set spending priorities for the Government. Instead, we have appropriated for the collective priority of everyone, every Member and every special interest. With all due respect to the distinguished chairman and ranking minority member of the Budget Committee, the Budget Act has not worked as it was intended. The bottom line is that even with this act we are still unwilling to control spending. Unfortunately, even if this constitutional amendment is passed and is ratified—and I predict that it will be—I still question whether spending would be controlled.

Certainly we could balance the budget by taxing our citizens at a rate of 60 or 80 percent but what would that accomplish? What will a further tax burden do to an already fragile economy? Unless we continue to change the direction of this country, government at all levels will take 54 percent of every dollar we make by 1984. High taxes are choking the economy by penalizing productivity, thrift, and investment.

If we look back to the 1950's and 1960's when Federal spending took a smaller share of our economy, we were much more productive. In the 1960's Federal spending was about 18 percent of our GNP. During this period our economy, as it is measured by GNP, grew 6.72 percent. In the seventies during Congress freewheeling spending spree, Federal spending as a percentage of GNP was 24 percent and at the same time our inflation rate was above 7 percent and the growth of our economy was only 3 percent. There is no doubt that as Federal spending consumes more and more of our economy we are less productive and we turn to inflationary policies to make up the difference. Experts predict that this year, even with the hard work of the Appropriations Committee, Federal spending could surpass 24 percent, thus further choking the productive side or our economy.

During the last 80 years prices have increased 7 times, population has tripled, but the outstanding Government debt has increased 500 times. We must realize that money expenditures do not solve social problems. The world's longest experiment conducted on this subject by this body has failed and we should learn from this. More money spent on a bad idea will not make that idea good. We have tried that so many times it should be obvious to all Senators that it does not work.

The amendment we are introducing today will go a long way to reaffirm valid financial standards. By reducing the Federal Government's share of GNP 1 percent a year until it is back down to productive levels of 20 percent, we will go a long way to restore responsibility to government. It should be very clear to us that the American people feel that modern government is out of control. They are correct. This year we can fully expect to spend $100 billion on interest payments on our debt alone.

The time is now to draw the line and give the American people exactly what they want and what the economy needs: A budget that is balanced by taking the foot off of the neck of the economy.

I ask all of my colleagues to join me in support of this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The 5 minutes yielded to the Senator from Idaho have expired.

Mr. McCLURE. Will the Senator yield 2 additional minutes?

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I yield such additional time as the able Senator from Idaho may require.

Mr. McCLURE. I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. President, sometimes individual examples are more persuasive than abstract principle. When leisure becomes more rewarding to a laboring person than does the after-tax rewards of their labor, they choose leisure. They are not stupid. The sawmill worker in northern Idaho suddenly was sick every other Friday afternoon and his employers naturally doubted whether that was fact, and they called him in and said, "Hank, we notice that you are sick every other Friday afternoon and we don't believe it." And he said, "Well, you are right. The first Friday afternoon I was sick. I could hardly get home and into bed. I was in bed all weekend, I could hardly get back to work on Monday morning, but when I got my check for that week it was only a few dollars less than if I had worked on Friday afternoon. And, frankly, my Friday afternoon is worth more than that to me."

Not a lazy American worker, a smart American doing what our system tells him to do, and that is to choose leisure as more rewarding to him than the after-tax rewards of labor.

That is what this amendment is all about, to try to get spending back down to the limits where Americans begin to say that the rewards of labor are more important to them than the rewards of leisure. We will never attain that in our system as long as the burden of taxation continues to rise. As important as the amendment is as reported by the Judiciary Committee, it does not do all of the job that needs to be done because spending can continue to rise under the amendment.

I think the Senator from Utah and the Senator from South Carolina are to be commended highly for having gotten this bill to the floor, and I do not mean to subtract that at all. I think that the conclusion that I must reach is that this amendment is crafted the way it is, without a limitation on spending, upon a judgment of the people that are involved in getting it passed that to go further would guarantee its defeat rather than its passage.

We voted last week on a tax measure that I do not like because we had earlier voted on a budget resolution that included within it a provision that I did not like, that we had to enhance revenues rather than reduce expenditures further. That provision was in the budget resolution which I supported simply on the same kind of a calculation, that that was necessary in order to produce a consensus that could pass.

So, Mr. President, while I strongly support the amendment, I also believe very strongly that there should be a limitation on the amount of money the Government could spend, rather than just the requirement that the budget be balanced, even though it may be by ever-increasing levels of taxation.

There are those who tell us that we are undertaxed, that the American public pays less than other countries do. But that is one of the unique aspects of the American scene—that we are not like other countries. We are free people, and we cherish our freedom. We do not like the idea of government taking away from us, as a matter of right, more than half of all we make, and that is what Government at all levels is doing today.

I cherish the thought that a free people, working in a free society, are more productive as well as more free. While other societies may opt for less freedom and may accept higher burdens of taxation, that is not the American way, and I hope it never will be.

I thank the Senator from South Carolina for yielding, and I again commend the committee for having brought this matter to the floor.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I commend the able senior Senator from Idaho for the splendid statement he has made on this matter.

I am sure he understands that we do not feel this is an appropriate place for this amendment, on this constitutional amendment, because we cannot load it down with everything we like. However, as I previously told the distinguished Senator from Georgia, I will be pleased to support legislation along that line, and I hope he will pursue that. I hope the able Senator from Idaho will assist in that.

Mr. McCLURE. I thank the Senator for that. We will pursue the legislative enactment of the provision that is contained in the proposed amendment.

Also, just as the time has arrived for the passage of the amendment which the Committee on the Judiciary has brought to the floor, there will be a time, I will predict, when this Senate, this Congress, and this country will adopt a constitutional amendment such as that which is being offered by the distinguished Senator from Georgia and me this afternoon.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I yield such time as the Senator from Georgia may require.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina yields 3 seconds to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, at this time, the distinguished Senator from Idaho and I wish to withdraw the amendment, so that we may have rapid passage, in the Senate and the House of Representatives, of the constitutional amendment to balance the budget.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Idaho for agreeing to do that. They may be assured that when this does come up, it will receive support.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Since the amendment of the Senator from Georgia was not specified in the agreement, the Senator has a right to withdraw the amendment, and it is withdrawn.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, we are ready to proceed, if any Senator has an amendment. If anyone has an amendment to this constitutional amendment, we are ready to proceed.

In the meantime, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I take this time only to make a further comment with respect to the pending amendment and to ask a question of the distinguished Senator from Utah, the chairman of the subcommittee that considered and developed this legislation in the Judiciary Committee.

If there is one danger that I see to the public understanding of the amendment as presented to the Senate, it is that it is being oversold by some people or, perhaps to state it in the converse, some of the critics of the amendment are trying to state that it will not do what it obviously cannot do.

It is a limited amendment. It is limited simply because it is impossible to get a stronger one through, or at least it is thought by many of us that to strengthen the mandatory provisions of the bill would make it impossible to get the two-thirds vote that is necessary in the Senate and would make it more difficult, if not impossible, for those in the other body to get the discharge petition that would appear to be necessary to get it to consideration in the other body.

I think the Senator from Utah does agree with me, however, that this amendment is no panacea. It does not automatically balance the budget. It does not automatically restrict the increase in Government spending. It simply makes it more difficult for people to spend more, for Congress to spend more money than it has. It makes it more difficult for Congress to add to the national debt. It makes it slightly more difficult for the Government to raise additional revenues by increasing the flow of revenue because of bracket creep or because of enactment of new taxes and specific procedures are called for.

However, I think a great many of the people who criticize the amendment do so in the words that it will not automatically guarantee that the budget will be balanced. I believe the sponsors of the amendment will agree that it does not guarantee that the budget would be balanced.

I think some of those who have criticized the amendment will at one time say it does not guarantee it and on the other hand, and at the same time, say that it is too rigid, that there need to be exceptions, as we have seen with respect to certain amendments that have been offered and rejected already, with respect to various kinds of emergencies that might be defined in the amendments or ill-defined in the amendments that have been offered.

The Senator from Utah will agree with me, will he not, that this amendment is not the panacea or the guarantee that some people have claimed it is or is not?

Mr. HATCH. I do agree. This amendment should never be represented as a panacea for all our economic problems.

First of all, the process of getting the amendment passed in the Senate and the House, and getting 38 States to ratify it, will take approximately 2 years. This amendment becomes effective in the second fiscal year after ratification by the 38th State. So we are talking about fiscal 1986 or 1987.

In addition, this amendment depends upon dedicated administrations working with budget-minded Congresses to try to get spending under control. This has been almost impossible considering we have balanced the budet only once in 23 years. We have a national debt of over $1 trillion. The interest against that will probably be more than $130 billion next year, which is more than the entire Federal budget was just 20 years ago.

We have proved that unless we have some constraints put on Congress, we will never get spending under control. This is an amendment which will put constraints on Congress to eliminate the bias in favor of spending and produce a bias in favor of a balanced budget.

The Senator is correct. This amendment, if passed, does not eliminate the need for Members of Congress who are willing to live up to the oaths they take when they become Members of Congress to uphold the Constitution of the United States.

It is going to take good Members of Congress who really do work within the constitutional constraints that this amendment provides for to achieve balanced budgets in the future. I think that this amendment does get us going in that direction, but it does not solve all the problems.

All of our Members have differing prescriptions for overcoming these economic problems but we believe that this amendment should be viewed as a major step toward securing a political environment in which fiscally responsible policies will be more easily enacted and followed.

Mr. McCLURE. I thank the Senator for that statement because I think there is a great deal of misunderstanding being fostered by opponents of the amendment who seek to set up an impossible standard and say that this amendment does not meet it.

I agree fully with the Senator from Utah, that it just makes it easier to be fiscally responsible and less easy to be irresponsible in the spending policies of the Federal Government.

For that reason I strongly support the amendment in spite of the fact that I wish that we had a stronger provision and I look forward confidently to the time that we can by statute and perhaps by future constitutional amendment strengthen this provision so that we have stronger measures to guarantee the fiscal prudency and the reduction in the size of Government that I think is essential.

But there have been those who have argued against the amendment on the basis that Government cannot possibly live without a deficit, that there are times when Government simply cannot get by without running deficits.

There is the safety valve of the three-fifths vote, of course.

But my State of Idaho has existed under a constitutional amendment in that State requiring a balanced budget, and we just recently ran through that requirement in Idaho in a very marked way because as the fiscal year ended on June 30 the revenues for the government were less than had been expected and therefore there was to be a deficit at the end of the fiscal year. The Governor of my State, a Democrat, working under the requirements of the constitution of the State of Idaho, met that mandate by two actions, and people can quarrel with those actions as to whether they were the right ones or not, and said, first of all, that all State employees workweeks would be reduced to 4 days and they would be paid 80 percent of their salary for the last 5 weeks of the fiscal year. Some people have criticized that action as having unduly burdened one segment of the economy with the burden of balancing the budget.

Second, he deferred some expenditures from the 1 fiscal year past the end of the month. He simply did not pay bills. Among the bills that he did not pay were tax refunds due citizens who had filed for tax refunds, and they were due. He simply did not mail the checks to them until after July 1, and he then burdened the next fiscal year with the burden of the prior fiscal year's spending. That defers the problem until the next fiscal year when it will be worse, but nevetheless he did balance expenditures and revenues as mandated by the constitution of our State.

It can be done. It is not always as pleasant as spending money, but that is the reason we are in the trouble we are in today. It is always easier to spend money than it is to withhold. Once in a while those of us who are in office need the additional courage that is given to us by a constitutional mandate that says thou shalt not spend more than you have, and then we have the courage to say to groups who come to us wanting special favors or additional money that we are sorry, we just do not have the money.

It is far too easy and we have fallen into the habit of saying yes, we will give you the money, and if we run short we will just add to the national debt.

That is what has led to the problem we are in.

So while this is not a perfect measure, it certainly tends in the direction of giving us some fiscal restraint and responsibility which is sadly lacking today.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, as an original cosponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 58, I rise in support of this amendment. I believe that this legislation will set the stage for true fiscal discipline in Congress. It is about time.

Federal spending is out of control. This year the national debt will be $1.1 trillion. By 1985, it will have grown to $1.5 trillion. This $390 billion increase is greater than the total U.S. national debt in 1963. As the national debt has gotten larger, so have the costs of maintaining it. Interest on the national debt is $118 billion for fiscal year 1982 or $224,505 a minute. If your pulse rate is 72, the Federal Government spends $3,118 every time your heart beats. If every man, woman, and child in America were to pay for this in monthly installments, it would cost each of them $42.17 a month.

The constitutional amendment would reverse this trend by requiring that the Federal budget be balanced every year. The only exception would be in the case of war, or if Congress specifically votes to increase spending and "unbalance" the budget for a given year. The same holds true for tax increases.

Spending restraint is essential. The high cost of government has pushed all Americans to the economic brink. The budget passed by Congress last month was the result of a major effort to bring down spending and included reconciliation instructions to do so. Nevertheless, spending will be $769 billion in fiscal year 1983 and $881 billion in fiscal year 1985. The corresponding deficits are $104 billion and $60 billion. Despite our efforts this year and last, spending as a percentage of GNP will increase to 22 percent in 1983. Tax receipts are also on the rise. Despite the tax cuts, they are expected to rise to 19 percent of GNP in 1983. These levels are higher than they were 20 years ago when spending and tax receipts were 19.3 and 18.5 percent of GNP, respectively.

As I have already pointed out, the size of the national debt and spending have gotten out of hand in the past 20 years. This must be stopped, since the total size of Government is a burden on all Americans. Milton Friedman, one of the leading advocates of this amendment, has often stated that the true burden of Government is the amount the Government spends, not only the amount that it taxes. The American public ends up paying for the Government both directly through taxes and indirectly through financing the deficit.

It is no understatement that the one thing we are all concerned about is high interest rates. These high rates are hurting nearly every sector of our economy. I believe that these high rates are caused by the uncertainty on Wall Street as to future monetary and fiscal policy. Even though we have brought inflation below 5 percent, interest rates remain intolerably high. This constitutional amendment should be a clear signal to the financial markets that Congress is putting its fiscal house in order, so that interest rates can come down and economic recovery can begin.

Mr. President, in each year since 1969, the Federal budget has been in ever increasing deficit. The size of the deficits in recent years has been a major cause of our economic problems.

It is true that the deficits as a percentage of GNP do not exceed the average trend. Unfortunately, we finance the deficit with savings, not the GNP as a whole. From 1965 to 1975, Americans saved an average of 7.6 percent of their disposable income. Since then, the savings rate has declined to 5.6 percent. As savings have been erroded by double-digit inflation and a tax code that punishes savers, the total amount of savings remaining has declined. Specifically, the 2-percent drop in the savings rate has resulted in $48 billion less in savings available to finance investment, repayment of debt, and Federal borrowing. As Federal spending has increased, the savings left for investment have been squeezed tighter and tighter. In essence, investment has been crowded out.

Worse yet, the increasing size of the deficits have caused Congress and the Federal Reserve to impose countermeasures that are harmful in the long run. The Fed is pressured by the size of the deficits to finance them by printing more money. This does lessen the problem of crowding out, but it also creates a situation of too many dollars chasing too few goods. That translates into inflation.

In the meantime, Congress is pressured into reducing the size of the deficits in the most politically expedient manner—by raising taxes. Though much of the tax increases in the past years have been the result of inflation—bracket creep—and not specific action by Congress, Congress has taken full advantage of rising tax receipts. This amendment would make these automatic tax increases difficult. Tax receipts as a percentage of total economic activity (GNP) would be held constant from year to year, unless a majority of both Houses pass a specific bill to increase taxes.

So far, 31 States have called for a constitutional convention to mandate a balanced budget. Only three more States are needed to actually convene a convention. With the will of the American people so clearly evident, Congress should pass this amendment and eliminate the need for a convention.

In Congress, the response to the public call for a constitutionally mandated balanced budget has been growing. I am 1 of 61 Senate cosponsors of Senate Joint Resolution 58. A House of Representatives version of this bill has 223 cosponsors.

Mr. President, I hope that Congress will succeed in passing this amendment to require a balanced budget. I recognize that serious fiscal restraint can only occur if Congress is fundamentally committed to it. Although this amendment does not guarantee that Congress will reduce spending and taxing, it does give us one more tool for bringing this about. Those who drafted this amendment believe that it will promote true fiscal discipline in Congress, since it goes beyond the simple statutory legislation we have now. I hope that they are correct, and I urge its immediate adoption.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, the distinguished senior Senator from Connecticut is here and has a statement at this time.

Mr. WEICKER. I thank the distinguished chairman.

Mr. President, Carl Becker once said that:

> Economic distress will teach men, if anything can, that realities are less dangerous than fancies, that fact-finding is more effective than fault-finding.

Unfortunately, fanciful formulae and not facts are the order of the day.

We are asked to endorse a constitutional amendment to balance the Federal budget. This legislation, Senate Joint Resolution 58, would require Congress to project a balanced budget for each fiscal year, with planned outlays equaling planned receipts. To do otherwise, except in wartime, would require a three-fifths vote of both Houses. In addition, tax revenues could not legally rise faster than national income rises.

As the economy has nosedived, the balanced budget initiative has picked up steam—and 60 Senate cosponsors. But the irony of this should not be lost on anyone in this Chamber. Just weeks ago, this same Senate was struggling to being the projected deficit down from $180 billion to the $100 billion range. This same Senate refused to eliminate the 1983 individual income tax cut or slow down the defense buildup, the two surest ways to a lower deficit. And this same Senate has been forced to approve supplemental appropriations for programs and agencies that are already running out of fiscal year 1982 funds.

It is always easier to approve some abstract principle than grapple with grim realities. Time magazine compared President Reagan's support for the amendment to "the Nation's leading distiller coming out in favor of Prohibition." Well, having Congress endorse this measure is akin to deputizing the biggest bootleggers in the country to enforce the law.

Let me assure you that no Member of Congress is more concerned than I am about the size of the Federal deficit, what it is doing to interest rates and what they are doing to average Americans. I voted against the first budget resolution precisely because it failed to address the deficit in a serious fashion. I said then that the Senate may have bought off on a $115 billion budget deficit, but the American people have not.

Now, the heat is on those legislators who did accept that deficit and they are hunting a way out. But believe me, the balanced budget amendment is not some magic wand with which to wave away the deficit. It simply is not the antidote for our economic distress. What it is is bad economics, bad law, and bad government. And it can only add to our problems, not solve them.

When Presidential candidate Reagan promised to finance a sizable tax cut and an unprecedented defense buildup and still balance the budget, rival candidate GEORGE BUSH called this "voodoo economics." Now, it appears to be Congress' turn to stick pins in the doll, for the balanced budget amendment is voodoo economics, nothing less and nothing more.

Prior to the Great Depression and the acceptance of deficit financing, the American economy rocked back and forth between boom and bust. If anything, history has vindicated, not repudiated, the approach John Maynard Keynes took toward recessions. Even President Reagan's effort to stimulate investment via a tax cut is a tip of the hat to the Keynesian tradition.

Without flexibility on the Federal Government's part to stimulate and stabilize the economy, a recession can quickly become a depression. A study conducted by the Council of Economic Advisers in 1979 showed that if the Federal budget had been balanced during the 1974–75 recession, real GNP in 1975 would have plunged by 12 rather than 2½ percent and unemployment would have shot up to 12 percent rather than 8½ percent.

The balanced budget amendment would take away that flexibility. If a slowed-down economy generated lower Federal tax receipts and threatened to cause a deficit, the commitment to balance the budget would call for spending cuts or tax increases, either of which would only further reduce economic activity. On the other hand, if the Government were also obligated to avoid surpluses, higher income and higher tax receipts might force high expenditures at the very time when stabilization policy would call for less.

What we are setting ourselves up for is economic lockjaw. Assuming the amendment does pass the Congress, its ratification by the States would take time, perhaps as long as 7 years or more. In the meantime, deficits would grow, interest rates would stay up there on the ceiling, and unemployment would, most likely, keep climbing.

So, the balanced budget amendment is bad economics. It is also bad law, because it attempts to write into the Constitution a responsibility that properly belongs to the day-to-day decisions of the Congress and the executive branch.

From their writings we know that the Founding Fathers intended the Constitution to be the broadest statement of our rights and liberties as Americans. To craft it as a Christmas tree on which to hang every hot political issue is not worthy of our political heritage. One amendment would further restrict access to abortions. Another would establish a mechanism for determining Senatorial pay. Two others would make official prayers and segregation acceptable again in our public schools.

But the Constitution was never intended to be the vehicle for advancing the beliefs of any subset of the American people. Rather, it was intended to protect all Americans against the tyranny of the few or the many.

It may very well be that in these trying economic times, a majority of Americans are anxious to grasp at any straw that holds out the possibility of control over our economic destiny. Thirty-one of the necessary 34 States have called for a Constitutional Convention to consider a balanced budget amendment. Such a convention could play havoc with our national charter and should be avoided if at all possible. However, this resolution should be considered on its merits, not rammed through just to avoid a Constitutional Convention. And as far as the resolution's merits are concerned, I see none.

What if we pass this amendment and then in a decade from now deficit spending regains its political currency? Would we then propose and pass yet another constitutional amendment making that the law of the land? No, of course not. Economic dogma has no more business in the Constitution than religious dogma does.

The balanced budget amendment is the economic equivalent of Prohibition. Should it pass, Members of Congress would prove themselves as devious as moonshiners and bootleggers. They would find ways to place Federal spending beyond the reach of the budget process. They would resort to loan guarantees and regulation and pass costs through to State and local governments and the private sector. And who would stop them? The courts? Could the Appropriations Committee be hauled up on charges if the books do not balance.

Fourteen years after it was passed, Prohibition was repealed as unworkable and unenforceable. The balanced budget amendment, should it pass, will prove to be the same.

Finally, this amendment is bad government too. Most Americans are convinced that the Federal budget is running wild—and to a very real extent they are right. Federal spending has risen from $92 billion in fiscal year 1960 to more than $650 billion in fiscal year 1981, an increase of more than 700 percent. The American people are also convinced that Congress has all but caved in to special interest groups. To a very real extent it has. A balanced budget amendment will not, however, make legislators more responsible for their actions. In fact, it may very well encourage them to become less so.

The Washington Post writes:

> This amendment is an extreme example of the impulse to take all discretion out of economic policy, at whatever cost to rational government . . . It attempts to substitute a computer and a number. But the economic statistics are designed only to serve people who make decisions, not to replace them.

Many politicians would find the amendment a convenient smoke-screen behind which to keep doing business as usual. Federal Reserve Chairman Volcker has said that a vote on the balanced budget amendment "could be used as a substitute vote for doing something about the budget here and now." Rudolph Penner, director of tax policy studies at the conservative American Enterprise Institute, argues that the amendment's "main effect is to allow politicians to go firmly on record in favor of the concept of a balanced budget while continuing to allocate society's resources however they please."

The voting booth should be our ultimate safeguard against fiscal irresponsibility. The quality of the work product of any government rests squarely with the people who serve in it. I urge the American people to elect responsible representatives who are willing to make the tough decisions. I urge them to hold those officials accountable once they obtain office.

Accountability will not be achieved by throwing some switch and putting the economy on automatic pilot. Accountability depends upon individuals who have the strength of their convictions. It depends on individuals willing to legislatively tackle the tough issues, not try to hide behind a constitutional amendment. Accountability also depends upon people willing to vote and otherwise participate in our democracy, not abandon it to apathy.

Robert Hutchins once said that:

> The death of democracy is not likely to be an assassination from ambush. It will be a slow extinction from apathy, indifference and undernourishment.

Surely our democracy is malnourished when 29 percent of the registered voters becomes a majority to elect a President, 25 to elect a Senator or 20 percent a Congressman. No wonder they do not feel compelled to stand up for all the people when so few are standing up for themselves.

To those Members of Congress who subscribe to the amendment-a-month club I say this: leave the Constitution alone. Do not try to make it a trash basket for every new political gimmick or a crutch in times of controversy. If we are unable to deal with the realities of the budget debate, I would suggest that the fault lies not in our Constitution but in ourselves.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, we are ready to go forward with any amendments that any Senator has. I see the distinguished Senator from California on the floor. Does he have an amendment?

Mr. CRANSTON. As I understand it, Mr. President, Senator KENNEDY is due here at 4 o'clock to speak, and following that I believe Senator FORD will have an amendment to offer.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum for a few minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 1934

(Purpose: To require the President to submit a balanced budget for each fiscal year to the Congress)

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I call up amendment No. 1934.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the amendment.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

> The Senator from Kentucky (Mr. FORD) proposes amendment numbered 1934.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 3, between lines 12 and 13, insert the following:

"SECTION 1. Prior to each fiscal year, the President shall transmit to the Congress a budget for the United States Government for that fiscal year in which total outlays are no greater than total receipts, except the President may transmit to the Congress a budget for a fiscal year in which total outlays are greater than total receipts if the President includes with such budget a detailed statement specifying the reasons why total outlays for such fiscal year should exceed total receipts for such fiscal year.".

On page 3, line 13, strike out "SECTION 1. Prior" and insert "SECTION 2. After receiving the budget required by section 1 of this article, and prior".

On page 3, line 24, strike out "2" and insert "3".

On page 4, line 6, strike out "3" and insert "4".

On page 4, line 13, strike out "5" and insert "6".

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I hope that the opposition to my amendment will be here on the floor as we discuss it.

Mr. President, may I inquire how much time I have on this amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. One hour, evenly divided.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I see the distinguished Senator from Utah is here.

The amendment that I had before the Senate yesterday received 45 votes—16 of those votes were cosponsors of the distinguished Senator's amendment to the Constitution proposing a balanced budget.

During the debate, I said that both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue would have to work together. That the President of the United States must be equally responsible for submitting a balanced budget to the Congress as the Congress must have the responsibility for passing one.

The distinguished Senator from Utah said that if my amendment passed, I would make the President dishonest. He said that the President could not honestly propose a balanced budget; my amendment would make him dishonest. He said the culprit in this whole thing was Congress.

I would like to point out that for 25 years, at least, of the last 54 years Congress has passed a budget under that submitted by the Presidents. So we are almost batting 500, and that is awful good even in baseball. He said that the Congress, being the culprit, would have to vote to unbalance the budget but they would have to vote by a three-fifths vote, and that was a pressure valve for the Congress to pass and submit to the President a deficit budget.

Since my amendment was narrowly defeated, and about the only objection they had to that amendment was that the President was obligated to introduce a balanced budget, I now have another amendment. It says that if the President does not submit a balanced budget, if he submits a deficit budget as this President has, that he has to also send a covering document setting out the details of why he has submitted such a deficit budget.

That seems to be a very simple request. It makes it very easy on the President to submit a deficit budget if it is necessary. All he has to do is explain it. I think that would eliminate the objections of those who opposed my first amendment.

One other item was injected into the vote yesterday and I do not know of any change yet. The President, when he met with various Members of the Senate at the White House yesterday at the 11 a.m. meeting, was asked specifically about the Ford amendment that was then pending before the Senate. The President said that he agreed that that amendment was all right; that he could be for that amendment. He said that, as Governor of California, he was required to submit a balanced budget and he was used to it so it would not be any problem for him, as President, to submit a balanced budget.

Now, Mr. President, 21 States of this Union are required to have a balanced budget. Governors of those 21 States are required to submit a balanced budget to their legislatures. I was in that position. I submitted biennial budgets. I had to make a judgment based on 2 years. We had to take our percentages of the GNP and apply that to the future years. I submitted a balanced budget to the legislature.

The legislature's responsibility then was to either agree or disagree with the Governor based on their estimates. They had their own ways of getting estimates. If they agree with the Governor that his proposed budget on the income and receipts was correct, they could shift around, within that limit, the amount of funds available for the various programs, various projects, various capital construction. However, they were required to stay with a balanced budget.

So, Mr. President, I cannot see why anyone would want to object to my amendment now that I have made these changes. My amendment now allows the President some flexibility. Three-fifths of the Congress has to vote to pass a deficit budget. The President can now submit one under my amendment. All he has to do is document the reasons.

So I think that anyone who would want to object to my amendment now just wants to object for the sake of objecting. However, I am very hopeful that the floor managers of this legislation would agree with the President when he says that the Ford amendment is a good amendment. Those who were at the White House yesterday came in and voted on my amendment and were surprised that it had not passed, because the President told them he was for it. They were surprised that it did not receive sufficient votes. They were surprised to see the majority in the Senate opposed to it.

So, Mr. President, I hope that my amendment will be accepted and if not, that my colleagues will rally to my support on this one and amend the constitutional amendment that is now before the Senate.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COHEN). Who yields time?

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, may I ask one question of the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. FORD. I will do my best to answer the distinguished Senator from California.

Mr. CRANSTON. A monetary policy seems to be totally left out of all consideration in this constitutional amendment. I do not see how it is going to work unless we know what the monetary policy is and unless there is some statement of what we can expect, what the President seeks to do about it, and what the Fed will do about it. Do you think it is purposeful that the Fed, with its impact on these huge interest rates that we have, do you feel it is purposefully left out of the constitutional amendment? Do you feel at some point the President should state what his monetary policy is and that if there is going to be a constitutional amendment on this subject we should have it understood we expect him to spell that out when he is indicating what he should do?

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I say to the distinguished Senator from California that I agree with that. I think that we should have a statement of monetary policy. It just seems unconscionable to me that when we are sitting here now looking at the deficit budget that was submitted by the President and passed by the Senate—I did not vote for it—the largest tax increase in history, and the largest deficit in history. On top of that the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Regan, says that it will be a $114 billion deficit. He just barely beat Dr. Alice Rivlin by 1 day when she came forward and said it would be as high as $140 billion and maybe $160 billion.

We are using two sets of numbers, as I understand it. One is for the operation of Government, basically, and another set of numbers is for the Defense Department. So we have commingled numbers. We really do not have a monetary policy. The Fed is not involved. We see now at election time that interest rates might come down a little bit, but we are experiencing the largest real interest rates in the history of the country.

Mr. CRANSTON. I accept that fact, that we have the largest interest rates in the history of the country, and I thank the Senator for his comments.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, we have already debated the merits of this particular amendment. There is just a slight addition. I do not think any further debate is necessary on it. Whenever the Senator wants to vote on the matter, we are ready to vote.

Mr. FORD. Would the Senator from South Carolina tell me why he would be opposed to this amendment when I have eliminated, basically, the arguments against my amendment of yesterday?

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, in response to the Senator from Kentucky, I want to say they are the same arguments I made yesterday. There is no use to go over them again. They would apply to this amendment. He only adds "except that the President may send to the Congress" and he explains it, and so forth. That was considered yesterday when the amendment was up. Those of us interested in it considered that and decided it would be unwise to accept it. I think we explained that yesterday in the arguments. The chairman of the Budget Committee came over and spoke against it. I think we have already explained in detail our reasons for opposing the amendment.

Mr. FORD. I just say to my distinguished friend from South Carolina that he agreed to the amendment yesterday to change the relationship between the Congress and the President of the United States.

It is my judgment that this ought to be a partnership. If the constituency of this country wants a balanced Federal budget we have to see to it that both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue are partners in this thing. I have said that before and I will keep on saying it.

Mr. President, a point of information, which I hope will not be charged to my time.

Do I have the ability at this point to modify my amendment since I have not yet asked for the yeas and nays?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unanimous consent would be required to modify the amendment.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I want to ask that my amendment be modified as follows: On page 1, line 11, strike the second period and insert "and renumber the remaining sections." Also, strike lines 1 through 7 on page 2.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will advise the Senator from Kentucky that it would require unanimous consent to delete the section the Senator has referred to. If unanimous consent is not obtained, it would be appropriate for the Senator to offer an amendment in the second degree to strike that language. When all time has expired, it would be permissible for the Senator to do that.

Mr. FORD. I hope that the distinguished chairman and the floor manager of the bill will not object. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that the amendment be modified as follows: On page 1, line 11, strike the second period and insert "and renumber the remaining sections." Also, strike lines 1 through 7 on page 2.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, we have no objection to the modification.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is so modified.

The amendment, as modified, is as follows:

On page 3, between lines 12 and 13, insert the following:

"SECTION 1. Prior to each fiscal year, the President shall transmit to the Congress a budget for the United States Government for that fiscal year in which total outlays are no greater than total receipts, except the President may transmit to the Congress a budget for a fiscal year in which total outlays are greater than total receipts if the President includes with such budget a detailed statement specifying the reasons why total outlays for such fiscal year should exceed total receipts or such fiscal year."

Mr. FORD. I say to my distinguished friends who are managing the bill that I think I have eliminated the objection of the distinguished Senator from Utah (Mr. HATCH). I also believe that I have eliminated the objection of the distinguished Senator from New Mexico, the chairman of the Budget Committee. He may have objection, but I think I have eliminated the objection that he stated yesterday.

All I am asking here is—and I just cannot understand why this amendment is being opposed—that if the President submits to the Congress a deficit budget, that he would include with that budget a document stating the reasons for the deficit.

We in the Congress, under this amendment, have the ability to send to the President a deficit budget by a three-fourths vote. That is a pressure valve. That is a release by which Congress can agree to a deficit budget. Of course, the President does not have to sign it. He can veto it.

He still keeps that prerogative. But if we do not have the cooperation of the President of the United States, submitting a balanced budget to Congress, it is going to be very, very difficult for Congress itself to come up with a balanced budget.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, this amendment, it seems to me, suffers from the same major weaknesses as the earlier Ford amendment; that is, it adds totally unnecessary verbiage to the constitutional amendment. It would constitutionalize for the first time the participation of the President formally within the budget process. That is a pretty important issue, Mr. President: Should we formally for the first time, bring the President constitutionally into the budget process?

First, the amendment would basically state that the President is to submit a balanced budget unless he decides not to do so. What is the purpose of this? What does it add to the law or to the Constitution? It is a meaningless statement and a meaningless set of words, except that the amendment would mandate that the President participate in the budget process. Presidential participation in the budget-making process is not presently mandated in the Constitution and should not be required in this amendment.

Second, the amendment is potentially dangerous as it establishes a formal constitutional role for the President budget process. This particular role does not exist today. There is no such Presidential role. It would create a single undivided budget process: The President proposes a budget and the Congress adopts a budget.

What are the ramifications of the language? Does it mean that the President's budget must be formally considered by Congress? Presently, Congress is free to adopt, reject, amend, or even ignore the President's informal budget.

Mr. FORD. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HATCH. Surely.

Mr. FORD. What does this amendment change from that one? Congress does not even have to consider the President's budget.

Mr. HATCH. By institutionalizing or constitutionalizing the President's role in the process.

Mr. FORD. We still can ignore him.

Mr. HATCH. Not necessarily. The amendment of the Senator from Kentucky makes it a requisite for the President to submit a budget and it may be interpreted as a requisite for us to have to consider only his budget.

Mr. FORD. The Senator is making the argument that any Member should oppose a constitutional amendment of any kind, because you change the Constitution or give power to someone or take power from someone.

Mr. HATCH. I am saying at the present time, under the present Constitution, Congress has all budgetary obligation. What the amendment of the distinguished Senator from Kentucky would do is constitutionalize the President's participation in the budget process. Presently, Congress has the freedom to deal with the President's budget as it will.

Mr. FORD. My amendment does not change that.

Mr. HATCH. The question is. Could they continue to do that under the Ford language? Would they have to act affirmatively upon changes in that budget? Could Congress propose its own budget? These questions would all appear if the Ford language becomes locked into a constitutional amendment.

What are the implications for impoundment and other Executive authorities? What are the implications for a separation of powers balance? Do we have even the slightest idea if we accept the language of the distinguished Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. President, these are not simple questions. This is a very complex amendment, though it seems simple on its face. If adopted, there would be a major change in constitutional duties and in the constitutional separation of powers as presently ordained.

I am not saying that we cannot make these changes. But I question the wisdom of those changes, especially since the President now may informally submit a budget. I believe the President will make every effort to submit a balanced budget to Congress for its consideration.

If he does not submit a balanced budget because, in his good conscience, he feels that a balanced budget cannot solve the problem, then the President can submit an unbalanced budget and explain why—nothing more nor less than what our distinguished friend from Kentucky is asking us to mandate into the Constitution.

Because of the gravity of the constitutional issues that would be raised if the Senator from Kentucky's were agreed to and because the President may now submit an informal budget, I do not think it is wise nor necessary to adopt this amendment.

Mr. FORD. If the Senator is so anxious to keep the President out of the budget-making process, is he prepared to revoke or abolish the 1921 Budget and Accounting Act, which requires the President to send a budget to Congress?

Mr. HATCH. I just want the President to stay where he is. That is, he can submit a budget, we can look at it, reject it, accept it, or even ignore it.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I do not want the President to stay where he is. I want him to be a part of the balanced-budget process. If he is not a partner, we had better reject this constitutional amendment and settle for a deficit budget.

Mr. HATCH. There is no way the President, without the Senator's amendment, would not be a part of the balanced-budget process. That is an important part of the budget message the President gives every year. He wants that. No President is going to fail to participate in it. We do not have to mandate that in the Constitution with all the conflicting perplexities the amendment of the Senator would suggest.

The fact is that he is going to participate, he is going to submit a budget. If he is not submitting a budget that puts forth the best good-faith effort to balance the budget of this country, then the President is going to lose credibility. If he submits an unbalanced budget, he is going to have to give good reasons why he is submitting that unbalanced budget.

What about those questions of the major change that the Senator's amendment would bring about? They are not insignificant.

I do not think the Senator from Kentucky doubts that the President is going to continue to present an annual budget message to Congress and submit an annual budget to Congress informally, which we can look at, accept, reject, modify, or amend—which is a far better, more flexible system for Congress than to have it locked into accepting a Presidentially developed budget.

Mr. FORD. How much time do I have left, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 15 minutes and 40 seconds.

Mr. FORD. I shall not take all that time. I am sure they are anxious to vote. I am making them nervous.

I ought to make them nervous, because the longer I talk, the more sense my amendment makes. The more they talk, the more they agree with my amendment.

Yesterday, the distinguished Senator from Utah was arguing that my amendment would make the President of the United States dishonest. I do not want to make the President of the United States dishonest. He said the President could not honestly submit a balanced budget; we ought not to put him in the posture of having to do that, of making him dishonest.

All I am doing now is saying submit a balanced budget. If he cannot submit a balanced budget, he can just put a document on top of it enumerating the reasons why he cannot. We would still have an opportunity to vote three-fifths to have a deficit budget.

Right now those people down in the executive agencies are preparing 1983 and 1984, and 1985 budgets. They have every known available tool to develop a budget. They have the Office of Management and Budget. They send Mr. Stockman up here about every other day. We watch him out here in the hall as we come here to vote. They tell us how they would like for us to vote. The President said yesterday, confirmed by every Senator that was there, that he was for my amendment. All we are asking is that the Presdident submit a budget and become part of the team.

The Senator from Utah knows as well as I that this country wants a balanced budget, and it wants it badly. The people of the Nation want a balanced Federal budget. The only way that meritorious goal can be achieved is if the President and the Congress work together. We cannot be going down one path and the President of the United States going down another. It just does not sound reasonable to me. Under the terms of the constitutional amendment, it makes the President a full and equal partner. I certainly hope that it will be approved.

Mr. DECONCINI addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished Senator from Arizona.

Mr. DECONCINI. I ask how much time is left with the distinguished Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. THURMOND. Five minutes, Mr. President.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I want to address the amendment of the distinguished Senator from Kentucky for a moment. First of all, I understand what the Senator is attempting to do, and I think there is great merit in it, I really want the Senator to know that my only quarrel with is is putting it here as part of this constitutional amendment. I would ask the Senator from Kentucky whether or not there is legislation pending, if he knows, that would require by Federal law that the President do what he is suggesting?

Mr. FORD. I do not know whether there is statutory authority or not, but we have a statute now that says we must have a balanced budget. We have been ignoring that since 1979. If we put it in the law——

Mr. DECONCINI. If the Senator will yield, I see a distinction there and I really doubt that if Congress required by statute that the President submit a balanced budget, that he would do otherwise. Does the Senator from Kentucky believe that the President should submit a budget, and if it is unbalanced he should submit by a detailed explanation of receipts and expenditures and other economic data? That is what the Senator wants to get accomplished. My next question to the distinguished Senator from Kentucky is: Why could we not do that by statute? Why must we add verbage to the Consitution when a statutory mandate will suffice?

Mr. FORD. I say to my friend, I know he is trying to help, and I am grateful to him. He is a distinguished Senator. He represents his State marvelously. I have no qualms about what he is trying to do or his intent.

The Senator from South Carolina and I were debating this question the other day. He has always voted against increasing the debt ceiling until June 23 of 1982. He has now switched. We are all voting differently. I understand the pressures of the times and I understand the change. However, we must get it in the Constitution that the President is an equal partner in this venture of having a balanced Federal budget. As Governor under the constitution of Kentucky, I was a partner with the Kentucky Legislature saying we must have a balanced budget.

Mr. DECONCINI. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. FORD. What is wrong with that?

Mr. DECONCINI. There is nothing wrong with the principle the Senator from Kentucky is trying to achieve here, and I applaud him for it. My question is not to be argumentative or combative.

Mr. FORD. I understand that.

Mr. DECONCINI. All I want to pose to the Senator from Kentucky is: What would be the downside of doing this by legislation as opposed to placing it in the Constitution?

Mr. FORD. The downside is that I will have to fight this 9 years from now if I am still living, 8 years from now if I am still living, maybe 7 years from now, because that is how long it will take to implement the amendment. The Lord may call me before then. Therefore, I want to do what I can now.

We are looking 9 years down the road maximum when and if this is submitted to the States. We need help now.

Mr. DECONCINI. I understand we need help. That is the purpose of what we are going through now. I appreciate the Senator responding to my question, and I respect that he thinks it has to be part of the constitutional amendment and not statutory.

Mr. President, I have a memorandum with some points in opposition to the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent that it be placed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

POINTS

1. The use of the word "budget" in the Ford amendment does not include "off-budget outlays," whereas statement of receipts and outlays includes all receipts and all outlays, whether on-budget or off-budget. Therefore, Ford amendment is not consistent with SJR58.

2. The Ford amendment would introduce President Constitutionally into the budget process for the first time—a process the founding fathers carefully and thoughtfully reserved to the initiative of the Congress.

3. The implications of introducing the President, with a Constitutional role, into the budget process are not clear. Would this imply that the Congress must accept or reject the President's budget without amendments, decisions as to the nation's priorities, etc?

4. Surely this amendment enhances the prospects of reinforcing an "imperial presidency."—It is clear why any member of the Congress would wish to entertain such a prospect.

5. Congress currently has full power to require the President to submit a budget in any form it so chooses, especially a form it regards as conducive to the exercise of its legislative powers. Therefore, the Ford amendment is not necessary, is not needed, and merely would cloud the existing separation and division of powers.

6. The Ford amendment would require the development of a Constitutional definition of "budget" something which has been in constant state of development since the 1921 Budget Act. Since this amendment is not necessary to accomplish Presidential submission of a budget, why introduce—unnecessarily—a new concept into the constitution?

7. The President's willingness to be required to submit a "balanced budget" does not translate into a request that Congress introduce this requirement as a Constitutional mandate. It is difficult to believe the President even intended to imply such a request. The President did indicate his willingness to cooperate with the Congress in preparation of such a budget.

Mr. FORD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I understand that many of our colleagues would like to have a vote prior to 4:45. I certainly have more time that I can carry at least that far, but I do not intend to do that; I want to accommodate my colleagues. I have just one brief statement.

The way to achieve a balanced budget is not to begin in January: It is to begin far in advance of that. It is to begin when OMB sends out its directives to agencies and departments. The budget does not just miraculously appear on the President's desk each January. The preparation of the President's budget usually takes 7 months. During that period, OMB and the Federal agencies are very busy preparing the Governmentwide analysis and program presentations contained in the documents which constitute the President's budget submission to Congress.

At the outset, OMB provides each agency and department with policy guidance; outlines the concepts and definitions governing budget formulation; furnishes line-by-line instructions for completing the required budget forms; and even spells out requirements for data that will be used in the summary tables of the President's budget. Heads of agencies and departments, and their budget officers, consult OMB representatives prior to even the submission of their budgets. There is a continuous exchange of information, proposals, evaluations, and policy determinations among the President, the Office of Management and Budget, and the various Government agencies and departments.

The President's transmittal of his budget to the Congress early in each calendar year is the climax of months of planning and analysis throughout the executive branch. It involves a detailed review of agency budget requests by OMB. These requests and OMB's recommendations on them are presented to the President for his final decisions. Overall fiscal policy issues are again examined.

Congressional review begins when the President submits his budget to Congress in each January. This is usually 7 months after the agencies and departments first began work on the budget, and only 9 months until the start of the new fiscal year.

As I said earlier, the budget does not miraculously appear on the desk of the President. Government agencies prepare and OMB examiners review the budgets in relation to Presidential guidance. It is important, therefore, that the President be required to submit a balanced budget.

Mr. President, I am going to take about 2 more minutes and then I am willing to yield back the remainder of my time.

I understand what is going to happen. The distinguished floor leaders have their people in lockstep. When they go back home and talk to their people, I would bet that they will find out that their constituents want the President and the Congress to be in partnership on a balanced budget. Oh, how I would like to see a balanced budget. I vote against an increase in the debt ceiling. They tell me things are going to stop, the world is coming to an end. I would like to see the Government stop for 24 hours and then maybe I will change my mind.

The President of the United States has the ability to sell this balanced budget to the American people much better than any one Member in this body. He has the ability to get on TV. He has the ability to attract attention wherever he goes. We need his help. We need his help badly. All I am saying is that if he wants to submit a budget that is out of balance, then all he has to do is attach a piece of paper to it that explains to the Congress of the United States, the reasons he could not submit a balanced budget.

All the arguments that I received yesterday on my first amendment should be resolved by this amendment. I modified the amendment to eliminate what I think were the complaints of the distinguished chairman of the Budget Committee. It is a very simple amendment to the constitutional amendment. It makes the President a full and equal partner under the terms of the Constitution. I hope that it will be approved. The people of this Nation want a balanced budget. Every Senator knows it. The only way that this meritorious goal can be achieved is if the President and the Congress work together.

Mr. President, I am prepared to yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I yield myself such time as I may require.

How much time remains to each side?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fourteen minutes and 45 seconds to the Senator from South Carolina; 9½ minutes to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I will say only a few words on this matter.

As I stated a few moments ago, this amendment is similar to the amendment which the Senate defeated yesterday. It would still raise a number of questions about the power of the President to control spending, such as impoundment, reprograming, deferrals, and so forth.

If we constitutionally restrict the President with this language, it will run counter to his recognized powers of recommending or vetoing legislation. We think this would be a mistake. To say that the President has to submit a balanced budget—suppose he foresees some emergency and he feels that he cannot honestly, conscientiously submit a balanced budget and is going to tell Congress so, and he is going to suggest to them that by a three-fifths vote, they take steps to alleviate this situation. What is wrong with that? To say that he must submit a balanced budget does not make sense.

Mr. President, we think this amendment is clear. It brings the President into it sufficiently. In section 1, it provides that Congress and the President shall pursue it through legislation or through exercise of their powers under the first and second articles to insure—I repeat, insure; that is, Congress and the President shall insure—that actual outlays do not exceed the outlays set forth in such statement. That is as far as we should go. It does not make sense to go further, to try to tie his hands and put him in a box. It does not make sense. We think the constitutional amendment is adequate and sufficient, and with that we rest our case.

The chairman of the Budget Committee wishes to say a few words, and I yield to him for such statement as he cares to make.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I am not going to take a lot of time. My argument is a very simple one.

I envision that the way we are going to operate when we get this constitutional amendment is that the Congress of the United States is going to pass some very significant budget implementation language as a part of our substantive law. I do not think we can operate under this constitutional amendment without Congress doing that.

Mr. President, when the Congress passed implementing legislation, it is obvious to this Senator that it will tell the President of the United States precisely what it expects with reference to matters budgetary. Congress does not even need to use what the President submits if it does not want to, but it will undoubtedly find the President's advice helpful just as we do under the present laws.

In that implementing legislation, Congress should tell the President what kind of budgets it wants him to submit, when, what should be included in them; and as Presidents have done in the past under the Budget and Impoundment Control Act, he will comply. As they have in the past, Presidents will submit budgets responsive to laws Congress has passed specifying how to submit budgets and what should be in them.

This is a constitutional amendment. Yesterday we adopted amendments that clearly say that Congress must pass laws to implement it. I think it is far better to leave it up to Congress to specify in implementing legislation when, how, what content, what special content if a balanced budget is recommended—all those characteristics—ought to be covered in the legislation Congress passes to implement this constitutional amendment.

We should even define what a budget is. That is not done in this constitutional amendment, and it is not done on purpose.

Yesterday we built clear legislative history that Congress will decide what all the various terms mean—outlays, statements, deficits, budgets. So if we adopted the Ford amendment we would be constitutionally saying that the President has to do this and then, at the same time, clearly indicating in the changes approved yesterday Congress intends to tell the President precisely what he has to do with reference to matters that pertain to the budget.

I am certainly not trying to make it easy for Presidents to get by with blaming Congress nor am I trying to exculpate Presidents, past, present, or future. I just think we should have a clear understanding of what we are trying to do in this constitutional amendment, that we must pass laws to implement it, and by those laws we must tell the President what to do.

I could offer more detailed arguments. I am sorry I cannot support the Ford amendment. The Senator from Kentucky has tried to get around one of my objections. I said yesterday that the President should not have to submit a balanced budget if his good judgment is to the contrary. He should just tell us why it is not balanced. The Senator has tried to fix that in the amendment, but I still do not support it. It does not belong in the Constitution; it belongs in legislation.

I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, does the distinguished Senator from Kentucky have anything further to say?

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina says that it does not make sense to require the President to submit a balanced budget. I think it does, and I hope my colleagues do. I feel that the American people believe that it makes sense.

The President has said that he does not object to the amendment. We have eliminated from it the questions of the Senator from Utah, which I hope will be acceptable. The Senator from New Mexico got his changes to amend the constitutional amendment yesterday. He may have altered the relationship between the President and Congress. I only hope that we can make him an equal partner.

Mr. President, I am ready to yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I am sure the President will submit a balanced budget, especially if it is Ronald Reagan, whenever he can. There may be times when he cannot do it. He may have an emergency situation and cannot honestly and conscientiously do it. But he can tell Congress that and can say, "On account of an emergency, we would like both bodies to provide appropriate funds to meet this emergency." However, if you say he shall submit it, that is boxing him in, and I am opposed to that. I think it is unreasonable, and it is unfair to the President.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. FORD. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time having been yielded back, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, as modified. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from New York (Mr. D'AMATO), and the Senator from Iowa (Mr. JEPSEN), are necessarily absent.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Nevada (Mr. CANNON) is necessarily absent.

I further announce that the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. TSONGAS), is absent on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHAFEE). Are there any other Senators wishing to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 43, nays 53, as follows:

NOT VOTING—4

So Mr. FORD'S amendment (No. 1934), as modified, was rejected.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MELCHER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, as an original cosponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 58, today I wish to express once again my support of this measure to amend the Constitution to require a balanced Federal budget. We are confronted by a public debt of more than $1 trillion, following decades of fiscal imbalance. The Federal budget was last balanced in 1969. In the subsequent 13 years, Federal spending has increased 3½ times, and deficits have added $430 billion to the total national debt.

This constitutional amendment is an action which can help to reverse 40 years of bad economic policy. The American people have demanded that Congress stop the trend of fiscal irresponsibility and stop the ravenous spending habits of the Federal Government. We must respond to the people all over America who are calling for an end to economic disruption. Spending and tax policies have been destroying agriculture, small business, and the very basis of our economy.

I have heard from farmers, manufacturers, and small businessmen who have encouraged me in the endeavor to halt the persistent and massive overspending by the Federal Government. Thirty-one States have petitioned Congress for a constitutional convention to amend the Constitution. Recent polls indicate that as many as 80 percent of the American people want this amendment added to the Constitution.

This amendment is not a new idea. From the Founding Fathers down to the present, the balanced-budget concept has been part of America's "unwritten constitution." During the 19th century, when the balanced-budget norm was effectively the law of the land, there was little need for Congress to focus on this problem. Not until the mid-1930's did concern about budget deficits find regular expression in congressional debate. The Great Depression was accompanied by large, uninterrupted deficits between 1931 and 1940, followed by the heavy expenses of World War II. Those deficits generally were of a significantly larger scale than earlier deficit levels. Since then, our system of government has demonstrated a strong bias toward deficit spending.

Persistent deficits are a major reason for the economic quagmire of recent years. It has been proven that the Government's need to borrow to finance the deficits is a major cause of today's high interest rates. Cutting deficits will help to cut interest rates. This, in turn, will restore confidence in the United States and provide a boost to the world economy. Greater confidence in the American economy will in itself stimulate economic growth and investment. We must demonstrate greater fiscal responsibility. As my distinguished colleague, Senator HATCH, and others have stressed, the value of a constitutional amendment is that it elevates the economic responsibility to balance the budget to constitutional, and, therefore, more privilege status.

While it is important that deficits be lowered and eliminated, it is also important that Congress take a less myopic view of the budget process and act in the long-term interest of national economic stability. In examining the Federal budget process over the past three decades, it is readily apparent that one of its flaws is an institutional bias that encourages uncontrolled growth of expenditures, quick and easy tax increases, and higher and higher deficits.

Consider the deficit spending record of the past 30 years: During 1950 to 1959, the cumulative deficit was $18 billion; from 1960 to 1969, it was $56 billion; from 1970 to 1979, $318 billion; and during the most recent 4-year period, it was $291 billion. The first step in finding a solution to this problem lies in amending the Constitution to establish a fixed sound-budget process and a fiscal norm which cannot be easily violated.

In the final analysis, what we are considering here is the imposition of greater self-discipline in our handling of the people's money. The congressional tendency to play Santa Claus with someone else's money has mired our free enterprise system in a dangerous condition. We are short of investment capital. Available capital is loaned at rates that, until recently, were considered usurious. Massive borrowing to finance Government deficits along with excessive taxation to maintain questionable programs have contributed to this capital shortage and high interest rates.

Perhaps the discipline of this constitutional amendment will permit us to rescue our private enterprise system, our traditional economic values, and the principles of political freedom which are so intertwined with those values of moderation and commonsense in the management of the people's money.

This amendment is strong medicine, and it may not be without some adverse side effects. But, as one who has supported the balanced budget, tax limitation, spending restraint effort since first entering Congress in 1975, I believe it is medicine we must take. Our economic disease will only become much worse without it.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, during the constitutional convention of 1787 Thomas Jefferson proposed constitutional language requiring a balanced budget. For the greater part of our history as a nation his admonition against deficit spending was heeded by the Congress, without resort to the constitutional mandate he advanced.

However, in the last generation we have veered sharply from the wise counsel of Jefferson. A national debt that stood at $265 billion in 1950 has ballooned to over $1 trillion today, with most of the growth in this debt since the late 1960's. Incredible as it seems, the deficit alone this year will be larger than the entire Federal budget of 1962.

How have we gotten ourselves into this situation? The answer is simple—gross mismanagement of the American economy by past administrations and a lack of political courage. Year after year our Federal Government produces budget deficits. We have run a deficit in 19 of the past 20 years.

At the present time, there is little political accountability for those who initiate deficit spending. Some Members of Congress vote to authorize unlimited expenditures without the politically disadvantageous requirement of also being forced to vote for increased taxes.

Deficit spending by the Federal Government is hurtful to the American people; it crowds out our efficient and productive private sector. American businesses are unable to compete with a Federal Government which borrows more than 50 percent of the available capital. This practice of spending more than our Treasury receives in tax receipts clearly fuels the surge toward higher interest rates and results in expectations of even higher rates in the future.

Unless we are determined to halt this devastating spiral, I fear our economy will never again return to the highly productive and efficient system it once was. Are we willing to forgo the promise of a strong America for the temporary whim of spending more than we can afford? I hope not.

The balanced budget/tax limitation amendment, Senate Joint Resolution 58, is paramount to the recovery of our faltering economy. It mandates that our Federal Government can adopt no budget resolution which is not in balance, except under the most unusual of circumstances.

The amendment requires that Government receipts. It prohibits deficit spending as a way to satisfy the interminable demands of vociferous interest groups. It will require that our precious resources be more carefully allocated.

Support of this crucial amendment is so widespread that 31 States, on their own initiative, have already called for a constitutional convention to pass a balanced-budget amendment. Clearly this is a strong indication of increasing grassroots support for fiscal restraint. This amendment is truly legislation by and for the American people.

The balanced-budget amendment is a measure which will finally compel the Federal Government to live within its means. As we balance our Federal budget and begin to reduce our national debt, we will witness a dramatic decrease in interest rates. Furthermore, Government will no longer perpetuate a high inflation rate, as the private sector will finally have access to the capital now consumed by Government. A workable balanced-budget amendment will direct us to a renewed prosperity. Productivity will be augmented and the U.S. standard of living will improve. The balanced-budget amendment will successfully revitalize our economy.

It is high time that we require the Federal Government to act as responsibly as its citizenry. Everyone realizes from his or her own personal life that it is impossible to continue spending more than one has. The consequences of living beyond our means eventually catch up with us. For the U.S. Government the time has come to adopt the principle of fiscal responsibility urged by Thomas Jefferson nearly two centuries ago. We must act now to pass Senate Joint Resolution 58.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THURMOND. I would be pleased to yield to the able majority leader.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the majority leader withhold? We must have silence in the Chamber.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I suggest Senators give attention to the majority leader as he speaks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of the Senator from West Virginia is well taken. May we please have silence in the Chamber so we can hear the majority leader?

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I thank the Chair and I thank all Senators.

Mr. President, it is now 5:10 in the afternoon. I really very much hope that we can get another amendment yet today. I hope that we can get several amendments today.

I announced on Monday that any day this week could be a late day and that the Senate should be on notice that we would utilize Saturdays to the extent that is necessary. My concerns for passing this bill in a reasonable time were allayed when the Senate granted unanimous consent for the final vote on the resolution not earlier than next Tuesday nor later than next Wednesday. But there remains the cold, hard fact that there are 32 amendments that are to be dealt with by name in the unanimous-consent agreement that total probably 50 hours of debate.

In deference to every Member, I must urge that we try to do as much of this as we can in the early part of this session instead of the last moments when we may be up against that hour for final passage and there will be no time for debate and we will be in a quandary of either voting up or down on amendments we know very little about, or nothing about, or extending the time, which I will not gladly do.

So, Mr. President, I hope that Members would take account the desirability of calling up their amendments today—tomorrow is Thursday and that is our regular late evening—and to do so tomorrow. I am willing to ask the Senate to stay to any reasonable hour late tomorrow in order to accommodate these needs. We will be in session on Friday, and there will be votes on Friday. My present expectation is that we will convene at 9:30 tomorrow and 9:30 on Friday, but on Friday I expect to ask the Senate to recess at about midafternoon, about 3 p.m. until Monday.

But in order to accommodate that schedule—and I understand the requirements that so many Members have for travel and commitments away from the city, especially Western Senators who must get away on Friday by midafternoon—it is especially urgent that we get on with the business of calling up these 32 amendments or other amendments that may be offered and dealt with today and tomorrow.

So, Mr. President, with that, I suppose, admonition, or at least entreaty to my fellow Senators that we get on with the business, I am prepared to ask the managers if they have another amendment we can deal with this evening and another vote. I would like to see us have at least one more vote. I am prepared to ask the Senate to stay as long this evening as appears desirable in order to accommodate the needs of Senators.

Mr. President, could the manager of the bill or the minority manager indicate to me whether they can bring up another amendment and deal with it this afternoon?

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, we stand ready to act on any amendment that is brought up. We hope Senators will bring up their amendments. The majority leader has explained the reason and the necessity for doing this and not waiting until the last minute. So we are ready to proceed at this time.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I thank the Senator. I ask the minority manager if he knows of an amendment that can be called up at this time?

Mr. MELCHER. Will the majority leader yield?

Mr. BAKER. Yes, I yield.

Mr. MELCHER. I know of no amendment that can be offered at this time.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, we are attempting to ascertain, via the hotline, whether or not there are Senators who are prepared to offer their amendments. Senator LEAHY, who has seven or eight amendments, I am told, is in a CIA briefing at this point and, therefore, we cannot get him. We will be back shortly, after our having checked on the hotline, and see if we can get someone else to offer an amendment.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I will take this moment, then, if the majority manager will yield to me further, to identify for the record the amendments that we know of that remain.

Either seven or eight Leahy amendments. A Ford amendment has been disposed of. I assume that is one that has been included. Is there one more?

Mr. FORD. I say to the distinguished majority leader that I believe I had two amendments. One has been disposed of and one remains. I may not bring the other one up. We are having some technical problems with trying to fit it into a constitutional amendment. I may or may not bring that one up. I could probably advise the majority leader tomorrow as to my intentions.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Senator from Kentucky.

There are two amendments that were identified in the order to be perhaps offered by the Senator from Colorado (Mr. HART); perhaps two amendments to be offered by the distinguished Senator from Alabama (Mr. HEFLIN); six amendments by the Senator from California (Mr. CRANSTON); two by the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. BUMPERS); a Dodd amendment; a Baucus-Mathias amendment; five amendments by the Senator from New York (Mr. MOYNIHAN); a Levin amendment; two Gorton amendments; and one amendment to be offered by the Senator from Illinois (Mr. DIXON).

It should be borne in mind, of course, that the order is not exclusive and that other amendments can be offered other than those identified in the order, and on them there would be a general allowance of 1 hour, equally divided, for debate, 30 minutes on any second degree amendment, and 20 minutes on any point of order or appeal, if the same is submitted to the Senate.

So, we have our work cut out for us, Mr. President. I really am loath to not utilize the time remaining to us this afternoon, but there is no way I can compel Senators to call up their amendments.

Is the minority leader in a position yet to report on the status of his clearance?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I am not. I certainly empathize with the distinguished majority leader. I have been in the same situation. We have quite a number of amendments. We both share a desire to see a Senator have time on his amendment.

There is time left today in which Senators could call up amendments. As we go down the road, there will be less and less time if amendments are not called up.

But I believe the amendments will be called up in good and regular order. We run into these situations in which Senators are tied up in other matters and cannot get to the floor. I think the majority leader has made a fine statement and has sought to bring this matter to the attention of his colleagues and caution them about the need for calling up amendments.

I would say to the majority leader that I know of nothing else he could do at the moment. We will continue on our side to see if we can find someone who will be in a position to call up an amendment today. Hopefully we can. I may know shortly.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the minority leader.

Mr. President, in view of that, I do not know of anything else to do except to suggest the absence of a quorum, unless some Senator seeks recognition.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I say to the distinguished Senator from Kentucky, Senator FORD, that in the last amendment he offered he raised an important issue. We have rejected it only because of its constitutional implications and not because we disagree with his policy.

The Senator has raised an important question. The President is expected to act in good faith and submit a balanced budget, and, if he cannot, I am sure he will tell the Congress and the American people why he cannot, and make recommendations. I just wanted to make that statement.

Mr. FORD. I did not quite hear all of what you just said. Did the Senator say that I had a meritorious amendment? Is that what the Senator said?

Mr. THURMOND. I stated that the reason we rejected it was because of constitutional implications and not because of policy. I am sure the President will submit a balanced budget and, if he cannot, he will tell the American people why.

Mr. FORD. The meritorious amendment——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. FORD. I thank the Chair. I was just sitting here trying to think through what happended to me. I understand when the sheet is put on the tables in the well and the leaders start talking to people and telling them how to vote. I enjoy that very much. However, I wish they would not sit there but give us a chance.

I am very appreciative of all the accolades I am getting.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. FORD. Yes.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I apologize to the Senator, but I must say that I made this suggestion the other day. I suggested that we have a rule in the Senate that we preclude the leaders from sitting on the tables in the well because when I see Senator BAKER sitting on that table, if he is facing to the west I know we are going to lose. [Laughter.] I think if we had a rule that would preclude that, we might win a few.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, who is recognized?

Mr. FORD. I had the floor, but I would be delighted to yield to the distinguished Senator from West Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, the subject matter is of interest to me. I have listened very carefully to my colleagues. I wish I could offer the amendment now that Members vote from their desk, either standing or sitting. I hope that we can reverse the vote that defeated our proposal on April 20, on a rollcall 51 to 46. The well is not a place to play a rough and tumble hockey game. That is what it is at times. We should work in an orderly manner. I am encouraged that, at a date sooner than later, the Senate will become a forum for debate with the decisionmaking process being carried forward with a Senate in order.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, since we are killing a little time here, I will say to my friend, the distinguished Senator from Arizona, I appreciate all the accolades that I have been receiving since my amendment was defeated. I understand that they are probably trying to woo me into voting for final passage. I want to say it is going to be very difficult to get me if the President is not a partner in the balanced budget. You can say this President will do it and we will have no problems with this President. Well, I wonder about future Presidents. This President, in my opinion, has not done too well in submitting balanced budgets. We heard in the 1980 general election that we would have a balanced budget in 1981 and no later than 1982. We heard the announcement yesterday that the budget deficit is going to exceed anything we have ever had in the history of the country.

I hear my colleagues on the other side go to their leadership and ask, "What is wrong with FORD's amendment?" He says, "We ain't for it. We ain't for it." Therefore, my amendment was defeated. Even though they say we have a good amendment, "We ain't for it."

Mr. President, I appreciate all the accolades I have received since my amendment was defeated and I look forward to bringing up another amendment if I can be clear in my own mind that my amendment is proper and legally sound. Then I will have another amendment.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. FORD. I am glad to yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I was glad to hear the Senator recognize that occasionally an amendment, although it is a good one, can be beaten. We have gone through that many times.

In reference to President Reagan not sending up a balanced budget, I distinctly remember the day in the Oval Office when I told President Carter after his promise to send up a balanced budget that if he balanced the Federal budget I would ask the Democratic National Chairman if I could attend the next convention and nominate him for President.

Mr. FORD. The way the President is going, I do not think the Senator will see a balanced budget.

The only thing I am trying to do here is to see that both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue are on the same wavelength, that Congress and the President are working together as it relates to a balanced budget. I find it hard to believe that just because it is a good amendment we are defeated. Sometimes big is not always better. I hope that in the future when we have something that is good we will allow our colleagues not to have party discipline but that we will have the ability then to not go to a Member who has an amendment up saying, "I really like your amendment. I think it is good. I cannot understand what is wrong with it but I have been told to vote against it."

That day I hope will soon be here and we will be able to come together as a unit and try to develop those things that are in the best interests of the country. That is all I want. That is all I ask for. That is all I hope for.

Mr. President, one of these days we are going to see that our constituency, as they sit down there and look at our actions here, will say, "They did not want the President in as a partner. They want him lose. They want the leadership of this country not required to submit a balanced budget."

But we do not have to. We have locked ourselves almost basically into line item vetoes. We have locked ourselves into being mandated or being voted up.

I will accept this responsibility, which I will accept if the 38 States ratify it, with some feeling of pride because for 4 years I submitted balanced budgets, and I understand how tough they are sometimes. But there are 21 States that do it. The leadership in this Congress has the ability to do it. I think the President of the United States has the ability to do it. We just have to start doing it. We have to start sometime. The sooner we can start, and with the best procedure, would be in the best interests of the country. It is not that he has implied that he will or he will not. I do not like that.

Mr. President, I am grateful for this time. I guess we are just killing time waiting for an amendment. Twice in the same day is just too much for this Senator to take, having two amendments defeated.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, it appears, then, that no other amendment can be offered. I inquire of the minority leader. If so, I think I will take us off the bill and put us into morning business.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I would suggest, on the basis of the inquiries which have been made of this side of the aisle, I would not anticipate another amendment today. But I believe we should get started again tomorrow. I would hope that Members would be presenting their amendments beginning tomorrow.

I will say that there is no deliberate attempt on this side of the aisle to withhold amendments. I think it is just one of those circumstances in which we find ourselves. I would suggest to the distinguished majority leader that he not be discouraged but that we just go to morning business and see what we can do tomorrow.

Hopefully, we can lay down an amendment before the day is over for tomorrow's early consideration.

I am advised that a Senator on this side of the aisle wishes to talk on the resolution itself today.

Mr. BAKER. Very well, then, Mr. President, I shall not try to put us in morning business at this point. In a moment, I shall suggest the absence of a quorum, which I believe would then be charged against the time allocated to the bill under the order, is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. BAKER. Now, Mr. President, while we see whether other Senators are coming to the floor to debate this resolution or offer amendments against the time allocated to the resolution, I suggest the absence of a quorum, to be equally divided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 1929

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I call up my printed amendment numbered 1929.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from New York (Mr. MOYNIHAN) proposes an amendment numbered 1929.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the appropriate place insert the following:

SEC. 6. No budget shall provide for reductions in lawful entitlement benefits under the Social Security Act.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I do not wish to proceed with the debate on this point but ask unanimous consent that the time not run on the amendment, there being an hour's agreed-upon time, until we resume the discussion of the pending joint resolution tomorrow morning at the hour agreed upon by the leadership.

Mr. THURMOND. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Yes, I yield.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, that is entirely agreeable with us. We shall be pleased to cooperate with the distinguished Senator from New York in that respect.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I thank the distinguished President pro tempore.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Hearing none, it is so ordered.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On whose time?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time be equally divided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Who yields time?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts 10 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. I thank the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. President, the proposed constitutional amendment to balance the Federal budget is a misguided response to the growing nationwide concern over the deterioration of our economy. Today, the country is experiencing the highest unemployment since 1937, the highest interest rates since the Civil War, and the highest Federal deficits in history.

I have supported sensible efforts to halt inflation, to reduce the Federal deficit, and to bring Federal spending under control. I believe, however, that an amendment to the Constitution is an inappropriate response to our complex economic problems. Our Constitution works well for America because it embodies the fundamental rights and procedures that enable our democracy to function effectively. The Founding Fathers wisely excluded from the Constitution rules governing the financing of day-to-day Government operations. The proposal before us would reverse this approach, which has been followed for over 200 years. To enshrine a balanced budget or complex economic formula in the Constitution is a step that is as unwise as it is unprecedented. It might well prevent a future Congress or administration from responding appropriately and rapidly to an unforeseen domestic or foreign emergency.

Moreover, we do not need a constitutional amendment to have a balanced budget. Congress and the administration currently possess all the tools needed to balance the budget.

A balanced budget constitutional amendment is nothing more than a smokescreen which obscures the real issue of the administration's mismanagement of the economy. Instead of voting to balance the budget, Congress is voting to pass the buck to the States, so that the business of unbalanced budgets can proceed as usual.

They used to call Democrats big spenders. But the Reagan administration is breaking all records when it comes to deficit spending. The Reagan economic policy is awash in a sea of red ink, with deficits reaching $150 billion this year and likely to top $200 billion by 1985 unless a sensible economic plan is restored.

We are also deeply concerned about the 9.5-percent rate of unemployment, which means that more than 10.5 million Americans are without jobs. Workers everywhere are suffering. Unemployment in the construction trades alone increased by 50 percent last year, and automobile plants, steel mills, and papermills across the country are shutting down.

The prime interest rate hovers at 16 percent, and the last hope of first-home purchasers, the assumption of an existing mortgage at a lower rate, has been stripped away by recent court decisions. for most Americans who are not already homeowners, the American dream of owning a home is disappearing.

I might say, Mr. President, in my own State of Massachusetts 7 out of 10 families had an income sufficient to purchase a new home 10 years ago. Now it is 1 out of 10. That is some reflection of the extraordinary amount of income that is necessary now to afford homeownership in the current economic climate of high unemployment and higher interest rates. Those facts and figures are repeated all across this Nation. They really do not even adequately reflect the anxiety and the frustration and the loss of hope for millions of young families in this country.

The signs of economic crisis are stark—personal bankruptcy filings increased by more than one-third in 1980 over the 1979 filings. The Farmers Home Administration reports that, as of the end of May, more than a third of its farm loans were delinquent. In the first half of this fiscal year, there were 351 foreclosures, compared with 140 foreclosures for all of the last fiscal year. During the same period, over 5,000 farm borrowers gave up their loan and their land.

These staggering statistics tell a tragic story for many Americans that transcends a balanced budget. The economic realities that have driven us deep into recession are complex; they cannot be resolved with a simplistic constitutional mandate.

I believe it was H. L. Mencken who once said, "For every complicated problem there is simple, easy answer, and it is wrong."

We are facing an extremely complicated problem trying to bring our economy back to economic growth and price stability. The answer that we are being given here this evening by those who support the balanced budget resolution is that if we pass the balanced budget resolution, it is going to be a simple, easy answer. As H. L. Mencken warned, I believe that the simple, easy answer of the balanced budget constitutional amendment will be wrong.

A specific formula for balancing the Federal budget does not belong in the Constitution. The one other time in the history of this country that we have tried to put into the Constitution protections other than the protection of individual rights and liberties was the time of prohibition, and we saw how inadequate that particular proposal was.

Again, Mr. President, the Constitution of the United States is the finest document that has ever been crafted for the protection of individual rights and liberties, and this particular amendment should not be a part of it.

The Constitution was never intended to enact a particular economic policy and certainly not intended to enact the administration's trickle down economics.

The proposals contained in the balanced budget constitutional amendment are opposed by numerous eminent economists. One of these, Prof. Gardner Ackley, Henry Carter Adams University of Michigan, recently prepared a thoughtful and articulate commentary on Senate Joint Resolution 58, entitled "Constitutional Limits on Federal Spending and Deficits." I commend this excellent paper to my colleagues and ask unanimous consent that it be printed in full in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

(See exhibit 1)

Mr. KENNEDY. The methods for managing Federal expenditures demand constant oversight and revision in order to meet the Nation's changing needs. The rigid straitjacket of constitutional amendment may easily prevent needed future changes in policy from being carried out.

As former Secretary of the Treausry Blumenthal testified before the Judiciary Committee in the last Congress:

> It is neither possible nor desirable to reduce the complex process of fiscal policy to the single constraint of budget balance. Flexibility is the necessary element of an effective fiscal strategy. Constitutionally mandating a balanced budget would undermine our efforts to develop and practice prudent economic policy.

It is important to note that "balanced budget" is not synonymous with a healthy economy. In some economic situations, notably a recession, an effort to force the budget into balance could make the situation worse. During a recession, revenues fall, outlays rise. These automatic responses stimulate the economy and lessen the severity of the downturn, at the cost of a temporary increase in the deficit.

A mandated balanced budget could nullify these automatic stabilizers and push the economy from recession to depression. The working men and women of America, small businesses, and even the largest corporations could all be losers under this rigid inflexible economic policy.

Three years ago, a study by the Council of Economic Advisers showed that if a mandate for a balanced Federal budget had been in effect during the recession of 1974–75, the unemployment rate would have climbed to 12 percent rather than 8.5 percent, and the gross national product would have plunged 12 percent rather than 2.5 percent below the 1973 level.

The specific proposal before us also raises fundamental questions of fairness, because it proposes a scheme that disproportionately hurts those at the bottom of the economic ladder. While requiring that outlays not exceed revenues, the amendment places severe limitations on tax increases by limiting the growth in Federal revenue to the prior year's growth in national income.

This is a blatant bailout for the wealthy; unemployed workers do not pay taxes. The effect of this tax limitation, coupled with the balanced budget rule, is to assure lower taxes for the rich and less Federal assistance for the poor and middle class.

This amendment, if enacted, may also become the device by which those who yearn to undo social security may finally get their way. They will say: Federal revenues have fallen short—and we cannot raise taxes to balance the budget. And then, they will argue that there is only one program—social security—big enough to be cut enough to achieve a balanced budget. Every senior citizen ought to be fighting this amendment. For this balanced budget amendment is in reality, the gut social security amendment.

Perhaps the most simplistic argument for the amendment is the suggestion that the national economy ought to be run the way a family budget is. Almost every household which is paying a home mortgage or financing an automobile or a college education is running a deficit. They are borrowing to meet these essential needs. To require that homeowners and parents balance their budgets on a current basis and eliminate their long-term debts would create enormous dislocations for no rational purpose.

The adverse effects of imposing a comparable requirement on the Federal Government defy calculation. A constitutional requirement that each year's budget be in absolute balance is narrow and dangerous. The Federal budget is a massive and complex process involving such basic issues as national defense, education, health care for the needy, the security of the elderly, and support for the unemployed. There are and will continue to be times when it is in the national interest to run a deficit in order to counter a recessionary spiral. The proposed amendment sharply limits our capacity to do so.

The so-called safety valve in the amendment—which allows a deficit by vote of three-fifths of the Members of Congress—is an illusory solution. As the experience with Senate filibusters makes clear, it is often extremely difficult to achieve a "supermajority" on an issue. The requirement of a three-fifth majority to override the balanced budget mandate virtually assures that the Federal Government will not adequately respond to sudden crises. The provision gives a minority in Congress the power to exert maximum leverage for their own pet ideas. If as David Stockman said, "the hogs were really feeding," during the trading over last year's tax bill, when only a simple majority was needed, they will be truly feasting in the trading for a three-fifths vote. And as Members each obtain concessions to spend more and more dollars for their favored programs, the result will be an even higher deficit.

The American Federation of State, County, and Municipal Employees recently completed a computer study of the impact of the proposed amendment on the economy. The effect on key economic indicators through 1987 is shocking. The number of unemployed Americans in 1987 would soar to more than 2.5 million over what could be expected without a mandated balanced budget. GNP would be reduced by $519 billion between 1985–87, while the inflation rate would be trimmed by only 1.3 percent. In addition to the cuts in Federal programs expected this year, further reductions of about $116 billion in 1985, $125 billion in 1986, and $163 billion in 1987 would be required to achieve a balance.

These projections deserve careful scrutiny, and I ask unanimous consent that the four charts in which the results of the simulation study are presented be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the tables were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TABLE I.—BALANCED BUDGET/REVENUE LIMIT SIMULATION COMPARED TO DRI STANDARD FORECAST

	Fiscal years—
	1985	1986	1987
Unemployment	+1,359,000	+2,541,000	+2,649,000

TABLE II.—Estimated program losses from a 14 percent across-the-board cut in fiscal year 1985 Federal outlays

Federal program area:	Millions
National defense	$35,451
Social security	30,025
Medicare	9,121
Medicaid	3,518
Food and nutrition assistance	3,093
Unemployment compensation	3,077
Education	2,630
Employment and training	1,756
Social services	1,160
General revenue sharing	642

Note: These figures represent a 14 percent cut from the estimated fiscal year 1985 funding levels—which were obtained by adding a 6.5 percent inflation factor to the fiscal year 1984 program cost projections contained in the President's fiscal year 1983 budget proposal.

(Tables III and IV not reproducible in the RECORD).

Mr. KENNEDY. Another serious problem with the amendment is the question of enforcement. Once the amendment is adopted, it will subject every budget enacted by Congress to judicial review. It will be another bonanza for lawyers: It will do for the budget process what Congress has already done to the Tax Code. Indeed, under a balanced budget amendment, Congress might not even have the money needed to defend the balanced budget which it had passed from attack in the courts. The Federal budget is a legislative, not a judicial responsibility. It is properly a policy issue, not a constitutional one, and it ought to be settled in Congress, not the courts.

Finally, for the immediate future, this constitutional amendment is an exercise in political gamesmanship which only disguises the failure of the administration to keep its promises on the economy. It is ironic that the President who promised a balanced budget is giving us the highest deficits in history. In proclaiming its support for the amendment, the administration is saying, in effect, "balance the budget, but not until sometime in the future, after the amendment takes effect and after they have left office. What President Reagan has done on this issue is the budgetary equivalent of St. Augustine's prayer of long ago: 'Oh Lord, save me from my sins—but not yet.' "

I favor a balanced budget as part of a balanced prosperity of full employment and price stability. But I reject this transparent constitutional quick fix. This amendment is the constitutional equivalent in the 1980's of the prohibition amendment in the 1920's. If we pass it now and the States ratify it, a future Congress will have to repeal it later—after the damage is clear for all to see. Before we vote, we should ask ourselves: Should we buy this constitutional quick fix from the same people who gave us the Reagan-Kemp-Roth tax cut?

I hope that the Senate will have the commonsense to defeat this scheme by the Republicans to turn their voodoo economics into voodoo constitutional law.

Mr. President, the supporters of this measure, who place such a high premium on paying lip service to the concept of a balanced budget, are like those who say that an individual who rises every morning and pledges allegiance to the flag is a real patriot. I think the real patriots are those who are trying to make this country the kind of country that it should be and that our Founding Fathers believed that it would be and that I think so many of us on both sides of the aisle are trying to make it.

I think that patriotism is not just saying the Pledge of Allegiance or calling for a balanced budget. Patriotism is joining in the difficult work of trying to make this country a great source of opportunity and hope and vision for the millions of people in this Nation and the millions of people all over the world.

Mr. President, this particular amendment does not further the goals of this great Nation. It has no place in the Constitution of the United States and I urge that it be rejected.

I thank the minority leader for yielding time.

CONSTITUTIONAL LIMITS ON FEDERAL SPENDING AND DEFICITS—A COMMENTARY ON SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 58

(By Gardner Ackley and Henry Carter Adams, University Professor of Political Economy, the University of Michigan)

A proposed Constitutional Amendment, embodied in Senate Joint Resolution 58, would restrict both Federal Government deficits and the level of Federal expenditures. It lacks either economic or political justification. The case for this amendment rests primarily on the view, expressed in the Report of the Committee on the Judiciary [1] that: ". . . in large measure, the nation's economic problems are attributable to the Federal Government's persistent failure to balance its budget. Persistently high levels of inflation and unemployment, and declining levels of growth and productivity can all be traced directly or indirectly to the fiscal policies and practices of the national government."

These statements, it will be noted, are statements of an economic theory. One would suppose that a proposal to amend the Constitution of the United States on the basis of an economic theory would therefore be supported both by a wide consensus of the views of the most distinguished professional economists, and by a detailed economic analysis. The Committee Report on this proposal provides neither evidence of any consensus of professional opinion nor any substantial economic analysis in support of its recommendation. It could not provide such support because it does not exist.

Instead, these proposals are opposed by an overwhelming majority of professional economic opinion. Support for the Constitutional limitations appears mainly to reflect an incoherent public revolt—the dimensions of which are uncertain—against taxes, government spending, and budget deficits. This revolt has clearly been stimulated by the unsatisfactory economic performance of the 1979's and early 1980's. But there is every reason to believe that, had the proposed Amendment been in force during this period, economic performance would not have been significantly better; it might well have been worse.

POLITICAL ARGUMENTS FOR THE AMENDMENT

One line of argument used to support a Constitutional limit on expenditures, taxes, or deficits argues that an inevitable tendency exists for democratic governments to overspend, and therefore, perhaps, to overtax. The Judiciary Committee Report begins by presenting this view, quoting at some length from the Italian economist Vilfredo Pareto, who almost a century ago theorized about a built-in bias in favor of public spending. This bias is supposed to result from the fact that each of the limited number of beneficiaries of public spending has a larger interest in the outcome than does the typical individual taxpayer. Several more recent economists are quoted in similar vein, including particularly the distinguished Arthur Burns, and a Professor Charles Baird, of the State University of California (Hayward).

It is conceivable that Pareto's classic theory may have had some validity in nineteenth-century Italy, where taxes were mainly indirect and hence invisible, levied on a mainly unenfranchised population, while expenditures were directed toward a relatively small range of purposes, beneficial mainly to hereditary aristocrats, or members of a newly-emerging entrepreneurial class. However, this argument has essentially no validity in the current U.S. setting. Our taxes are mainly direct taxes (levied on property, incomes, and payrolls), and thus are clearly visible—to a completely enfranchised taxpaying public. Indeed, exactly the reverse proposition may be more relevant in this current setting. Where taxes are direct and highly visible, while government expenditures are scattered over a mulitude of complex programs, serving a wide variety of public interests, the more relevant phenomena may be the "tax revolt"—by voters most of whom know or care very little about most of the purposes and results of government spending. Each voter, and each legislator, can be sure that there is plenty of room for the particular public services that interest him within whatever tax (or spending) limit he may support. The proposed amendment here under consideration is clearly a product of that "tax revolt"—not a needed correction of a built-in bias toward spending.

Whatever the political theory that supports such a Constitutional limit on government deficits and government spending, it has disturbing implications for believers in representative government. By permitting a minority of two-fifths of the Membership of either the House or the Senate to block actions supported by a substantial majority—and to do so merely by being absent—it implies that our representative system cannot be trusted to make intelligent choices in budgetary matters. If this is the case for taxes and spending, can we trust it for questions involving social relations, education, foreign affairs, and civil rights? Indeed, do not most spending and taxing decisions ultimately rest on broader considerations in these or similar areas?

THE SUPPLY-SIDE ARGUMENT FOR CUTTING TAXES AND EXPENDITURES

One allegedly economic argument sometimes employed to support a limitation of taxation, and, by implication, a limitation of government expenditures, is the "Supply-Side" theory popularized by Arthur Laffer and a handful of associates (Wanniski, Roberts, Ture, Kemp, Roth, and Lehrman). The argument relates essentially to taxes, not expenditures. However, although the professional "Supply-Siders" themselves are entirely unconcerned about deficits, it seems clear that any significant reduction of taxation would generate strong political support to limit government spending as well. Indeed, the relatively few prominent economists (and many non-economists) who supported the Kemp-Roth tax cuts apparently did so not because they were impressed by the allegedly supply-side effects of tax cuts, but rather because they knew or believed that cutting tax revenues would require, or at least strongly encourage, cutting government expenditures, too.

The Supply-Side argument is simple. Laffer and his followers argue that the taxes which now finance government spending significantly reduce the incentives to supply productive services, for either public or private use. With materially lower tax rates in effect, they argue, the total supplies of labor, capital, management, and risk-taking would expand significantly, as would, therefore, the volume of total production, and the aggregate of private incomes. Such an expansion of total production and incomes is alleged by "Supply-Siders" to be potentially so substantial that lower tax rates might actually produce higher rather than lower government revenues, thus permitting both government spending and private spending to rise.

It is clear that economists overwhelmingly reject the Supply-Side case for cutting taxes. Of 67 leading economists polled by the Budget Committees and the Ways and Means Committee in 1978, only 18 appeared clearly to favor the Kemp-Roth tax cuts. And, of those economists who favored Kemp-Roth, only a handful reported that they believed the potential supply-side response to be other than trivial. Rather, they believed that cutting tax rates would force cuts in government spending.[1]

THE SIZE OF GOVERNMENT IN THE UNITED STATES

It is usually taken for granted by supporters of Federal tax or spending limits that the Government (often characterized as "Leviathan" has an insatiable appetite for tax revenues, that cause it to grow continually and uncontrollably. The evidence for the proposition is seldom adduced; but, when it is, it obviously fails to support the concept of Leviathan. Several tables below review the available evidence on the size and character of government spending and taxes in the United States, during selected years from 1956 to 1981.[2]

If one looks only at the first line of Table I, some support may appear for the hypothesis. Over the past twenty-five years (1956–1981), total government spending rose from just under a quarter (24.8 percent) of GNP to just over a third (33.5 percent).[3] However, a more detailed examination indicates the following:

(1) Almost the entire increase in government spending as a percentage of GNP reflects the expansion of transfer payments, which rose from 4.1 percent of GNP in 1956 to 11.1 percent in 1981. Through transfer programs, government reduces all incomes (by taxation) in order to support the incomes of particular groups; but it draws no net resources from the private sector to public use. (The administrative costs of the transfer programs are not included in Transfer Payments; rather, they appear in government purchases of goods and services.) Transfer payments are overwhelming Federal. Most of their growth was in Social Security Retirement Benefits, and merely reflects the maturing of that system.

(2) Total government purchases of goods and services—which include the services of government employees—have remained at a flat 20 percent of GNP over the entire period. The generalization that one-fifth of total production of goods and services in the United States has typically been put to public use in thus well supported.

(3) Expenditures of State and local governments grew by 4.2 percent to GNP between 1956 and 1981, while total expenditures of the Federal Government (net of grants to State and Local Governments) grew by exactly the same 4.2 percent of GNP.

(4) Federal purchases of goods and services have varied over the period, but show no trend in either direction.

(5) Federal non-defense purchases of goods and services are trivial; they rose from 1.4 percent of GNP in 1956 to 2.6 percent of GNP in 1981; State and local purchases (essentially all non-defense) are much larger, however, and rose from 7.9 percent of GNP in 1956 to 12.1 percent in 1981.

[1] See "Leading Economists' Views of Kemp-Roth," Committee on the Budget, U.S. House of Representatives, and Senate Budget Committee (August 1978); and "Tax Reductions: Economists' Comments on H.R. 8333 and S. 1860 (The Kemp-Roth Bills)", Committee on Ways and Means, U.S. House of Representatives (September 8, 1978). These committee reports print the opinions of 67 leading economists on Kemp-Roth. My reading of their responses leads me to tabulate 44 as opposed to Kemp-Roth, 18 in possible support and 5 whose opinions are unclear from their letters. Of the 18 in possible support and the 5 whose views were unclear, a number specifically disavowed the "supply-side" argument. (So, of course, did essentially all of the 44 who opposed Kemp-Roth). Rather, the economists who supported Kemp-Roth mainly defended it only if the tax cuts were to be accompanied by equivalent cuts in spending, as indeed most of them assumed would happen if Kemp-Roth were enacted. On request, I will supply a list of those economists who responded in 1978 to the requests for their views on Kemp-Roth by the three committees, along with my interpretation of the nature of their advice. I will also supply a copy of my own detailed critique on the "Supply-Side" case for massive tax cuts, contained in my lecture of October 30, 1981 before the Illinois Economic Association.

[2] The years are chosen to span a quarter century, and were essentially prosperous years (except 1981); they include years of both Republican and Democratic Presidents and Congresses.

[3] Since these data come from the National Income Accounts, they include "off-budget" as well as budgetary expenditures.

Table II measures the size of Leviathan's work force. Although State and local governments employ substantial numbers of workers (teachers are the largest single category), Federal civilian employment is small (less than 3 percent of the labor force) and has been declining.

Table III shows that total government tax receipts were 25.6 percent of GNP in 1956, and rose rather steadily to 32.7 percent of GNP in 1981. Of this increase of 7.1 percentage points, 3.3 is attributable to Federal taxes, 3.8 to taxes of State and local governments. Between 1969 and 1981, Federal taxes as a percentage of GNP grew from 30.7 to 32.7, hardly a dramatic rise. Federal personal taxes (including half of total Social Insurance Contributions) reached 16.5 percent of Personal Income in 1981.

INTERNATIONAL COMPARISONS OF TAXES, SPENDING, AND DEFICITS

Many who campaign for limitations on government spending or deficits seem to believe that lower rates of government taxation or spending may account for the fact that some other countries' economies have experienced faster rates of economic growth than has the United States, or better records on inflation. Statistical evidence provides no clear support for such allegations. For example, Table IV compares government purchases of goods and services in the major industrial countries, in the most recent year for which comparable data are available (1980). (These purchases are by all levels of government, expressed as a percentage of Gross National Product.) What is striking is the similarity of the percentages, with all of the principal industrial countries except Germany and United Kingdom using for public purposes between 19.5% and 21.9% of total ouput in 1980. One of the two countries with which U.S. economic performance is most often compared unfavorably is Germany, which used 24.2% of GNP in the form of public spending, versus 20.4% in the United States. The other such country is Japan, whose percentage is insignificantly below ours.

LIMITING GOVERNMENT DEFICITS

The proposed Constitutional Amendment would limit not only Federal Government expenditures, but deficits as well. One might suppose that such a proposed limit on deficits would be supported both by a consensus of economic theorists, as well as by a detailed, quantitative analysis both of U.S. experience with deficits, and that of other nations. Neither the consensus of economic theorists, nor the analysis of the effects of deficits is provided (or even referred to); for it would not support the proposal.

The only effort of which I am aware to obtain the views of a substantial number of economists on a prohibition of Federal deficits was one that I made in the spring of 1979, at the suggestion of a Member of the House Budget Committee. I drafted and circulated, with the help of a few friends, an Economists' Open Letter opposing the then proposed Constitutional Amendment to bar Federal deficits (different only in detail from the present one). Within a few weeks, more than 500 professional economists had signed the letter, including five who (now) are recipients of the Nobel Prize in Economics, and eight who have (now) served as President of the American Economic Association. The letter, with its list of signers, was printed in a Report of the House Budget Committee dated April 13, 1979: "Toward a Balanced Budget: Report Pursuant to Public Law 96-5." If there is any thought that leading economists may have changed their minds about the effects of deficits. I suggest that it woud be simple to ask for the views on this question of all American Nobel Prize winners in Economics, or of all living ex-presidents of the American Economic Association. I predict that such a survey would find a lop-sided vote against the theoretical proposition that holds government deficits to be a primary cause of all, or even any significant part, of our economic ills.

The fact that government deficits have occurred in almost all countries during the recent period of "stagnation" may not be well known to the public or to members of Congress. But that is surely the case, including all leading industrial countries. Table V, below, is reproduced from "OECD Economic Outlook," December 1981 (page 23), published by the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, the international organization of the major industrial countries of Europe, plus Canada, United States, Japan, Australia, and New Zealand.

It is particularly interesting to note that:

(a) each of the countries has had budgetary deficits in each of the years shown, except for the United States in 1979 and France in 1980;

(b) U.S. deficits have, in every year, been smaller as a percentage of GNP than the average of the seven countries (an average which, of course, is itself heavily weighted by the U.S. results); moreover, in most years, U.S. deficits are the lowest of any country shown; and

(c) the two countries whose economic performance is most often described as better than ours—Japan and Germany—have, in each year, had considerably larger deficits than ours. Simply averaging the five annual percentages [5] for each country produces the following average budget deficits as percentages of GNP for 1978–1982: United States, 0.54; Japan, 3.98; and Germany, 3.48.

DEFICITS DO MATTER

To argue that there is no inevitable relationship between budget deficits and economic outcomes is not to argue that "deficits don't matter." On the contrary, deficits can matter very much—both for ill and for good; but deficits per se are neither good nor bad. There are times when they are not only appropriate but even highly desirable; and there are times when they are inappropriate and dangerous. This is surely the view of the overwhelming majority of economists who specialize in macroeconomics. During a recession or a period of "stagflation", deficits are nearly unavoidable, and are normally constructive rather than harmful. An attempt to balance the budget in a year like 1980, 1981, or 1982 would be prohibitively costly—in jobs, production, and real incomes—and perhaps even impossible to achieve on any terms. On the other hand, large deficits in a period of substantially expanding output and employment can easily produce excess demand, over-full employment, and escalating inflation.

[5] Similar percentages for the same countries for 1975, 1976, and 1977, appear in a table in "OECD Economic Outlook," July 1978, page 17; they show the same relative outcomes for those years. (In that table, a "surplus" is described as "government net lending.")

Thus, the mere prospect that massive Federal deficits would persist in a future period of expanding output and employment, along with the currently believable commitment by the Federal Reserve not to accommodate inflation by extra increases in the money supply, have been making recovery from our current severe recession practically impossible, even given the massive fiscal stimulus reflected in the prospective deficits. This paradox reflects the mess that we have got ourselves into through the combination of giant Kemp-Roth tax cuts—mostly still in the future, but fully legislated—and proposed massive increases in defense spending.

Participants in financial markets, Boards of Directors considering investment programs, unions and managements negotiating three-year wage bargains have been unable to imagine the world that the President's 1983 Budget assumed—a world in which real GNP would grow by 5.2 percent in 1983, 5.0 percent in 1984, and 4.7 percent in 1985, with the unemployment rate falling by the fourth quarter of 1985 to 6.2 percent, the Treasury bill rate to 8.5 percent, the inflation rate to 4.6 percent—all this, while the deficit under the President's February 1982 fiscal program would rise from about $175 billion in fiscal year 1983 to about $275 billion in fiscal year 1985.

However, simply because deficits at the wrong time can be extremely dangerous is no reason to prohibit deficits at all times—or even to make them available only if three-fifths of the members of each House specifically so approve. Twenty-one stubborn Senators, or 112 Members of the House of Representatives, might threaten severe economic and political damage to the national welfare.

CONCLUDING COMMENT

This memorandum has not been the place to attempt to summarize, explain, and justify the treatment of government expenditures, taxes, and deficits-surpluses in the standard macro-economic analysis used by the overwhelming majority of economists in their research, advising, Congressional testimony, speaking, and teaching. But even the relatively small number of dissenters from that standard analysis would surely agree that support for the proposed Constitutional Amendment cannot be found in the standard analysis.

Finally, this memorandum ignores the fact that glaring loopholes in the language of the proposed Amendment might well prevent it from having any significant effect on government spending, taxes, or deficits. This fact, however, is hardly an argument for its adoption; if anything, it is another strong reason not to clutter up our Constitution with unwarranted and indefensible economic nonsense.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On whose time?

Mr. KENNEDY. Equally divided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, there appears to be no further debate on the resolution this evening. There is no further amendment. There is one pending and will be pending tomorrow when we reconvene. The Senate will be back on the resolution at 10:30 a.m., according to the order previously entered.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there now be a brief period for the transaction of routine morning business, not to extend past 6:30 p.m., in which Senators may speak.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I hope that in a few moments we will be in a position to take care of a closing ritual. There are certain matters that I believe can be disposed of by unanimous consent; and as soon as my diligent and dedicated staff present me with a list of those items, I will attempt to clear them with the minority leader.

In the meantime, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

TAX EQUITY AND FISCAL RESPONSIBILITY ACT OF 1982—H.R. 4961

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, as I indicated earlier, it is my hope that we can go forward now with the machinery necessary to go to conference with the House on H.R. 4961, the reconciliation bill of the Finance Committee, which was dealt with previously.

In that connection, I move that the Senate insist on its amendments to H.R. 4961, request a conference with the House thereon, and that the Chair be authorized to appoint conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Chair appointed Senators DOLE, PACKWOOD, ROTH, DANFORTH, LONG, HARRY F. BYRD, Jr., and BENTSEN conferees on the part of the Senate; and on title IV only, excluding section 406(e), Senators PACKWOOD, KASSEBAUM, and CANNON.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAKER. I yield.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I think this is an arrangement with respect to conferees that satisfies some of the concerns on both sides. Senator CANNON particularly was concerned with respect to a section of the bill dealing with ADAP.

The majority leader has worked out this arrangement in a very nice way which allows Senator CANNON to be present at the conference when that portion of the bill is discussed. I thank the majority leader.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the minority leader.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have other requests which I believe have been presented to staff on both sides and appear to be available for action by unanimous consent, and I will state them now for the consideration of the minority leader and other Senators.

NATIONAL PURPLE HEART WEEK

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from further consideration of House Joint Resolution 526, relating to National Purple Heart Week, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated by title. The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution (H.J. Res. 526) authorizing and requesting the President to issue a proclamation designating the week of August 1, 1982, through August 7, 1982, as "National Purple Heart Week."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the majority leader?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, on June 29, I introduced Senate Joint Resolution 207, designating the week of August 1 though August 7, 1982, as "National Purple Heart Week." Six of my colleagues—Senators DENTON, HEFLIN, INOUYE, MATSUNAGA, MELCHER, and THURMOND—all recipients of the Purple Heart award, joined me in sponsoring this measure. Subsequently, the list of cosponsors has grown to 50. I appreciate the support of so many Members for this measure which seeks to honor in a small way those men and women who have been wounded or killed in action against enemies of the United States.

House Joint Resolution 526 is now before the Senate for final passage after consideration by the Judiciary Committee. As I noted in my "Dear Colleague" letter discussing the subject, the Purple Heart Award was reestablished in 1932 by the U.S. Army after it had lain dormant for many years. Gen. George Washington originally established the award of military merit on August 7, 1782. It was unique in that it was designed to be awarded to soldiers of the Continental Army, the first of its kind. After the Revolutionary War it fell into disuse. In 1932,

Gen. Douglas MacArthur was successful in reestablishing the award. This time, however, it was to be awarded to any Army personnel who were killed or wounded in combat against an enemy of the United States. Subsequently, the award was authorized for Navy, Marine, and Coast Guard personnel. Now, of course, all armed service personnel are eligible to receive it.

It is fitting that we mark the 50th anniversary of the reestablishment of the Purple Heart Award with the designation of the week of August 1 through 7, as National Purple Heart Week. It honors those men and women of our Armed Forces who have given more of themselves than has been required of other service personnel. They share a unique bond. The award cannot be earned by hard work or skill or ingenuity. When you see the medal ribbon on the breast or in the lapel of the recipient you know that they bore the brunt of the task of protecting this country. Needless to say, Arlington and many other cemeteries here and abroad, are filled with those who have earned this honor.

It was also in 1932 that the Military Order of the Purple Heart was established to look after the interests of the holders of the Purple Heart Award. It is also fitting that we mark its 50th anniversary this month by passage of the tribute which that fine organization has suggested.

I thank those who joined me in this effort in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on third reading and passage of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution (H.J. Res. 526) was ordered to a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to indefinitely postpone Calendar Order No. 722, Senate Joint Resolution 207, which is the Senate companion bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee.

The motion was agreed to.

RECOGNITION OF AMERICAN EX-PRISONERS OF WAR ORGANIZATION

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from further consideration of H.R. 5380 relating to American ex-prisoners of war, and I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the immediate consideration of that measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 5380) to recognize the organization known as American Ex-Prisoners of War.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate and open to amendment. If there be no amendment to be offered, the question is on the third reading and passage of the bill.

The bill (H.R. 5380) was ordered to a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, I now move to indefinitely postpone the Senate companion bill, S. 2174, which is Calendar Order No. 721.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee.

The motion was agreed to.

DELAY OF THE EFFECTIVE DATE OF PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO RULE 4 OF THE FEDERAL RULES OF CIVIL PROCEDURE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask that the Chair lay before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives on H.R. 6663.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHAFEE). The bill will be stated by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 6663) to delay the effective date of proposed amendments to rule 4 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the bill will be considered as having been read twice by its title and the Senate will proceed to its immediate consideration.

The bill was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, there are certain items on today's Executive Calendar which I am prepared to deal with and one other item on the calendar of general orders.

I first invite the attention of the minority leader to Calendar Order No. 709, S. 1785 and ask if he is in a position to consider that matter at this time.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Is that on the Executive Calendar?

Mr. NUNN. It pertains to labor racketeering.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes. We are ready to proceed.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I apologize to the minority leader. I am told that one Member on this side who has an interest in this matter and wishes to be in the Chamber when it is addressed is not yet here.

So I postpone that for the moment and instead inquire of the minority leader if he is in position to consider certain items on today's Executive Calendar. The ones I hope we might consider begin under New Reports on page 4, the U.S. Postal Service, National Council on the Humanities, continuing through page 5, including the heading The Judiciary, which is the entire list.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. President, those nominees have been cleared by Senators on this side.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the minority leader.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent that the Senate go into executive session for the purpose of considering the nominations just identified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask that the clerk report the nominations.

U.S. POSTAL SERVICE

The assistant legislative clerk read the nomination of Peter E. Voss, of Ohio, to be a Governor of the U.S. Postal Service.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is considered and confirmed.

NATIONAL COUNCIL ON THE HUMANITIES

The assistant legislative clerk read the nomination of A. Lawrence Chickering, of California, to be a member of the National Council on the Humanities.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is considered and confirmed.

The assistant legislative clerk read the nomination of Gertrude Himmelfarb, of New York, to be a member of the National Council on the Humanities.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is considered and confirmed.

The assistant legislative clerk read the nomination of James Clayburn La Force, Jr., of California, to be a member of the National Council on the Humanities.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPECTER). The nomination is considered and confirmed.

The assistant legislative clerk read the nomination of Rita Ricardo-Campbell, of California, to be a member of the National Council on the Humanities.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is considered and confirmed.

The assistant legislative clerk read the nomination of Peter J. Stanlis, of Illinois, to be a member of the National Council on the Humanities.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is considered and confirmed.

The assistant legislative clerk read the nomination of Walter Berns, of Maryland, to be a member of the National Council on the Humanities.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is considered and confirmed.

The assistant legislative clerk read the nomination of George Carey, of Virginia, to be a member of the National Council on the Humanities.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is considered and confirmed.

The assistant legislative clerk read the nomination of Ellis Sandoz, of Louisiana, to be a member of the National Council on the Humanities.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is considered and confirmed.

THE JUDICIARY

The assistant legislative clerk read the nomination of J. Lawrence Irving, of California, to be U.S. district judge for the southern district of California.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is considered and confirmed.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that it may be in order to move to reconsider en bloc the votes by which these nominees were confirmed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. I so move, Mr. President.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be immediately notified that the Senate has given its consent to these nominations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now return to legislative session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it so ordered.

LABOR MANAGEMENT RACKETEERING ACT

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I now see the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma is on the floor. He had indicated a desire to be present when we considered S. 1785, I believe, and I am prepared to proceed to that item now, if the minority leader is prepared.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, the minority is prepared to go forward.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the minority leader.

I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate Calendar No. 709, S. 1785.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the bill by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1785) to increase the penalties for violations of the Taft-Hartley Act, to prohibit persons, upon their convictions of certain crimes, from holding offices in or certain positions related to labor organizations and employee benefit plans, and to clarify certain responsibilities of the Department of Labor.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill which had been reported from the Committee on Labor and Human Resources with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert the following:

That this Act may be referred to as the "Labor Management Racketeering Act of 1982".

SEC. 2. (a) Subsection (d) of section 302 of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947 (29 U.S.C. 186) is amended to read as follows:

"(d)(1) Any person who participates in a transaction involving a payment, loan, or delivery of money or other thing of value to a labor organization in payment of membership dues or to a joint labor-management trust fund as defined by clause (B) of the proviso to clause (5) of subsection (c) of this section or to a plant, area, or industry-wide labor-management committee that is received and used by such labor organization, trust fund, or committee, which transaction does not satisfy all the applicable requirements of subsections (c)(4) through (c)(9) of this section, and willfully and with intent to benefit himself or to benefit other persons he knows are not permitted to receive a payment, loan, money, or other thing of value under subsections (c)(4) through (c)(9) violates this subsection, shall, upon conviction thereof, be guilty of a felony and be subject to a fine of not more than $15,000, or imprisoned for not more than five years, or both; but if the value of the amount of money or thing of value involved in any violation of the provisions of this section does not exceed $1,000, such person shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and be subject to a fine of not more than $10,000, or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both.

"(2) Except for violations involving transactions covered by subsection (d)(1) of this section, any person who willfully violates this section shall, upon conviction thereof, be guilty of a felony and be subject to a fine of not more than $15,000, or imprisoned for not more than five years, or both; but if the value of the amount of money or thing of value involved in any violation of the provisions of this section does not exceed $1,000, such person shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and be subject to a fine of not more than $10,000, or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both.".

(b) Subsection (e) of such section is amended to read as follows:

"(e) The district courts of the United States and the United States courts of the territories and possessions shall have jurisdiction, for cause shown, and subject to the provisions of Rule 65 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure (relating to notice to opposite party), over—

"(1) suits alleging a violation of this section brought by any person directly affected by the alleged violation, and

"(2) suits brought by the United States alleging that a transaction involving a payment, loan, or delivery of money or other thing of value to a labor organization in payment of membership dues or a joint labor-management trust fund as provided for in clause (B) of the proviso to clause (5) of subsection (c) of this section or to a plant, area, or industry-wide labor-management committee violates this section,

to restrain such violations without regard to the provisions of section 6 of the Clayton Act (15 U.S.C. 17), section 20 of such Act (29 U.S.C. 52), and sections 1 through 15 of the Act entitled "An Act to amend the Judicial Code to define and limit the jurisdiction of courts sitting in equity, and for other purposes", approved March 23, 1932 (29 U.S.C. 101-115).

SEC. 3. (a) So much of subsection (a) of section 411 of title 1 of the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 (29 U.S.C. 1111) as follows "the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959 (29 U.S.C. 401)," is amended to read as follows: "any felony involving abuse or misuse of such person's labor organization or employee benefit plan position or employment, or conspiracy to commit any such crimes or attempt to commit any such crimes, or a crime in which any of the foregoing crimes is an element, shall serve or be permitted to serve—

"(1) as an administrator, fiduciary, officer, trustee, custodian, counsel, agent, employee, or representative in any capacity of any employee benefit plan,

"(2) as a consultant or adviser to an employee benefit plan, including but not limited to any entity whose activities are in whole or substantial part devoted to providing goods or services to any employee benefit plan, or

"(3) in any capacity that involves decision-making authority or custody or control of the moneys, funds, assets, or property of any employee benefit plan, during or for the period of ten years after such conviction or after the end of such imprisonment, whichever is later, unless the sentencing court on the motion of the person convicted sets a lesser period of at least five years after such conviction or after the end of such imprisonment, whichever is later, and unless prior to the end of such period, in the case of a person so convicted or imprisoned (A) his citizenship rights, having been revoked as a result of such conviction, have been fully restored, or (B) the United States Parole Commission determines that such person's service in any capacity referred to in paragraphs (1) through (3) would not be contrary to the purposes of this title. Prior to making any such determination the Commission shall hold an administrative hearing and shall give notice to such proceeding by certified mail to the Secretary of Labor and to State, county, and Federal prosecuting officials in the jurisdiction or jurisdictions in which such person was convicted. The Commission's determination in any such proceeding shall be final. No person shall knowingly hire, retain, employ, or otherwise place any other person to serve in any capacity in violation of this subsection. Notwithstanding the preceding provisions of this subsection, no corporation or partnership will be precluded from acting as an administrator, fiduciary, officer, trustee, custodian, counsel, agent, or employee of any employee benefit plan or as a consultant to any employee benefit plan without a notice, hearing, and determination by such Parole Commission that such service would be inconsistent with the intention of this section.".

(b) Subsection (b) of such section is amended to read as follows:

"(b) Any person who intentionally violates this section shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than five years, or both.".

(c) Subsection (c) of such section is amended to read as follows:

"(c) For the purpose of this section:

"(1) A person shall be deemed to have been 'convicted' and under the disability of 'conviction' from the date of the judgment of the trial court, regardless of whether that judgment remains under appeal.

"(2) The term 'consultant' means any person who, for compensation, advises, or represents an employee benefit plan or who provides other assistance to such plan, concerning the establishment or operation of such plan.

"(3) A period of parole shall not be considered as part of a period of imprisonment.".

(d) Such section is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(d) Whenever any person—

"(1) by operation of this section, has been barred from office or other position in an employee benefit plan as a result of a conviction, and

"(2) has filed an appeal of that conviction, any salary which would be otherwise due such person by virtue of such office or position, shall be placed in escrow by the individual or organization responsible for payment of such salary. Payment of such salary into escrow shall continue for the duration of the appeal or for the period of time during which such salary would be otherwise due, whichever period is shorter. Upon the final reversal of such person's conviction on appeal, the amounts in escrow shall be paid to such person. Upon the final sustaining of that person's conviction on appeal, the amounts in escrow shall be returned to the individual or organization responsible for payments of those amounts. Upon final reversal of such person's conviction, such person shall no longer be barred by this statute from assuming any position from which such person was previously barred.".

SEC. 4. (a) So much of subsection (a) of section 504 of the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959 (29 U.S.C. 504) as follows "or a violation of title II or III of this Act" is amended to read as follows: "any felony involving abuse or misuse of such person's labor organization or employee benefit plan position or employment, or conspiracy to commit any such crimes, shall serve or be permitted to serve—

"(1) as a consultant or adviser to any labor organization,

"(2) as an officer, director, trustee, member of any executive board or similar governing body, business agent, manager, organizer, employee, or representative in any capacity of any labor organization,

"(3) as a labor relations consultant or adviser to a person engaged in an industry or activity affecting commerce, or as an officer, director, agent, or employee of any group or association of employers dealing with any labor organization, or in a position having specific collective bargaining authority or direct responsibility in the area of labor-management relations in any corporation or association engaged in an industry or activity affecting commerce,

"(4) in a position which entitles its occupant to a share of the proceeds of, or as an officer or executive or administrative employee of, any entity whose activities are in whole or substantial part devoted to providing goods or services to any labor organization, or

"(5) in any capacity that involves decision-making authority concerning, or decision-making authority over, or custody of, or control of the moneys, funds, assets, or property of any labor organization, during or for the period of ten years after such conviction or after the end of such imprisonment, whichever is later, unless the sentencing court on the motion of the person convicted sets a lesser period of at least five years after such conviction or after the end of such imprisonment, whichever is later, and unless prior to the end of such period, in the case of a person so convicted or imprisoned, (A) his citizenship rights, having been revoked as a result of such conviction, have been fully restored, or (B) the United States Parole Commission determines that such person's service in any capacity referred to in clauses (1) through (5) would not be contrary to the purposes of this Act. Prior to making any such determination the Commission shall hold an administrative hearing and shall give notice of such proceeding by certified mail to the Secretary of Labor and to State, county, and Federal prosecuting officials in the jurisdiction or jurisdictions in which such person was convicted. The Commission's determination in any such proceeding shall be final. No person shall knowingly hire, retain, employ, or otherwise place any other person to serve in any capacity in violation of this subsection.".

(b) Subsection (b) of such section is amended to read as follows:

"(b) Any person who willfully violates this section shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than five years, or both.".

(c) Subsection (c) of such section is amended to read as follows:

"(c) For the purpose of this section:

"(1) A person shall be deemed to have been 'convicted' and under the disability of 'conviction' from the date of the judgment of the trial court, regardless of whether that judgment remains under appeal.

"(2) A period of parole shall not be considered as part of a period of imprisonment.".

(d) Such section 504 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(1) by operation of this section, has been barred from office or other position in a labor organization or employee benefit plan as a result of a conviction, and

"(2) has filed an appeal of that conviction, any salary which would be otherwise due such person by virtue of such office or position, shall be placed in escrow by the individual employer or organization responsible for payment of such salary. Payment of such salary into escrow shall continue for the duration of the appeal or for the period of time during which such salary would be otherwise due, whichever period is shorter. Upon the final reversal of such person's conviction on appeal, the amounts in escrow shall be paid to such person. Upon the final sustaining of such person's conviction on appeal, the amounts in escrow shall be returned to the individual employer or organization responsible for payments of those amounts. Upon final reversal of such person's conviction, such person shall no longer be barred by this statute from assuming any position from which such person was previously barred.".

SEC. 5. (a) The first paragraph of section 506 of title 1 of the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 (29 U.S.C. 1136) is amended by striking out "In order" and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(a) COORDINATION WITH OTHER AGENCIES AND DEPARTMENTS.—In order".

(b) Such section is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(b) RESPONSIBILITY FOR DETECTING AND INVESTIGATING CIVIL AND CRIMINAL VIOLATIONS OF EMPLOYEE RETIREMENT INCOME SECURITY ACT AND RELATED FEDERAL LAWS.—The Secretary shall have the responsibility and authority to detect and investigate and refer, where appropriate, civil and criminal violations related to the provisions of this title and other related Federal laws, including the detection, investigation, and appropriate referrals of related violations of title 18 of the United States Code. Nothing in this subsection shall be construed to preclude other appropriate Federal agencies from detecting and investigating civil and criminal violations of this title and other related Federal laws.".

(c) The title of such section is amended to read as follows:

"Coordination and responsbility of agencies enforcing Employee Retirement Income Security Act and related Federal laws".

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I am pleased to bring to the floor today, S. 1785, the Labor Management Racketeering Act of 1982. The fact that this bill is presented to the Senate in its present form is a tribute to the industry and diligence of Senator NICKLES, the chairman of the Labor Subcommittee, and the cooperation of the ranking minority member of the Senate Labor and Human Resources Committee, Senator KENNEDY. Their efforts have insured that this legislation reflects a bipartisan effort.

I would also like to give special recognition to Senators NUNN and RUDMAN. The comprehensive record on union corruption as it exists on our waterfronts is directly the result of their vigorous and tireless leadership of the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations.

S. 1785 is one of the most critical pieces of labor legislation which Congress will vote on this year. Without question, corrupt union officials and management representatives pose one of the most sinister threats to the health and well-being of the trade union movement and to our industrial democracy. Their existence undermines the integrity of the collective-bargaining process; their activities taint the hard work of thousands of honest, committed union officers and members. They have literally robbed the American public of millions of dollars in bribes, kickbacks, and payoffs, sapping the economic resources we so desperately need to increase productivity and generate employment opportunities. Their disregard for Federal labor laws and the Government's correlative failure to enforce these statutes aggressively has undermined the statutory and regulatory prohibitions devised by Congress over the last 30 years to combat the existence of union corruption.

Some have contended that union corruption is more a cliche than fact, that unions are being unfairly categorized in the press and in Congress because of the criminal activities of only a handful of corrupt officials. It is true that the majority of union members and union officials are honest men and women, committed to the principles of collective bargaining and our economic system. Unfortunately, it is also true that many officials are not so committed; instead, they look upon labor management relations as a field ripe for manipulation and abuse for personal gain and profit. Moreover, they perceive Government enforcement as being lax at best, and the penalties if one is actually caught as being more of a minor, temporary nuisance than true punishment.

The endorsement of this legislation by Lane Kirkland, the distinguished president of the AFL-CIO, and Douglas Fraser, president of the United Auto Workers, underlines the reality and seriousness of the problem before us today. It is a tribute to these two men that they have been willing to work with us to insure that the bill is both effective and fair.

How serious is the problem of labor corruption and abuse of our Federal labor statutes? Take for example the case of the International Longshoremen's Association. In 1975, the Department of Justice launched a nationwide investigation of racketeering in our waterfronts on the east and gulf coasts. Their sweeping inquiry produced evidence that organized crime was heavily involved in racketeering, and the Department's efforts ultimately led to the criminal convictions of more than 100 high level ILA officials and shipping company executives.

In 1981, the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations held hearings which revealed that the convictions obtained by the Justice Department had not broken our waterfronts free from the grip of orgainized crime and other criminal elements. Today, corruption is still part of doing business in some of our Nation's ports. Payoffs are considered an expected business expense and their cost is routinely passed on to the consumer. In other words, the citizens of this country have been forced into financing criminal activities in our ports.

Consider the case of one of these officials, Mr. Landon Williams, the president of the Jacksonville, Fla. Local of the ILA, No. 1408. He is also a trustee of eight different pension and welfare plans associated with local 1408. In 1979, Mr. Williams was convicted of accepting some $22,000 in bribes. He was selling labor peace. Testimony at his trial revealed that part of the bribe money was generated when Mr. Williams allowed an employer to discount pension contributions so that the excess money could be paid to him. Furthermore, the testimony in that trial included direct evidence that Mr. Williams had accepted payoffs from undercover law enforcement officers.

One would presume that Mr. Williams is now in jail or that he at least is no longer a union official or a trustee of the eight pension and benefit plans associated with local 1408. In fact, he is still president of the local and he is still serving as a trustee. Under current law, he can retain these positions despite his conviction because he has appealed the trial court's judgment.

Is Mr. Williams an exception? Unfortunately, he is not. The following ILA officials were found guilty but are still serving in their union offices:

George Barone, international vice president, local 1922; convicted on September 1, 1979 for racketeering, extortion, prohibited payments and tax fraud.

William Boyle, international vice president, local 1922; convicted on September 1, 1979 for racketeering, extortion, kickbacks and prohibited payments.

Cleveland Turner, executive board member of the Atlantic and Gulf Coast District, Local 1922; convicted on September 1, 1979 for racketeering and prohibited payments.

James Vanderwyde, coordinator of the Atlantic and Gulf Coast District, Local 1922; convicted on September 1, 1979 for racketeering, prohibited payments and extortion.

These problems are not limited to the International Longshoremen's Association. In hearings I held early this year, it was revealed that between 1973 and 1977 corporations controlled by Morris Shenker or his family borrowed $24 million from the Southern Nevada Culinary Workers' Pension Fund. At one point in 1977, the $24 million he had borrowed represented almost 65 percent of the fund's total assets of $37 million. Of that total, $15 million in loans dated after 1974 were in clear violation of the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974. These loans have never been repaid.

In 1981, Mr. Shenker and the Internal Revenue Service entered into a settlement for back taxes amounting to $199,000. The settlement indicated that "any alleged liability or tax under ERISA which had been or may be assessed by the IRS against Shenker would be final, conclusive and binding." Shenker is now arguing that the language of this settlement precludes him from having to pay back the money he borrowed from the fund. And today, it is estimated that if one considers principal and interest Mr. Shenker owes the fund over $45 million.

Federal enforcement of labor laws also has been lacking. For example, witnesses at the hearings I conducted provided evidence that local officials of the International Boilermakers Union had been selling union cards or books at extortionate prices, that unqualified welders were being sold these books, and that union members were forced to buy raffle tickets. Even worse, the testimony indicated that these unqualified welders had been working on nuclear powerplants. All of these activities violate Federal labor and criminal statutes, yet the Federal Government has chosen to ignore this evidence, leaving honest welders who had the courage to expose this abuse to their own fate.

To combat the corruption that plagues labor relations today, we need both strong statutes and committed enforcement. S. 1785 will provide the statutory basis for both by strengthening three key statutes: the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947, known as the Taft-Hartley Act; the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974, know as ERISA; and, the Labor Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959, known as the Landrum-Griffin Act.

First, the bill raises the buying and selling of labor peace, which is prohibited in the Taft-Hartley Act, from a misdemeanor to a felony, subject to imprisonment of up to 5 years and a fine of $15,000 or both. Testimony received by the committee has made it clear that the existing penalties have not served as an effective deterrent.

Second, S. 1785 expands the list of positions an individual convicted of committing a disqualifying crime is barred from holding in a union or with an employee benefit plan. Convicted officials will no longer be able to circumvent the intent of these statutes by taking allegedly clerical positions or serving as consultants during the disqualification period, only to resume their previous positions of authority and influence once this period has ended. The bill also expands the list of disqualifying crimes contained in these two statutes.

Third, the bill extends the disqualification period from 5 to 10 years in order that a union or benefit plan can thoroughly rid itself of the influence of convicted officials. This provision does provide for judicial discretion in application of the ban, however, As I understand, this discretion is included to accommodate the rare occasions where a 10-year ban might be considered too harsh. For example, at the time of his conviction of a disqualifying crime, an individual might not be a union member or might not have given any thought to the ramifications of his act with regard to holding office in a union or with a benefit plan. If he were to serve his sentence and subsequently obtain a job which would lead to election to union office, a 10-year ban might be unnecessarily rigid. In such rare circumstances, the judge is given the discretion to reduce the disqualification period to no less than 5 years.

Fourth, S. 1785 redefines "date of conviction" so that once an individual is found guilty of a disqualifying crime, he is immediately barred from holding a series of specific positions with a union or employer, regardless of whether he has appealed his conviction. This provision will end the blatant abuse of our appellate procedures by union officials who are continuing to engage in the very prohibited activities which led to their conviction simply because they have appealed the trial court judgment. Members of a union or participants in a benefit plan are entitled to have their interests and rights protected from those found guilty in a court of law. To protect the rights of an individual who has appealed his conviction, the bill provides that his salary will be paid into an escrow account which will be turned over to the official if his conviction is overturned. This represents an equitable treatment of two competing interests—the interest of the convicted official on appeal and the interests of union members or participants in a pension plan in having their organizations free of criminal influence.

Fifth, S. 1785 will increase the maximum term of imprisonment for intentional violations of ERISA and the Landrum-Griffin Act from 1 to 5 years.

Finally, S. 1785 makes it clear that the Department of Labor has not only the authority, but also the responsibility for detection, investigation, and referral of civil and criminal violations of the appropriate Federal labor laws to the Department of Justice. This is perhaps the most important provision in S. 1785. Unless the Department of Labor is committed to the principles of this legislation and to ridding the labor movement of organized crime and other criminal elements, our efforts today to strengthen these three statutes may prove fruitless.

Unfortunately, in the past, this commitment has not been evident. In three separate cases reviewed in depth by the Senate Labor and Human Resources Committee, the Department of Labor failed at a crucial juncture to protect the rights of the affected unions and the general public.

Moreover, testimony given to the committee indicated that several important cases were terminated because the Office of the Solicitor of Labor allowed the statute of limitations to run out. Similarly, cases ready for referral to the Department of Justice were kept at the Department. Its own Office of Enforcement was told instead to seek voluntary compliance from individuals who had demonstrated a flagrant disregard for Federal statutes and the responsibilities connected with the offices they held.

S. 1785 makes clear that it is the intent of Congress that the Department of Labor enforce these statutes aggressively. The Department has repeatedly testified that it needs stronger statutes and penalties if it is to accomplish the task Congress has given it. S. 1785 provides the Department with many of the amendments it has requested and will give it the statutory basis and authority it needs to effectuate the purpose of this legislation—the elimination of corruption and criminal elements from the field of labor management relations.

I would like to note that in clarifying congressional intent, we believe that the Department can accomplish its mission with its current budget.

Mr. President, I believe that S. 1785 is an important first step in our effort to eliminate corruption from unions and employee benefit plans. It may not be as strong as some would have liked, and it may be stronger than others had hoped. That is the nature of a consensus bill. Nonetheless, it is an important, and I hope, encouraging signal to the working men and women of this country that the presence of organized crime and other criminal elements will not be tolerated at the waterfronts, in unions, or in pension plans. I look forward to the day when this bill is signed into law, because it will afford unions and employee benefit plans with the means to operate free of the influence or fear of corrupt union and management officials.

Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. President, I support S. 1785, a bill which will afford greater protection to unions and employee benefit plans from corrupt union and management officials. The bill is a bipartisan compromise and will clarify existing laws relating to plans and pension funds and will strengthen the Taft-Hartley, Landrum-Griffin, and Employee Retirement Income Security Acts as well. S. 1785 is needed because current Federal prohibitions and penalties designed to protect the legitimacy of labor relations have, in certain respects, proved inadequate. S. 1785 will strengthen these prohibitions and penalties and will end abuse of existing labor laws.

Certain violations of the Taft-Hartley Act, this bill will raise from a misdemeanor to a felony. Penalties for violations will also be raised. The bill amends the Landrum-Griffin and Employee Retirement Income Security Acts to disqualify from serving as administrators or consultants anyone convicted of a felony involving abuse or misuse of a position with a pension or employee benefit plan. To be quite specific—any position involving collective bargaining authority or direct responsibility in the area of labor management relations with a corporation or association will be barred to a convicted felon. The debarment period set by this bill maintains the 5-year minimum set by current law, but that minimum debarment period may now be increased to as many as 10 years. Unlike current law, S. 1785 will provide that persons convicted of a felony may be removed from office immediately upon conviction, rather than waiting through a time-consuming appeals procedure. To protect individuals during the appeals process however, the bill provides that all salary due to such person be paid into an escrow account and the money returned to the individual if the conviction is overturned.

Another major improvement this bill makes is to confer upon the Secretary of Labor direct responsibility to investigate civil and criminal violations of the Federal pension laws and related statutes.

The committee feels that these changes are a step in the right direction toward curbing abuse of official positions with employee benefit and pension plans. Hearings held by the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations and by the Subcommittee on Labor have clearly demonstrated the need for legislation which will increase the protection afforded to pension and employee benefit funds. Over 13 million Americans stand to benefit from these pension protections.

Before I close, I would like to take a moment to commend the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma, Senator NICKLES for his leadership in working out this bipartisan compromise bill. I know that Senator NICKLES has been steadfast in his commitment to improve protection of these funds for the use of the beneficiaries to whom they were promised. S. 1785 will make these needed improvements to labor-management law and I encourage my colleagues to support it.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I say to the majority leader that we do have a committee amendment, and we also have an amendment Senator HATCH and I are cosponsoring. I would anticipate that all of the amendments are at the desk.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, is there a committee amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a substitute amendment which will be acted upon after the floor amendment.

Mr. BAKER. I understand. Then the Senator from Georgia (Mr. NUNN) and the Senator from Oklahoma (Mr. NICKLES) will proceed with the consideration of this measure, and I now yield the floor.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1164

(Purpose: To clarify the convictions to which the disability under section 411 of the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1975 and section 504 of the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959 applies)

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I have an amendment that I send to the desk. It is an amendment sponsored by Senator HATCH and myself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Georgia (Mr. NUNN), for himself and Mr. HATCH, proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1164.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the end of the bill add the following new section:

SEC. 6. (a) The amendments made by section 3 and section 4 of this Act shall take effect with respect to any judgment of conviction entered by the trial court after the date of enactment of this Act, except that that portion of such amendments relating to the commencement of the period of disability shall apply to any judgment of conviction entered prior to the date of enactment of this Act if a right of appeal or an appeal from such judgment is pending on the date of enactment of this Act.

(b) Subject to subsection (a) the amendments made by sections 3 and 4 shall not affect any disability under section 411 of the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 or under section 504 of the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959 in effect on the date of enactment of this Act.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment is to make retroactive only one portion of S. 1785—the commencement of the disqualification mechanisms of section 411 of the Employee Retirement Income Security Act and section 504 of the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act at the time of the trial court conviction.

Currently, an individual who is found guilty of an act prohibited under these two statutes is disqualified from holding certain specified positions in a union or employee benefit plan for a period of 5 years. The disqualification period begins on either the date of the trial court judgment or the date of the final sustaining of such judgment on appeal, whichever is later. S. 1785 amends these two statutes to read that the commencement of the disqualification period begins on the date of the trial court judgment, regardless of whether that decision is appealed. This amendment would make this portion of S. 1785 retroactive.

The amendment also makes it clear that nothing in S. 1785 or this amendment can be construed as authority to overturn a conviction or to terminate prematurely a disqualification period in existence prior to the effective date of the legislation.

Testimony received by the Senate Labor and Human Resources Committee indicated that the present alternative standard has allowed union officials, who have been convicted of disqualifying crimes such as fraud and embezzlement, to retain their union offices or positions of control over pension plans while their convictions were being appealed, a period which can exceed 2 years. The testimony made it clear that in several instances, these officials continued to engage in the same prohibited activity during the appeal process that led to their trial court conviction. While the bill will end this abuse, it would only apply to those convicted subsequent to the effective date of the legislation. Those individuals convicted prior to the passage of the bill who have appealed their decision will be able to continue to take advantage of this procedural loophole.

The amendment is designed to prevent this abuse of appellate procedures from occurring, and thus it will promote the overall purpose of the bill—to provide union members and participants in a pension plan immediate and effective protection from convicted officials and other criminal elements.

Whenever a bill or an amendment makes reference to a retroactivity clause, it is important that the necessary steps are taken to insure that the clause is fashioned in a manner which insures that it is not unconstitutional.

When the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act was passed by Congress in 1959, it contained a section which stated that the disqualification mechanism established in the statute applied to convictions regardless of whether the conviction occurred before or after the effective date of the statute. Moreover, this retroactivity clause applied to all of the disqualification procedures contained in the statute.

The constitutionality of this retroactive clause was raised in Postma v. International Brotherhood of Teamsters, 337 F.2d 609 (2d Cir. 1964). The appellant alleged that the application of the 1959 statute to a previous conviction violated the constitutional prohibition against bills of attainder and ex post facto laws.

The court rejected this argument summarily, citing the Supreme Court's decision in DeVeau v. Braisted, 363 U.S. 144 (1960). At issue there was a similar disqualification mechanism established under State law, namely section 8 of the New York Waterfront Commission Act of 1953. It too applied to convictions which preceded the enactment of the statute. Addressing the constitutionality of such a retroactive provision, the Court stated:

The distinguishing feature of a bill of attainder is the substitution of a legislative for a judicial determination of guilt. Clearly, § 8 embodies no further implications of appellant's guilt than are contained in his 1920 judicial conviction; and so it manifestly is not a bill of attainder. The mark of an ex post facto law is the imposition of what can fairly be designated punishment for past acts. The question in each case where unpleasant consequences are brought to bear upon an individual for prior conduct, is whether the legislative aim was to punish that individual for past activity, or whether the restriction of the individual comes about as a relevant incident to a regulation of a present situation, such as the proper qualifications for a profession. No doubt is justified regarding the legislative purpose of § 8. The proof is overwhelming that New York sought not to punish ex-felons, but to devise what was felt to be a much-needed scheme of regulation of the waterfront, and for the effectuation of that scheme it became important whether individuals had previously been convicted of a felony (363 U.S. at 160, citations ommitted).

The amendment I am proposing meets these standards. As the Supreme Court noted, the distinguishing feature of a bill of attainder is that it substitutes a legislative determination of guilt for a judicial determination. The amendment to S. 1785 simply applies the disqualification period to those who have already been convicted. It contains no legislative determination of guilt, nor does it deprive any individual of a constitutionally guaranteed right to a judicial procedure. The amendment only affects those who already have been convicted of a disqualifying crime in a court of law. Thus, it is not a bill of attainder.

The Supreme Court also stated in the DeVeau decision that the mark of an ex post facto law is the imposition of what can be designated as punishment for past acts. The Court then went on to clarify this statement by establishing the following standard: Was the legislative aim to punish an individual for past acts or does the restriction come about as an incident to the regulation of a present situation, such as the proper qualifications for a profession?

The purpose of this amendment is not to inflict new punishment. It is intended to bring immediate relief to the union rank and file from abuse by convicted officials. The legislative aim is to establish qualifications for certain key labor related positions, such as benefit plan trustee or union officer; it is regulatory in nature, not punitive. Consequently, any punishment inherent in the operation of this amendment is incidental to its purpose—the need to protect the rights of union members and pension plans from abuse by convicted officials, a need well established in the numerous congressional hearings which led to the drafting of S. 1785.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I will give a brief explanation of the amendment, then I would like to make some remarks. I know that the Senator from Oklahoma, Senator NICKLES, is on the floor. He has worked diligently on the measure. He and I have worked together on it, for a long time, and I think we would both like to make some remarks.

As far as the amendment Senator HATCH and I are offering, this amendment will make retroactive that portion of this bill which insures that convicted union officials will be barred from office immediately upon conviction as opposed to final disposition of their appeal. This amendment also makes it expressly clear the enactment of S. 1785 will not in any way serve to terminate restrictions placed upon individuals now barred from office. Those bars will remain as imposed under current law.

So I join Senator HATCH as a cosponsor of this amendment. This amendment would make retroactive the provisions relating to immediately barring union officials who are convicted rather than waiting until the appeal takes place.

The amendment makes that feature of this bill retroactive.

I wish to also commend Senator HATCH, the chairman of the Senate Committee on Labor and Human Resources, for the attention he has given this legislation since its introduction last year.

I know the Senator from Oklahoma would like to speak on this subject. I do not know whether he would like to speak on this amendment or whether we should move the amendment and then we can make our remarks on the bill.

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, just one comment on the amendment. I wholeheartedly concur with the Senator from Georgia. I ask unanimous consent to be added as a cosponsor of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. NICKLES. I think it is positive. I think it adds strength to S. 1785 and will help to make it a better tool to eliminate some of the abuses we found are actually happening today.

Mr. NUNN. I thank the Senator from Oklahoma. I move the adoption of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia (Mr. NUNN).

The amendment (UP No. 1164) was agreed to.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. NUNN. Yes; I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I congratulate the Senator from Georgia on this piece of legislation which I think is a very far-reading piece of legislation. I know it is one on which the Senator from Georgia has worked long and carefully for a number of years.

Having served on the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, which the Senator from Georgia was chairing at the time he was developing and seeing the need for this legislation, I know how careful he was in trying to see that the legislation was fairly put together and that it fairly represented literally the interests of working people in trying to protect them in the pension funds, the trust funds that are supposed to be held for the benefit of working people, and the wages that have been deducted from them in dues and to see that those funds were treated properly and handled fairly and to see that people that were convicted of improperly handling these funds and disregarding the rights of those workers were not allowed to continue to be in positions of high trust, as they have been in the past.

Mr. NUNN. If the Senator will yield briefly, I might add that the Senator from Florida was involved in all of those hearings, in the planning for the hearings and the preparation of the hearings themselves. The Senator from Oklahoma, even though he was not on the committee, attended many of those hearings and worked diligently on this. The Senator from Massachusetts, Senator KENNEDY, worked on this legislation and was very helpful and constructive in perfecting the legislation and moving it through the committee, as well as Senator HATCH. So all of these Senators deserve a great deal of credit.

I wish to particularly commend the Senator from Florida, however, because he sat through many hearings that involved his own State—and that is always a difficult circumstance—because, in fact, some of the most vivid abuses came in the State of Florida where people had been convicted, convicted for several years, of embezzlement, bribery, and other very serious violations. Yet, they were still holding, and continue to this day, in some instances, to hold high union offices in the key waterfront industries in the State of Florida, as well as New York.

So the Senator from Florida, I think, is probably more familiar with the abuses that have taken place under existing law in this area and the need for this law than any Member of this body. I commend him for his leadership and efforts in this respect.

Mr. CHILES. I thank the Senator from Georgia. I just wish to state, in that regard, the fact that the careful way in which the hearings were conducted and the record that was built, I think, was the leading factor in having the leadership of the unions themselves, the AFL-CIO, which has endorsed this through their leadership. I am delighted for that. And there were other unions that have supported it.

Mr. NUNN. The main support came from Lane Kirkland of the AFL-CIO, who testified before our subcommittee in October 1981 and spoke on behalf of most of organized labor—not all of it—in supporting this legislation.

Interestingly enough, the Teamsters Central States Pension Fund, represented by Mr. George Lehr, has written me endorsing this legislation.

Mr. CHILES. I also thought the Teamsters had, and I wanted to include them in my statement. But the fact that they have gone on record as supporting this, again, I think demonstrates that this is a bill that primarily is going to help the workingman.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I strongly urge Senate passage of S. 1785, known as the Labor Management Racketeering Act of 1982. This bill, which was introduced by me on October 28, 1981, has been reported favorably out of the Senate Labor and Human Resources Committee and has been endorsed by the Department of Labor, the Department of Justice, and, as we mentioned a moment ago, by the AFL-CIO.

I might add that Lane Kirkland, I think, gave the most significant testimony of any labor leader I have seen since I have been in the U.S. Senate when he appeared in October 1981 before our subcommittee and endorsed this bill. We worked very closely with Mr. Kirkland and his representatives in ironing out difficulties in this legislation. They have always worked in a very positive frame of mind and they have added significantly to the merits of this bill.

Interestingly enough, in the testimony, Mr. Kirkland said that the labor unions themselves simply could not clean their own house completely and they needed the assistance of this kind of legislation.

I believe it is particularly significant to see that this kind of endorsement has come forth. This is, without any doubt, the most significant piece of antiracketeering legislation that has come through the Congress since the Landrum-Griffin bill in the early 1960's or late 1950's.

S. 1785 attempts to remedy serious problems concerning the infiltration of some unions and some employee benefit plans by corrupt officials who have no real concern for the well-being of the honest rank-and-file union members they pretend to represent. Those problems were graphically illustrated in public hearings on waterfront corruption before the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations in February 1981. The legislation, which is now before us, is a direct result of those hearings. As ranking minority member and former chairman of the subcommittee, I had the opportunity to direct an extensive staff investigation of criminal activity within both the International Longshoremen's Association—ILA—and the American shipping industry.

This set of hearings followed a very extensive investigation of the waterfront and the corruption on the waterfront by the U.S. Department of Justice and the FBI. They did a superb job.

In 1975 the Justice Department launched a nationwide investigation of racketeering on our waterfronts. This sweeping inquiry culminated in the criminal convictions of more than 100 high-level ILA officials and shipping company executives.

These persons were charged with a variety of offenses ranging from violating the Taft-Hartley Act to extortion, payoffs, kickbacks, threats, intimidation, obstruction of justice, and income tax evasion.

Spurred by the success of the Department of Justice's UNIRAC investigation, the subcommittee staff interviewed numerous witnesses and reviewed countless other items of evidence in order to convey to the American public an accurate portrait of the American waterfront in the 1980's. That portrait, as presented in 2 weeks of hearings in February of last year, is, unfortunately a dismal one. Witness after witness described the struggle for economic survival in some ports which are riddled with a pervasive pattern of kickbacks and illegal payoffs to union officials.

My colleagues and I heard of payoffs to insure the award of work contracts, payoffs to maintain contracts already awarded, payoffs to insure labor peace, payoffs to allow management circumvention of labor strikes, payoffs to prevent the filing of fraudulent workmen's compensation claims, payoffs to expand business activity into new ports, and payoffs to accord certain companies the freedom to circumvent ILA contract requirements with impunity.

Especially disturbing is the fact that the evidence clearly suggests that, through that system of payoffs, recognized leaders of the traditional organized crime families influence and effectively dominate the International Longshoremen's Association and large segments of the American shipping industry. Only as recently as last month, our subcommittee, in public hearings on the Hotel Employees and Restaurant Employees International Union, received evidence of the corrupt influence of organized crime in labor-management relations in other industries. It is a sobering event, indeed, to learn that substantial portions of our national economy have fallen prey to the influence of organized crime.

I might add that their investigation and the revelations that came from that, with the cooperation we had from the Justice Department and the FBI, were absolutely essential in both the hearings and in the framing of this legislation.

In the case of the waterfront industries, we were told that a payoff is commonly treated as a mere cost of doing business which can be, and is, routinely passed on as an added cost to the consumer. Our traditional and cherished notions of free enterprise have become nearly nonexistent in some ports of this country.

These payoffs, though illegal under current law, are punishable only as a misdemeanor.

S. 1785 makes any such violation involving an amount of money greater than $1,000 a felony, punishable by up to 5 years imprisonment or a fine of up to $15,000, or both.

The bill also attempts to rid labor organizations and employee benefit plans of the influence of persons convicted of criminal offenses. Current disbarment provisions—29 U.S.C. 504 and 29 U.S.C. 1111—are expanded in several significant ways: Enlarging the categories of persons affected by the disbarment provisions; increasing the time barred from office or position from 5 to a possible maximum of 10 years; and providing for disbarment immediately upon conviction rather than after appeal.

I know that Senator NICKLES from Oklahoma would agree with me. He has had a very capable staff working for him on this legislation including Rick Lawson, from my hometown in Georgia. I am very proud of the work the Senator and his staff have done on this legislation, as well as the work by Marty Steinberg, Eleanore Hill, and others on my staff.

I know that Senator NICKLES would agree with me that one of the most distressing pieces of evidence that kept coming up in our hearings was the fact that when these witnesses did come forward, sometimes reluctantly, to testify as to these bribery-extortion type offenses—many times when the trial was over, even after a top official in the union had been convicted—these same witnesses had to go back and continue to bargain with that particular official. Even after conviction, these officials remained; and continue to remain to this day in office sometimes years and years and years after conviction. Then they go to the penitentiary for a brief period of time, and many times return to that very same union office.

The bill does provide that any salary otherwise payable shall be placed in escrow pending final disposition of any appeal.

We felt this was necessary because if there is an appeal and the conviction is reversed, then the union official, under the law, deserves protection, and we have provided for that.

Finally, our hearings examined more than the ways and means of criminal corruption itself. We also explored the adequacy of law enforcement's response to this corruption. As for the waterfront, several things quickly became obvious: First that the Department of Justice, through a massive assignment of resources and manpower in UNIRAC, had had great success in the short run; Second, that, if we are to eliminate such corruption on a permanent basis, continuous monitoring and enforcement efforts are required; and third, that the Department of Labor had generally failed to participate in criminal law enforcement efforts in this area. To correct this problem and to maximize available law enforcement resources in this area, S. 1785 clearly delineates the responsibility and authority of the Department of Labor to actively and effectively investigate and refer for prosecution criminal activities on the waterfront.

In addition to the principal provisions of S. 1785, Senator HATCH and I are today offering a floor amendment to the bill which will make retroactive that portion which insures that convicted union officials will be barred from office immediately upon conviction, as opposed to final disposition of their appeal. The amendment also makes expressly clear that the enactment of S. 1785 will not in any way serve to terminate restrictions placed on individuals now barred from office; those bars will remain as imposed under current law. I join Senator HATCH as cosponsor of that amendment and urge its adoption by the Senate along with passage of S. 1785. In doing so, I commend Senator HATCH, as chairman of the Senate Committee on Labor and Human Resources, for the attention and interest he has given to this legislation since its introduction last year.

I want to point out that this amendment has been drafted in response to concerns first raised by both the Department of Labor and the Department of Justice as to their ability to immediately bar individuals convicted yet still under appeal. The floor amendment which Senator HATCH offers and which I cosponsor, fully meets those concerns and bears the approval of the Department of Labor and the Department of Justice, as well as the AFL-CIO.

In sum, I want to stress again that the provisions of this bill are designed to protect the best interests of labor and management, as well as the American consumers. Our hearings strongly indicated that corruption within the leadership of the ILA, as documented by the convictions of numerous ILA officers, is depriving the average longshoreman of the full benefits of his union membership. Not only did the ILA itself fail to act to remove those officials and prevent further corruption, but ILA President Teddy Gleason himself testified, with apparent lack of concern, that the ILA "will have to * * * run a rehabilitation center." By contrast, the provisions of S. 1785 will protect the union member where corrupt officials have failed to do so.

Mr. President, the record is clear that the vast majority of union officers, employee benefit plan officials and rank-and-file union members are honest, hardworking, law-abiding citizens. Our Nation can and should be justifiably proud of the enormous contribution our unions have made to the economic and social strength of the United States. But our hearings have shown that a small group of parasites have fastened themselves onto the body of the labor movement. These parasites are perverting the true interests of the union members they claim to represent through a pattern of payoffs and extortion. The unions have labored to shed themselves of these people, but in many cases they have been unable to do so alone. I believe that the unions need our help here in Congress. I believe that this bill is a major step forward in providing the extra assistance needed for the unions to finally rid themselves of those corrupt officials who are motivated not by the welfare of the American worker but by their own greed.

Mr. President, I again want to commend the Senator from Oklahoma, Senator NICKLES, not only for his work on this legislation but also for his work on S. 1182 the very important bill that passed the Senate yesterday under his guidance. I was a cosponsor of that legislation. It deals with the civil side of this very extensive problem that is pervasive on the waterfront. That legislation also is landmark legislation.

I might add that if you take these two bills together, without any doubt, I think we have made very significant progress if we can not only pass these through the Senate today but if they can indeed become the law of the land. I am very hopeful that the House of Representatives will follow soon and pass this legislation in the very near future.

Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, today I am pleased to join my distinguished colleague, Senator SAM NUNN, in support of S. 1785, the Labor-Management Racketeering Act of 1982. This bill originated from hearings on waterfront corruption held by the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations of the Senate Committee on Governmental Affairs held in February of last year. I was able to attend these hearings and later cosponsored the bill when it was introduced by Senator NUNN on October 28, 1981. Those hearings and the hearings conducted by the Subcommittee on Labor of the Senate Committee on Labor and Human Resources, which I chair, have led me to conclude that this legislation is of vital concern to American workers and their families who depend on the integrity of officials of labor organizations and employee benefit plans. I congratulate Mr. NUNN for his efforts on their behalf.

This legislation amends three statutes to afford greater protection for unions and employee benefit plans from corrupt union and management officials. The first statute which is amended is the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947, more commonly referred to as the Taft-Hartley Act. Section 302 of this act prohibits the buying of labor peace, the payment of bribes, and other similar transactions. Currently, violations are misdemeanors. For flagrant violations not falling within the exceptions of this act, the penalty is raised to a felony. A misdemeanor conviction under Taft-Hartley currently carries a maximum fine of $10,000 and a maximum imprisonment of 1 year. These maximums are little deterrent to the temptation of receiving a large sum of money in violation of the act. Therefore, the prison term is increased to a maximum of 5 years and the fine to a maximum of $15,000. This treatment of the crime as a felony should provide the extra incentive to reduce an unlawful temptation.

Second, amendments are made to the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974—ERISA. Under current law, an individual convicted of certain crimes by a trial court is allowed to remain in a position of trust with an employee benefit plan until he has exhausted his right of appeal. This can lead to future abuse of the employee benefit plans. At the Labor Subcommittee hearings, the Labor Department presented the following example:

> There is a man in Florida who at one time was the president of one union local, the manager of another, president of the district council, and also a trustee of a benefit plan fund. He was convicted of embezzling funds from six labor organizations and funds. While these matters were on appeal, he remained in a number of the positions until the convictions were eventually sustained. He was later further convicted of illegally transferring funds and has since been indicted for still other allegedly illegal acts occurring during the appeals period. It is estimated that $1 million was taken during this period.

The Labor Department further asserted that this is not an isolated case.

It is clear that this type of abuse cannot be allowed to continue. S. 1785 would prohibit individuals from remaining in their employee benefit plan positions from the date of the trial court conviction, not the date of last appeal. Escrow provisions for any salary due such an individual would protect him in the event his conviction was later overruled. Finally, the maximum term of imprisonment for a violation of this section is increased from 1 to 5 years.

The third statute which S. 1785 amends is the Labor Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959, Landrum-Griffin. Changes here are similar to those made in ERISA on the belief that members of a labor organization deserve the same protection as funds in an employee benefit plan. Therefore, the date of conviction becomes the date of the trial court judgment, not the date of last appeal. Similar escrow provisions also are provided.

Currently, under both ERISA and Landrum-Griffin, the period for which an individual is barred from his position is 5 years. The Department of Labor presented the following example of abuse of this time limit under current law at the Labor Subcommittee hearing:

> We are aware of a case in which a union officer was convicted of embezzlement, and as a result, he was disqualified from serving in the positions which are now covered for five years, the present ban. During his period of disqualification, he was hired by the union as a chauffeur, and drove the union officers about. Upon the expiration of the disqualification, however, he was immediately appointed as an organizer for the union and was able to begin exercising great official authority. Had the ban on activities been longer, it is doubtful whether this person would have continued to serve as a chauffeur and then step right into a responsible position.

S. 1785 eliminates this abused exception for clerical or custodial duties, such as chauffeur, from Landrum-Griffin. No such similar exemption is contained in ERISA. In addition, the 5-year ban under both ERISA and Landrum-Griffin is increased to a maximum of 10 years unless the sentencing court reduces it to no less than 5 years.

Finally, S. 1785 mandates the Department of Labor to detect, investigate, and refer, where appropriate, civil and criminal violations of ERISA and other related Federal laws. Currently, the Department of Labor has civil enforcement authority under both ERISA and Landrum-Griffin. Often in the course of investigating alleged civil violations of these acts, potential criminal violations are also discovered. Testimony indicated that the Departments of Labor and Justice often do not coordinate their efforts in following through on these criminal matters. S. 1785 clearly establishes the Labor Department's role when such issues are raised.

Mr. President, an article in today's Wall Street Journal underscores the urgency of passage of S. 1785. The article states that "convicted labor racketeer Anthony "Tony Pro" Provenzano received a salary of $28,143 last year from a Teamsters local he used to lead—even though he was in Federal prison. Along with the racketeering charges, he also is serving a life sentence for murder. I ask unanimous consent that the article be inserted in the RECORD in its entirety.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TEAMSTERS LOCAL 560 PAID $28,143, IN 1981 TO JAILED EX-CHIEF

WASHINGTON.—Convicted labor racketeer Anthony "Tony Pro" Provenzano received a salary of $28,143 last year from a Teamsters local he used to lead—even though he was in a Lompoc, Calif., federal prison.

The payment, disclosed in a union document filed with the Labor Department, was uncovered by the Teamsters for a Democratic Union, a Detroit-based dissident group. The group's review of Teamsters affiliates' financial statements filed with the department also found that 53 Teamster officials each earned more than $100,000 in 1981. A similar review by the dissidents last year found 38 Teamsters officials had made that much in 1980.

Provenzano was convicted in 1979 on labor racketeering charges and sentenced to 20 years in prison. He also is serving a life sentence in the murder of Anthony "Three Fingers" Castellito, who headed Teamsters Local 560 in Union City, N.J., until 1961, when Provenzano took over and Mr. Castellito disappeared. Provenzano, a former international vice president of the Teamsters, had been an influential figure in the union for a long time.

Provenzano apparently has collected payments from his former local for several years. W. Hunt Dumont, the U.S. attorney in Newark, said Local 560 voted Provenzano a pension based on half the salary he was earning when he resigned to begin serving time for the murder conviction in 1978. The $28,143 is about half of what he was earning as the local's secretary-treasurer, Mr. Dumont estimated.

Whether it's a pension or a salary, "as far as we're concerned, it's illegal, either way," Mr. Dumont said. "We don't believe he should be entitled to any money after a certain time."

A woman who answered the phone at the local's Union City office at 3:30 p.m. yesterday said "the secretary-treasurer is gone for the day." Provenzano's daughter Josephine, the secretry-treasurer, took over the local leadership after he went to prison.

Mr. Dumont has been seeking to enjoin Provenzano, members of his family and several others from continuing their 20-year leadership of the local. A complaint, brought last March, marked the first effort by law enforcement officials to wrest total control of a labor union local from its elected leadership. Local 560 serves more than 10,000 members in the trucking industry.

Mr. Dumont said a federal judge in Newark refused to grant a preliminary injunction barring the defendants from further union control. But a final hearing will be held in mid-October, he added, on the merits of the complaint.

The Teamsters dissident group's report showed that Jackie Presser, a powerful international vice president from Cleveland, earned $353,737 last year from six Teamster jobs, topping the $256,521 paid Teamster President Roy Williams for five different posts.

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, this cannot be allowed to continue. When a person is barred from union office or from a position with an employee benefit plan, all rights associated with that office must be terminated as well. A "salary," for example, cannnot be labeled a "pension" in order to circumvent the clear intention of the law and to provide payments to convicted officials.

Again, I want to congratulate Senator NUNN and his colleagues on the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations for their efforts. I encourage the House of Representatives to take prompt action on this legislation.

Mr. President, I would like to compliment the Senator from Georgia for the outstanding work he has done on this particular piece of legislation and also for his assistance in helping us with the amendments to the Longshoremen's Act which we were able to pass through the Senate yesterday.

I would certainly agree with his comments that the combination of both bills has done a lot to clean up the abuse that has taken place in the longshore area as well as some of the labor racketeering abuses.

I had the opportunity of participating in the hearings that Senator NUNN held in the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations last year. They showed a lot of changes that needed to be made.

Both of these pieces of legislation are directed to those hearings and tend to eliminate a lot of the abuses that have been found.

The timing of this article, to which I referred, appearing in today's Wall Street Journal, I thought, was somewhat ironic, in that we have a former chief of a particular union local, Local 560, which has been in the headlines of late. The fact that he could be in prison, serving a sentence for murder as well as labor racketeering and still be receiving a "salary" of $28,000 a year despite the fact that he has been convicted underscores the necessity as well as the good timing of this legislation.

I am pleased to be a cosponsor and pleased to participate with Senator NUNN.

I also wish to compliment Senator KENNEDY and his staff and the other people we have worked with on this piece of legislation. This, as well as the longshoreman's bill we passed yesterday, go a long, long way. It is the result of a lot of hours, a lot of effort, a lot of redrafts. I think those participants have shown a lot of ability to compromise as well as a lot of persistence, evidenced by the fact that this has been passed by the Senate. I hope it will soon pass the House of Representatives.

Have we moved the adoption of the amendment, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Georgia has been agreed to. The committee amendment has not yet been agreed to.

Mr. NICKLES. I move the adoption of the committee amendment.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold that for a couple of brief remarks?

Mr. NICKLES. Certainly, Mr. President.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, each of our cosponsors has played a major role in this legislation. Some of our cosponsors were, indeed, members of the subcommittee and played a major role in the hearings themselves which led to this legislation. I particularly commend Senator RUDMAN of New Hampshire, who was not only a cosponsor of the bill but played a leading role in the hearings; Senator ROTH, who is chairman of the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, who cooperated completely in both the hearings and this legislation; Senator DECONCINI, who has been involved in this legislation from the very beginning; Senator STENNIS, Senator JOHNSTON, Senator PRYOR, Senator HOLLINGS, Senator HATCH, whom we have already talked about; Senator EAST, and Senator HARRY BYRD, JR.

Most of all, I want to thank Senator NICKLES. It is not easy to get this kind of legislation passed. He has taken a major lead in both this bill and the bill he guided with my support through the Senate yesterday afternoon. I commend him for his tremendous leadership in this very important area, that has been neglected too long.

Mr. President, I also pay tribute to the National Association of Stevedores, and Mr. Tom Wilcox, executive director of that association, who cooperated in our hearings. Several of their members came forward and testified. I am sure it was a very unpleasant experience for some of them, but they did cooperate. They told the hard, tough story of their own experiences on the waterfront.

I might add that, since those hearings, that association, under the leadership of Mr. Wilcox and others in the association, has taken a firm position in favor of this legislation, which carries criminal penalties, not just for labor leaders but also for people in management who are guilty of the type of violations enumerated.

I might also add that the National Association of Stevedores has taken a very fundamental and yet unprecedented step of adopting their own code of ethics. This is a major step forward in trying to bring the management side of the waterfront into compliance not only with the law but with the spirit of the law and with the spirit of our free enterprise system. So I want to commend Mr. Wilcox and his Association for their support.

In addition, I would like to thank my staff. I do not want to leave out any of them. I have already mentioned Eleanor Hill, our chief counsel; Marty Steinberg, who is her precedessor, now preacticing law in Miami, and who was chief counsel when we had these hearings; Greg Baldwin who has now left the subcommittee and has gone to the U.S. attorney's office in Miami; Mr. Fred Asselin, Mr. Jack Key, Mr. Glenn Fry, Ms. Kitty Dias, and Ms. Mary Robertson, who are on our subcommitte staff. Each of these people played a major role both in the hearings and in the legislation.

I also want to thank FBI agent Ray Maria, who had been assigned to our subcommittee during this set of hearings, who is now back with the FBI. He did a superb job in all of this investigation.

Again, Mr. Rick Lawson and the staff of Senator NICKLES have done a superb job as has Kevin McGuiness of Senator HATCH'S staff. We have had complete cooperation from both sides of the aisle on this legislation. Therefore I extend thanks to each of these people.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I rise today to urge my colleagues to join me in supporting S. 1785, the Labor Management Racketeering Act of 1982. This legislation is the result of extensive investigations by the permanent Subcommittee on Investigations of alleged corruption of the Nation's waterfronts. The administration has joined with the AFL-CIO in supporting this piece of legislation that would stiffen penalties for racketeering in organized labor management and fraud in handling union pension funds. This is the first time a major union and administration have jointly supported such a measure.

The critical need for a remedy to the problem cannot be questioned. The evidence presented during the course of the subcommittee's investigations was disturbing to those of us who are concerned with the continued survivial of our free enterprise system. Indeed, the severity of the violations uncovered, including extortion payoffs, kickbacks, obstruction of justice, and violations of the Taft-Hartley Act, is startling. The subcommittee's latest round of hearings on the problem heard from witnesses who testified that the large network of ports in the United States is controlled by organized crime. Payoffs are occurring with such regularity that they are considered a part of every day business expenses which, in turn, are passed onto the consumer. We heard of payoffs to insure the award of work contracts, to maintain contracts already awarded to insure labor peace, and to expand business opportunities to new ports. The list goes on and on.

I was especially disturbed by the evidence of criminal extortion and illegal payoffs in the south Florida area. The subcommittee conducted a thorough and alarming examination of waterfront corruption in that area, particularly at the Port of Miami. The practice of payoffs and illegal kickbacks appeared to be widespread and increasingly acceptable amongst waterfront businessmen and labor leaders.

Apparently, the recent growth of the Port of Miami into a major shipping center was accompanied by increasing efforts by organized crime to illegally manipulate waterfront businesses in that area.

Mr. President, the evidence uncovered by the permanent Subcommittee on Investigations vividly depicts the need for a legislative remedy to these problems. I believe that S. 1785 is just the vehicle required to stem corruption on the Nation's waterfronts and to adequately punish those involved in breaking the law. The bill would make violations of the Taft-Hartley Act of a thousand dollars or more a felony and punishable by up to 5 years imprisonment, and/or a fine of up to $15,000. Currently, such violations are only a misdemeanor subject to a fine of up to $10,000 and/or imprisonment of just 1 year.

The bill would also provide for the removal from labor unions and employee benefit plans the influence of persons convicted of criminal offenses. Union officials convicted of violations against Taft-Hartley would be suspended immediately. The ban against a convicted official holding a union office would be increased from 5 to 10 years. It has been an all too common practice for convicted officials to continue as trustees controlling the purse-strings of employee pension funds while their appeal drags through the judicial system for years. Ironically, they are in a position to continue the abuses they have been convicted of, which is often the case. I think it is crucial that we assure the millions and millions of persons who are depending on employee benefit plans for retirement that their funds will be wisely and legally invested, controlled and used by the individuals entrusted with the responsibility. And, we must assure the many workers of this country that the management of their unions are being directed by persons who have only the best interests of the worker in mind.

Finally, this legislation would make it clear that it is the responsibility of the Department of Labor to actively root out these abuses and to follow through on the referral of such cases to the Justice Department for prosecution. In the past, there has been a question as to whether or not it was the Department of Labor's authority to investigate alleged criminal violations. In most cases, this indecisiveness resulted in the criminal avoiding his day in court and, indeed, led some to believe that their activities could go on uninhibited.

Mr. President, in light of the volumes of evidence uncovered by the subcommittee, it is painfully obvious that corrupt practices on the waterfront have carried on for too long. I am happy to join with Senator NUNN in supporting what I believe to be a thorough and effective piece of legislation that would provide greater protection for unions and employee benefit plans from the corrupt practices of union and management officials. I urge my colleagues to join with me in supporting S. 1785, the Labor Management Racketeering Act of 1982.

Mr. NUNN. Mr President, I move the adoption of the committee amendment.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The committee amendment in the nature of a substitute was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

S. 1785

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be referred to as the "Labor Management Racketeering Act of 1982".

SEC. 2. (a) Subsection (d) of section 302 of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947 (29 U.S.C. 186) is amended to read as follows:

"(d)(1) Any person who participates in a transaction involving a payment, loan, or delivery of money or other thing of value to a labor organization in payment of membership dues or to a joint labor-management trust fund as defined by clause (B) of the proviso to clause (5) of subsection (c) of this section or to a plant, area, or industry-wide labor-management committee that is received and used by such labor organization, trust fund, or committee, which transaction does not satisfy all the applicable requirements of subsections (c)(4) through (c)(9) of this section, and willfully and with intent to benefit himself or to benefit other persons he knows are not permitted to receive a payment, loan, money, or other thing of value under subsections (c)(4) through (c)(9) violates this subsection, shall, upon conviction thereof, be guilty of a felony and be subject to a fine or not more than $15,000, or imprisoned for not more than five years, or both; but if the value of the amount of money or thing of value involved in any violation of the provisions of this section does not exceed $1,000, such person shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and be subject to a fine of not more than $10,000, or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both.

"(2) Except for violations involving transactions covered by subsection (d)(1) of this section, any person who willfully violates this section shall, upon conviction thereof, be guilty of a felony and be subject to a fine of not more than $15,000, or imprisoned for not more than five years, or both; but if the value of the amount of money or thing of value involved in any violation of the provisions of this section does not exceed $1,000, such person shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and be subject to a fine of not more than $10,000, or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both.".

(b) Subsection (e) of such section is amended to read as follows:

"(e) The district courts of the United States and the United States courts of the territories and possessions shall have jurisdiction, for cause shown, and subject to the provisions of Rule 65 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure (relating to notice to opposite party), over—

"(1) suits alleging a violation of this section brought by any person directly affected by the alleged violation, and

"(2) suits brought by the United States alleging that a transaction involving a payment, loan, or delivery of money or other thing of value to a labor organization in payment of membership dues or a joint labor-management trust fund as provided for in clause (B) of the proviso to clause (5) of subsection (c) of this section or to a plant, area, or industry-wide labor-management committee violates this section,

to restrain such violations without regard to the provisions of section 6 of the Clayton Act (15 U.S.C. 17), section 20 of such Act (29 U.S.C. 52), and sections 1 through 15 of the Act entitled "An Act to amend the Judicial Code to define and limit the jurisdiction of courts sitting in equity, and for other purposes", approved March 23, 1932 (29 U.S.C. 101-115).

SEC. 3. (a) So much of subsection (a) of section 411 of title 1 of the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 (29 U.S.C. 1111) as follows "the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959 (29 U.S.C. 401)," is amended to read as follows: "any felony involving abuse or misuse of such person's labor organization or employee benefit plan position or employment, or conspiracy to commit any such crimes or attempt to commit any such crimes, or a crime in which any of the foregoing crimes is an element, shall serve or be permitted to serve—

"(1) as an administrator, fiduciary, officer, trustee, custodian, counsel, agent, employee, or representative in any capacity of any employee benefit plan,

"(2) as a consultant or adviser to an employee benefit plan, including but not limited to any entity whose activities are in whole or substantial part devoted to providing goods or services to any employee benefit plan, or

"(3) in any capacity that involves decision-making authority or custody or control of the moneys, funds, assets, or property of any employee benefit plan, during or for the period of ten years after such conviction or after the end of such imprisonment, whichever is later, unless the sentencing court on the motion of the person convicted sets a lesser period of at least five years after such conviction or after the end of such imprisonment, whichever is later, and unless prior to the end of such period, in the case of a person so convicted or imprisoned (A) his citizenship rights, having been revoked as a result of such conviction, have been fully restored, or (B) the United States Parole Commission determines that such person's service in any capacity referred to in paragraphs (1) through (3) would not be contrary to the purposes of this title. Prior to making any such determination the Commission shall hold an administrative hearing and shall give notice to such proceeding by certified mail to the Secretary of Labor and to State, county, and Federal prosecution officials in the jurisdiction or jurisdictions in which such person was convicted. The Commission's determination in any such proceeding shall be final. No person shall knowingly hire, retain, employ, or otherwise place any other person to serve in any capacity in violation of this subsection. Notwithstanding the preceding provisions of this subsection, no corporation or partnership will be precluded from acting as an administrator, fiduciary, officer, trustee, custodian, counsel, agent, or employee of any employee benefit plan or as a consultant to any employee benefit plan without a notice, hearing, and determination by such Parole Commission that such service would be inconsistent with the intention of this section.".

(b) Subsection (b) of such section is amended to read as follows:

"(b) Any person who intentionally violates this section shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than five years, or both.".

(c) Subsection (c) of such section is amended to read as follows:

"(c) For the purpose of this section:

"(1) A person shall be deemed to have been 'convicted' and under the disability of 'conviction' from the date of the judgment of the trial court, regardless of whether that judgment remains under appeal.

"(2) The term 'consultant' means any person who, for compensation, advises, or represents an employee benefit plan or who provides other assistance to such plan, concerning the establishment or operation of such plan.

"(3) A period of parole shall not be considered as part of a period of imprisonment.".

(d) Such section is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(1) by operation of this section, has been barred from office or other position in an employee benefit plan as a result of a conviction, and

"(2) has filed an appeal of that conviction, any salary which would be otherwise due such person by virtue of such office or position, shall be placed in escrow by the individual or organization responsible for payment of such salary. Payment of such salary into escrow shall continue for the duration of the appeal or for the period of time during which such salary would be otherwise due, whichever period is shorter. Upon the final reversal of such person's conviction on appeal, the amounts in escrow shall be paid to such person. Upon the final sustaining of that person's conviction on appeal, the amounts in escrow shall be returned to the individual or organization responsible for payments of those amounts. Upon final reversal of such person's conviction, such person shall no longer be barred by this statute from assuming any position from which such person was previously barred.".

SEC. 4. (a) So much of subsection (a) of section 504 of the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959 (29 U.S.C. 504) as follows "or a violation of title II or III of this Act" is amended to read as follows: "any felony involving abuse or misuse of such person's labor organization or employee benefit plan position or employment, or conspiracy to commit any such crimes, shall serve or be permitted to serve—

"(1) as a consultant or adviser to any labor organization,

"(2) as an officer, director, trustee, member of any executive board or similar governing body, business agent, manager, organizer, employee, or representative in any capacity of any labor organization,

"(3) as a labor relations consultant or adviser to a person engaged in an industry or activity affecting commerce, or as an officer, director, agent, or employee of any group or association of employers dealing with any labor organization, or in a position having specific collective bargaining authority or direct responsibility in the area of labor-management relations in any corporation or association engaged in an industry or activity affecting commerce,

"(4) in a position which entitled its occupant to a share of the proceeds of, or as an officer or executive or administrative employee of, any entity whose activities are in whole or substantial part devoted to providing goods or services to any labor organization, or

"(5) in any capacity that involves decision-making authority concerning, or decision-making authority over, or custody of, or control of the moneys, funds, assets, or property of any labor organization, during or for the period of ten years after such conviction or after the end of such imprisonment, whichever is later, unless the sentencing court on the motion of the person convicted sets a lesser period of at least five years after such conviction or after the end of such imprisonment, whichever is later, and unless prior to the end of such period, in the case of a person so convicted or imprisoned, (A) his citizenship rights, having been revoked as a result of such conviction, have been fully restored, or (B) the United States Parole Commission determines that such person's service in any capacity referred to in clauses (1) through (5) would not be contrary to the purposes of this Act. Prior to making any such determination the Commission shall hold an administrative hearing and shall give notice of such proceeding by certified mail to the Secretary of Labor and to State, county, and Federal prosecuting officials in the jurisdiction or jurisdictions in which such person was convicted. The Commission's determination in any such proceeding shall be final. No person shall knowingly hire, retain, employ, or otherwise place any other person to serve in any capacity in violation of this subsection.".

(b) Subsection (b) of such section is amended to read as follows:

"(b) Any person who willfully violates this section shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than five years, or both.".

(c) Subsection (c) of such section is amended to read as follows:

"(c) For the purpose of this section:

"(1) A person shall be deemed to have been 'convicted' and under the disability of 'conviction' from the date of the judgment of the trial court, regardless of whether that judgment remains under appeal.

"(2) A period of parole shall not be considered as part of a period of imprisonment.".

(d) Such section 504 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(1) by operation of this section, has been barred from office or other position in a labor organization or employee benefit plan as a result of a conviction, and

"(2) has filed an appeal of that conviction, any salary which would be otherwise due such person by virtue of such office or position, shall be placed in escrow by the individual employer or organization responsible for payment of such salary. Payment of such salary into escrow shall continue for the duration of the appeal or for the period of time during which such salary would be otherwise due, whichever period is shorter. Upon the final reversal of such person's conviction on appeal, the amounts in escrow shall be paid to such person. Upon the final sustaining of such person's conviction on appeal, the amounts in escrow shall be returned to the individual employer or organization responsible for payments of those amounts. Upon final reversal of such person's conviction, such person shall no longer be barred by this statute from assuming any position from which such person was previously barred.".

SEC. 5. (a) The first paragraph of section 506 of title 1 of the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 (29 U.S.C. 1136) is amended by striking out "In order" and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(a) COORDINATION WITH OTHER AGENCIES AND DEPARTMENTS.—In order".

(b) Such section is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(b) RESPONSIBILITY FOR DETECTING AND INVESTIGATING CIVIL AND CRIMINAL VIOLATIONS OF EMPLOYEE RETIREMENT INCOME SECURITY ACT AND RELATED FEDERAL LAWS.—The Secretary shall have the responsibility and authority to detect and investigate and refer, where appropriate, civil and criminal violations related to the provisions of this title and other related Federal laws, including the detection, investigation, and appropriate referrals of related violations of title 18 of the United States Code. Nothing in this subsection shall be construed to preclude other appropriate Federal agencies from detecting and investigating civil and criminal violations of this title and other related Federal laws.".

(c) The title of such section is amended to read as follows:

"Coordination and responsibility of agencies enforcing Employee Retirement Income Security Act and related Federal laws".

SEC. 6. (a) The amendments made by section 3 and section 4 of this Act shall take effect with respect to any judgment of conviction entered by the trial court after the date of enactment of this Act, except that that portion of such amendments relating to the commencement of the period of disability shall apply to any judgment of conviction entered prior to the date of enactment of this Act if a right of appeal or an appeal from such judgment is pending on the date of enactment of this Act.

(b) Subject to subsection (a) the amendments made by sections 3 and 4 shall not affect any disability under section 411 of the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 or under section 504 of the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959 in effect on the date of enactment of this Act.

THE SOVIET PIPELINE AND THE FUTURE OF THE NATO ALLIANCE

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, in the past several weeks much has been said regarding President Reagan's tough embargo on U.S. technology for the Soviet Siberian pipeline. Many critics suggest that this issue will cause a breakdown of the NATO alliance. Unfortunately, their argument is unrealistically shortsighted.

The United States faces some crucial decisions in light of the European stance of accommodation toward the Soviet Union. The Reagan administration must continue its strong stand against economic subsidies for Russia. If not, the Europeans will be induced to behave in ways the administration, and this country, cannot tolerate.

I commend President Reagan for his strength and foresight in imposing the pipeline embargo. He has demonstrated his ability to maintain a long-range view of foreign policy. The new pipeline sanctions will begin to undo some of the damage done when officials at the State Department persuaded the administration not to declare Poland in default in its loans to Western banks. A declaration of Polish default still remains as the best option for sending a clear signal to the Soviet Union on the issue of East-West trade.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Wall Street Journal article entitled "The Siberian Pipeline and Europe's Welfare States" be included in the RECORD. This article accurately explains the importance of the Reagan actions and the shortcomings of the European position.

There being no objection, the article was ordered printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Wall Street Journal, July 19, 1982]

THE SIBERIAN PIPELINE AND EUROPE'S WELFARE STATES

(By Melvyn B. Krauss)

Several weeks of traveling throughout Western Europe during June convinced me of two apparently contradictory things. First, Europeans are very angry at President Reagan primarily because of the embargo on U.S. technology for the Siberian gas pipeline. Second, given the present European mood of accommodation toward the Soviet Union, a real break in the Western alliance could take place unless the Reagan administration continues to take a strong stand vis a vis its detentenik allies.

Accommodating our allies so they, in turn, can accommodate the Russians will not solidify the alliance—the common wisdom and that of former Secretary of State Haig notwithstanding. Rather, it will induce the Europeans to behave in ways that the administration can only be expected to find intolerable.

A case of Europe receiving the wrong signals was when Secretary Haig persuaded the administration not to declare Poland in default on its loans to Western banks. The Europeans—particularly the West Germans—lobbied hard for the U.S. to turn the other cheek and go soft on the Poles. Our allies got the accommodationist message: Western Europe could freely follow its own policies of pursuing detente and paying tribute to the Soviet Union with little regard for the opinions of a United States whose power could be neutralized by appeals to Western unity. The result, it should be noted, has not been the strengthening of the alliance predicted by the accommodationsists at the State Department, but a deterioration, as an emboldened Europe now offers the Soviet Union subsidized credit to construct the controversial pipeline.

The prime reason the accommodationist approach succeeds in producing only the semblance of Western unity is that it fails to come to terms with the root cause of tensions in the alliance: differences in economic outlook and perception due to different economic systems. The U.S. has the tradition of a competitive market economy, modified to some extent by government regulation. The Europeans, on the other hand, believe in state-directed economies, modified to some extent by the need to compete on world markets. The results are a deeper understanding for the Soviet Union perspective in Western Europe as well as dramatically different views on trade with the Eastern bloc.

The European perception is that the Reagan administration wants to conduct economic warfare with the Soviet Union. This isn't true. There is no evidence that the administration is against trade per se, with the Soviets, only subsidized trade. Mr. Reagan does not deserve to be called a "cold warrior" just because he wants to use the pipeline embargo to cool European ardor for subsidization of the Russians (particularly after Poland and Afghanistan).

The Europeans, however, do not appreciate the distinction between subsidized and unsubsidized trade, since subsidies are a pervasive way of doing business in the European welfare state. Extra-market subsidies are routinely given to European projects that can't pass the test of the marketplace, but which government wants to pursue either to hide unemployment (by putting workers in useless jobs), transfer income to a favored sector of the economy, pursue detente or, as in the case of the gas pipeline, for all three reasons. To promote this triad of objectives, the Soviets have been given credit terms similar to those that would be given to a Third World country.

The welfare state is not only creating mischief in the Western alliance as regards trade policies towards the Eastern bloc, it is also creating trade problems between the allies. The Europeans cannot expect to continue to subsidize a wide variety of goods without provoking protectionist responses in other parts of the world economy. For years, European subsidies to the steel industry have given protectionists in the U.S. steel industry an argument for similar subsidization in this country. Previous administrations generally have been strong enough to resist such protectionist entreaties; they understood that subsidies weaken an industry (as the European case amply demonstrates). The Reagan administration has now shown such resolve and has given in to U.S. steel industry demands for countervailing duties (a euphemism for tariffs). It is quite clear that welfare-state policies on both sides of the Atlantic are causing the present conflict over subsidies to the steel industry.

It would also be wrong to think that welfare state subsidization policies cause conflict exclusively between the U.S. and Europe: they also cause difficulties between the Europeans. The widespread nationalizations and subsidies given by the Mitterrand government to French industry, for instance, can be expected to become a divisive element in the Common Market.

Count Lambsdorff, the West German economics minister, already has made it clear that West Germany cannot be expected to sit by and watch its key industries systematically undercut by French subsidies. Undoubtedly, other countries in the European Community feel the same way. Only a French franc that is deliberately overvalued within the European monetary system has so far kept a subsidy war from breaking out inside Europe.

The Russians must be gloating to themselves. With the welfare state to destroy the Western alliance and send them subsidized grain, butter, pipelines and the like without any serious pressure to reduce their foreign adventures or military buildup, who needs spies and agents provocateurs? They've got a point.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session, the Acting President pro tempore laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PROPOSED RESCISSION OF CERTAIN BUDGET AUTHORITY—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—PM 159

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, together with accompanying papers; which, pursuant to the order of January 30, 1975, was referred jointly to the Committee on Appropriations, the Committee on the Budget, and the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources:

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with the Impoundment Control Act of 1974, I herewith report one new proposal to rescind a total of $83.5 million in budget authority previously provided to the Congress. The rescission affects the fossil energy construction program in the Department of Energy.

The details of the rescission proposal are contained in the attached report.

RONALD REAGAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, July 28, 1982.

(The above nominations were reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations with the recommendation that they be confirmed, subject to the nominees' commitment to respond to requests to appear and testify before any duly constituted committee of the Senate.)

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, for the Committee on Foreign Relations, I also report favorably a nomination list in the Senior Foreign Service which was printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 12, 1982, and, to save the expense of reprinting them on the Executive Calendar, I ask unanimous consent that they may lie on the Secretary's desk for the information of Senators.

STAR PRINT OF S. 2550

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, today I am seeking to modify my bill, S. 2550, the effect of which is to repeal several changes in the unemployment compensation program contained in last year's Reconciliation Budget Act and will extend benefits from 39 to 52 weeks.

Mr. President, it is my view that in a growing economy, with an upsurge in employment, the provisions and changes made last year would have provided a measure of financial responsibility to our beleagured unemployment compensation trust funds. However, in the context of the extraordinary and prolonged current recession, these changes in the unemployment compensation program have led to inequities in many of our States.

Under current law, up to 13 additional weeks of extended unemployment compensation, beyond the usual 26 weeks of regular State benefits, are payable to unemployed individuals who exhaust their State benefits during periods of high unemployment.

Prior to enactment of the Omnibus Reconciliation Budget Act of 1981, extended benefits were payable in any State in which the insured unemployment rate (IUR) was at least 4 percent, and, in addition, was at least 20 percent higher than the average of the same period in 2 previous years.

The Reconciliation Act changed this system in two important ways. First, effective in late September, 1982, it increased the IUR "trigger" level from 4 to 5 percent, before workers can qualify for extended benefits in that State. Second, the act redefined the way in which the IUR is calculated by excluding all unemployed workers receiving extended benefits. If my original legislation, S. 2550, were enacted in its present form to provide a program of 13 additional weeks, unemployed individuals on this program would not be counted under current law either.

In order to correct the injustice caused by these changes in last year's reconciliation bill I am modifying my bill, S. 2550. The new version of my bill, which I submit today, will address the two inequitable changes contained in the Omnibus Reconciliation Act of 1981.

First, the change in the IUR rate scheduled for late September of this year would not go into effect. Current law would be retained. Second, all unemployed individuals receiving unemployment compensation, whether it be under the regular State program, the extended benefits program, or a supplemental benefits program contained in my legislation, would be counted in calculating the IUR rate for any State.

Mr. President, I believe these changes are necessary and justified. Just last week, Indiana, with an unemployment rate of 11.5 percent, came off the extended benefits program. Michigan, with an unemployment rate of 15.1 percent, has also come off the extended benefits program. Neither can be a just or justifiable result. The modification I submit today will address and redress these serious defects which provide such a devastating result.

I urge my colleagues to carefully consider my legislation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of my revised bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the revised text was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2550

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Federal Supplemental Unemployment Compensation Act of 1982".

FEDERAL-STATE AGREEMENTS

SEC. 2. (a) Any State which desires to do so may enter into and participate in an agreement with the Secretary of Labor (hereinafter in this Act referred to as the "Secretary") under this Act. Any State which is a party to an agreement under this Act may, upon providing thirty days' written notice to the Secretary, terminate such agreement.

(b) Any such agreement shall provide that the State agency of the State will make payments of Federal supplemental compensation—

(1) to individuals who—

(A)(i) have exhausted all rights to regular compensation under the State law;

(ii) have exhausted all rights to extended compensation under the State law;

(B) have no rights to compensation (including both regular compensation and extended compensation) with respect to a week under such law or any other State unemployment compensation law or to compensation under any other Federal law; and

(C) are not receiving compensation with respect to such week under the unemployment compensation law of Canada;

(2) for any week of unemployment which begins in—

(A) an extended benefit period; and

(B) the individual's period of eligibility, except that no payment of Federal supplemental compensation shall be made to any individual for any week of unemployment which begins more than two years after the end of the benefit year for which he exhausted his rights to regular compensation.

(c)(1) For purposes of subsection (b)(1)(A)(i), an individual shall be deemed to have exhausted his rights to regular compensation under a State law when—

(A) no payments of regular compensation can be made under such law because such individual has received all regular compensation available to him based on employment or wages during his base period; or

(B) his rights to such compensation have been terminated by reason of the expiration of the benefit year with respect to which such rights existed.

(2) For purposes of subsection (B)(1)(A)(ii), an individual shall be deemed to have exhausted his rights to extended compensation under a State law when no payments of extended compensation under a State law can be made under such law because such individual has received all the extended compensation available to him from his extended compensation account (as established under State law in accordance with section 202(b)(1) of the Federal-State Extended Unemployment Compensation Act of 1970).

(d) For purposes of any agreement under this Act—

(1) the amount of the Federal supplemental compensation which shall be payable to any individual for any week of total unemployment shall be equal to the amount of the regular compensation (including dependents' allowances) payable to him for such a week during his benefit year under the State law; and

(2) the terms and conditions of the State law which apply to claims for extended compensation and to the payment thereof shall apply to claims for Federal supplemental compensation and the payment thereof, except where inconsistent with the provisions of this Act or with the regulations of the Secretary promulgated to carry out this Act.

(e)(1) Any agreement under this Act with a State shall provide that the State will establish, for each eligible individual who files an application for Federal supplemental compensation, a Federal supplemental compensation account with respect to such individual's benefit year.

(2) The amount established in such account for any individual shall be equal to the lesser of—

(A) 50 per centum of the total amount of regular compensation (including dependents' allowances) payable to him with respect to the benefit year (as determined under the State law) on the basis of which he most recently received regular compensation; or

(B) Thirteen times his average weekly benefit amount (as determined for purposes of section 202(b)(1)(C) of the Federal-State Extended Unemployment Compensation Act of 1970) for his benefit year.

(f)(1) No Federal supplemental compensation shall be payable to any individual under an agreement entered into under this Act for any week beginning before whichever of the following is the latest:

(A) the week following the week in which such agreement is entered into; or

(B) the first week which begins after the date of the enactment of this Act.

(2) No Federal supplemental compensation shall be payable to any individual under an agreement entered into under this Act for any week beginning after September 30, 1983.

PAYMENTS TO STATES HAVING AGREEMENTS FOR THE PAYMENT OF FEDERAL SUPPLEMENTAL COMPENSATION

SEC. 3. (a) There shall be paid to each State which has entered into an agreement under this Act an amount equal to 100 per centum of the Federal supplemental compensation paid to individuals by the State pursuant to such agreement.

(b) No payment shall be made to any State under this section in respect of compensation to the extent the State is entitled to reimbursement in respect of such compensation under the provisions of any Federal law other than this Act.

(c) Sums payable to any State by reason of such State's having an agreement under this Act shall be payable, either in advance or by way of reimbursement (as may be determined by the Secretary), in such amounts as the Secretary estimates the State will be entitled to receive under this Act for each calendar month, reduced or increased, as the case may be, by any amount by which the Secretary finds that his estimates for any prior calendar month were greater or less than the amounts which should have been paid to the State. Such estimates may be made on the basis of such statistical sampling, or other method as may be agreed upon by the Secretary and the State agency of the State involved.

FINANCING PROVISIONS

SEC. 4. (a) The Secretary shall from time to time certify to the Secretary of the Treasury for payment to each State the sums payable to such State under this Act. The Secretary of the Treasury, prior to audit or settlement by the General Accounting Office, shall make payments to the State in accordance with such certification, by transfers from the funds appropriated pursuant to subsection (b) to the account of such State in the Unemployment Trust Fund.

(b) There are hereby authorized to be appropriated from the general fund of the Treasury, without fiscal year limitation, such sums as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 5. For purposes of this Act—

(1) the terms "compensation", "regular compensation", "extended compensation", "base period", "benefit year", "State", "State agency", "State law", and "week" shall have the meaning assigned to them under section 205 of the Federal-State Extended Unemployment Compensation Act of 1970;

(2) the term "period of eligibility" means, in the case of any individual, the weeks in his benefit year which begin in an extended benefit period and, if his benefit year ends within such extended benefit period, any weeks thereafter which begin in such extended benefit period; except that an individual shall not have a period of eligibility unless—

(A) his benefit year ends on or after January 1, 1982; or

(B) such individual was entitled to extended compensation for a week which begins on or after January 1, 1982; and

(3) the term "extended benefit period" shall have the meaning assigned to such term under section 203 of the Federal-State Extended Unemployment Compensation Act of 1970.

FRAUD AND OVERPAYMENTS

SEC. 6. (a)(1) If an individual knowingly has made, or caused to be made by another, a false statement or representation of a material fact, or knowingly has failed, or caused another to fail, to disclose a material fact, and as a result of such false statement or representation or of such nondisclosure such individual has received an amount of Federal supplemental compensation under this Act to which he was not entitled, such individual—

(A) shall be ineligible for further Federal supplemental compensation under this Act in accordance with the provisions of the applicable State unemployment compensation law relating to fraud in connection with a claim for unemployment compensation; and

(B) shall be subject to prosecution under section 1001 of title 18, United States Code.

(2)(A) In the case of individuals who have received amounts of Federal supplemental compensation under this Act to which they were not entitled, the State is authorized to require such individuals to repay the amounts of such Federal supplemental compensation to the State agency, except that the State agency may waive such repayment if it determines that—

(i) the payment of such Federal supplemental compensation was without fault on the part of any such individual, and

(ii) such repayment would be contrary to equity and good conscience.

(B) The State agency may recover the amount to be repaid, or any part thereof, by deductions from any Federal supplemental compensation payable to such individual under this Act or from any unemployment compensation payable to such individual under any Federal unemployment compensation law administered by the State agency or under any other Federal law administered by the State agency which provides for the payment of any assistance or allowance with respect to any week of unemployment, during the three-year period after the date such individuals received the payment of the Federal supplemental compensation to which they were not entitled, except that no single deduction may exceed 50 per centum of the weekly benefit amount from which such deduction is made.

(C) No repayment shall be required, and no deduction shall be made, until a determination has been made, notice thereof and an opportunity for a fair hearing has been given to the individual, and the determination has become final.

(3) Any determination by a State agency under paragraph (1) or (2) shall be subject to review in the same manner and to the same extent as determinations under the State unemployment compensation law, and only in that manner and to that extent.

SEC. 7. (a)(1) Section 203(d) of the Federal-State Extended Unemployment Compensation Act of 1970 (as amended by Section 2403 of the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1981) is amended—

(A) in paragraph (1)(B) by striking out "5" and inserting in lieu thereof "4"; and

(B) in the matter following paragraph (2), by striking out "the figure '5' contained in subparagraph (B) thereof were '6'" and inserting in lieu thereof "the figure '4' contained in subparagraph (B) thereof were '5'".

(2) The amendments made by paragraph (1) shall become effective on the date of the enactment of this Act, and shall apply to weeks beginning on or after such date.

(b)(1) Section 203(e)(1)(A) of the Federal-State Extended Unemployment Compensation Act of 1970 (as amended by Section 2402 of the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1981) is amended by striking out "individuals filing claims for regular compensation" and inserting in lieu thereof "individuals filing claims for compensation (including regular, extended, supplemental, and sharable regular compensation)".

(2) The amendment made by paragraph (1) shall apply for purposes of determining whether there are State "on" or "off" indicators for weeks beginning after August 13, 1981. For purposes of making such determinations for such weeks, such amendment shall be deemed to be in effect for all weeks, whether beginning before, on, or after August 13, 1981.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

The following bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first and second time by unanimous consent, and referred as indicated:

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. ARMSTRONG:

S. 2783. A bill to designate certain public lands in the States of Colorado and Utah as wilderness, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

COLORADO WILDERNESS ACT OF 1982

● Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I am today introducing the Colorado Wilderness Act of 1982. This legislation is a major contribution to the completion of the national wilderness preservation system in the State of Colorado. This bill is the logical first step in several that I intend to take in working toward the final wilderness decisions for Colorado.

The citizens of Colorado have always valued, respected, and utilized the natural resources of our great State. The public lands have, and will continue to play, a major role in the development of Colorado. A part of that development is the recognition of the place and value of wilderness. This recognition started more than 50 years ago with the designation of the Mount Zirkel-Dome Peak Primitive Area in the Routt National Forest on October 15, 1931. By 1939, 11 primitive areas had been established within Colorado's National Forests for the purpose of preserving wilderness qualities.

With the passage of the 1964 Wilderness Act the present day wilderness system was firmly established with the designation of nearly 275,000 acres in five new wildernesses in Colorado. All of these wildernesses were within the national forests. In the 10 years following the passage of the Wilderness Act studies were completed on many primitive areas in national forests and roadless areas within the units of the national park system. In the period of 1975 to 1978, eight new wildernesses including three National Park Service areas were added to the wilderness system bringing the total to more than 1 million acres. In 1980, Public Law 96-560 more than doubled the wilderness system in the State. This important piece of legislation made a significant step in resolving the Forest Service RARE II process in Colorado. Fourteen new wildernesses were created and several additions were made to existing wildernesses. In addition, this legislation addressed a number of valid nonwilderness concerns including access, grazing, fire and insect control, buffer zones, as well as release of lands unsuitable for wilderness.

The RARE II legislation clarified grazing guidelines to eliminate grazing use questions that have plagued ranchers for years. The problem of access to privately owned inholdings within wilderness areas was addressed, as well as access to designated areas for wilderness study. Language was included in the bill calling for a reassessment of Forest Service theories, policies, and practices for controlling fire, disease, and insect outbreaks in wilderness areas. The buffer zone questions were also addressed to provide the Forest Service and users of nonwilderness a reasonable degree of certainty and predictability as to land management policies.

The legislation also provided important release language to enable the nonwilderness uses of lands to proceed under the general land-use and environmental laws. This aspect of the legislation removed a cloud from the option to develop valuable energy, timber, minerals, rangeland, national security, recreation, and employment potential.

Finally, the RARE II legislation designated certain potential areas for review and study to determine its potential for future wilderness designation.

At the present time the Colorado portion of the national wilderness preservation system consists of 28 units, 4 of which are in the national park system and 24 in the national forest system with a total of more than 2.6 million acres.

With the passage of Public Law 96-560 in 1980, Colorado moved into a leadership role in the completion of the national wilderness preservation system. Beyond making important additions to the wilderness system, this act clearly identified those national forest areas which remain to be studied for further inclusion in the system.

In 1976, the Federal Land Policy and Management Act extended the application of the wilderness system to those public lands administered by the Bureau of Land Management. The Bureau was directed to inventory and determine those roadless areas which should become wilderness study areas. In 1981, the BLM completed the wilderness inventory and identified 58 wilderness study areas in addition to the 5 instant study areas that had been previously designated. Today there are several studies in various stages of completion addressing the 63 areas with more than 788,000 acres of BLM wilderness study lands.

In the early 1970's the Secretary of the Interior completed wilderness studies on the national park system lands within the State of Colorado as directed by the 1964 Wilderness Act. Many of these studies have not been acted on and they have been periodically updated as changes occurred within the national park system. The studies on file currently represent an up-to-date inventory of potential national park wilderness additions.

The combination of the remaining Forest Service study areas, the identified BLM study areas and the national park wilderness recommendations represent 90 individual units of wilderness study lands involving nearly 2 million acres still in need of decisions regarding possible addition to the wilderness system.

As we look forward to the 20th anniversary of the passage of the Wilderness Act in 1984 it is important that we proceed with a carefully thought out series of steps to conclude the establishment of the wilderness preservation system in Colorado. Now that we have clearly identified those lands that are still in consideration for addition to the system we have an obligation to make the remaining decisions promptly. Early designation of additional units of the wilderness system will allow for improved management plans to be developed and those actions important to the management of the wilderness system to be initiated. By the same token, early decisions to release for other types of management those lands not added to the wilderness system will allow the agencies to develop comprehensive management plans covering those other uses. The users of the public land resources, wilderness and nonwilderness alike, deserve to have these decisions made as early as possible. By initiating this legislation and by identifying the logical steps that will lead us to other wilderness decisions, I am starting a process to conclude the establishment of Colorado's portion of the national wilderness preservation system.

The legislation I am introducing today will make a significant contribution to the wilderness system by establishing seven new wildernesses within three national park units and by making a major national park addition to one existing wilderness. This bill also makes an addition to the Hunter-Fryingpan Wilderness in the White River National Forest and in doing so concludes a wilderness study reported by Public Law 95-237 in 1978.

At this point I would like to briefly describe the areas which will be added to the wilderness system by the Colorado Wilderness Act of 1982 and to ask that the section-by-section analysis of the bill be printed at the conclusion of my remarks.

Within Rocky Mountain Park there would be four separate units. The Mummy Range wilderness is in the northern portion of the park. This unit contains approximately 81,320 acres and is adjacent to the Commanche Peak Wilderness in the Roosevelt National Forest. The Never Summer unit contains approximately 9,620 acres and lies adjacent to and becomes part of the Never Summer wilderness in the Arapaho National Forest. This legislation provides for the continued management by the Forest Service and the park service of their respective portions of the enlarged wilderness. The Trail Ridge wilderness proposal contains 4,300 acres and is located in the center portion of the park between the Fall River Road and the Trail Ridge Road. The Enos Mills wilderness proposal is in the southern portion of the park and contains approximately 140,428 acres. This bill provides for adding approximately 2,917 acres of the Indian Peak wilderness within Rocky Mountain National Park to the Enos Mills unit.

In Colorado National Monument, the Monument Mesa wilderness proposal contains 10,237 acres and is located in that portion of the park north of the Rim Rock Drive Road. The No Thoroughfare Canyon Wilderness proposal contains 4,542 acres and is located in the southern portion of the park south of the Rim Rock Drive Road.

In Dinosaur National Monument which is located in both Utah and Colorado the Green-Yampa wilderness proposal contains approximately 180,205 acres and is located in the northern portion of the park. The Blue Mountain wilderness proposal is located in the southern portion of the park and contains approximately 25,693 acres.

All of the foregoing National Park Service proposals are the result of Park Service wilderness studies. The size and boundaries of each of these proposed wildernesses is the same as proposed in the Park Service studies. These proposals have been pending before Congress for many years and it is timely that we now make these important additions to the wilderness system. With these additions six national parks and monuments in Colorado will contain portions of the wilderness system with a total of more than a half million acres.

When Congress created the Hunter-Fryingpan Wilderness as a part of Public Law 95-237 in 1978 the Secretary of Agriculture was directed to study the 8,000 acre Spruce Creek addition for possible inclusion in the wilderness. This study has been completed and this bill will add the 8,000 acres to the existing wilderness. This is one more step in concluding the necessary decisions for the wilderness system in Colorado.

This legislation will complete the establishment of the National Park Service portion of the wilderness system in Colorado. It also helps set the stage for future legislation to similarly conclude the Forest Service and Bureau of Land Management contributions to the wilderness system. By the end of 1983 the Forest Service should have completed studies on all of their remaining wilderness study areas. Well over half of the BLM study areas are scheduled to be completed within the same time period. The remainder of the BLM areas will be studied from 1984 to 1986. I intend to periodically introduce legislation to deal with wilderness recommendations as quickly as possible after study results are available. I will urge both agencies to conclude studies as promptly as possible. In many cases there are contiguous and intermingled Forest Service and BLM lands which should properly be dealt with in the same piece of legislation. I will be looking for opportunities to make logical groupings of study areas and to coordinate these groupings.

One area I am particularly interested in and am studying with special interest is the Sangre De Cristo in south-central Colorado. This range contains the largest remaining national forest wilderness study area in Colorado. It is approximately 220,000 acres. There are also several small BLM study areas adjacent to the Forest Service unit. As draft study reports are published and wilderness hearings are held later this year, I will be monitoring the process with an eye toward introducing appropriate wilderness legislation early next year. The people of south-central Colorado have been concerned for some time over the future management of this spectacular mountain range. It is my interest that we carefully review the study results, listen to those Colorado citizens who are vitally interested in the future management of this land and then promptly set about enacting the appropriate legislation.

I am also interested in resolving the wilderness questions in a large area of intermingled lands in the upper Gunnison and Animas River drainages near the communities of Lake City and Silverton. This large area contains 12 BLM and 2 Forest Service study areas. Many of these study areas are adjacent to each other or to existing wildernesses. There is a good opportunity to draw together study results from at least two BLM studies and two national forest land management plans for purposes of forging reasonable and logical wilderness legislation. In conjunction with settling the wilderness issue in this area it is appropriate to consider proposed land exchanges between the Forest Service and the BLM to provide for more efficient long-term public land administration. I will be dealing with this legislation promptly in an effort to set the stage for the wilderness legislation which I plan to introduce next year.

I should like to commend the Forest Service, the Park Service and the Bureau of Land Management for their efforts to date in proceeding in a timely fashion with the wilderness studies. I ask them to continue a diligent program to bring the studies to an early completion.

The Nation is moving through an extraordinarily important era of decision in which we will balance the need for energy development against the need to preserve priceless natural and scenic values that still exist.

It is appropriate that Colorado should lead the Nation in this critical process. Colorado has some of the richest energy and mineral deposits in the Nation along with irreplaceable primitive areas encompassing our most beautiful and unspoiled natural areas.

The Colorado Wilderness Act of 1982 is an important step, but it is only a step in our exercise of the responsibility of stewardship. The quality of stewardship is in many ways the greatest test of the character of an individual or a generation of people.

We intend, in Colorado, to meet this test in a fair and equitable manner and with a long-term view of the future. This Wilderness Act affects only Colorado but is of national significance and concerns every citizen of the United States. I urge the Congress to adopt this measure so that we can then turn our attention to the next phase of wilderness development in Colorado.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a section-by-section analysis of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the analysis was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COLORADO WILDERNESS ACT OF 1982: SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

SECTION 1

Enacting statement and title.

SECTION 2

This section provides specific legislation to create seven new wildernesses within the National Park system and to create a National wilderness addition to an existing wilderness on adjacent National Forest land. All of the areas included in this section have been recommended for wilderness designation through the National Park Service wilderness study process. All of the areas were included in the 1981 Administration's report to Congress as proposed and recommended wilderness areas. The new wildernesses are Mummy Range, Trail Ridge and Enos Mills, all in Rocky Mountain National Park; Monument Mesa and No Thoroughfare Canyon in Colorado National Monument; Green-Yampa and Blue Mountain in Dinosaur National Monument. A portion of Rocky Mountain National Park is designated as a wilderness addition to the existing Never Summer Wilderness in the adjacent Arapaho National Forest. The areas are described as follows:

Mummy Range-Rocky Mountain National Park

An area of 81,320 Acres encompassing the Mummy Range and Specimen Mountain. It contains large areas of the alpine, subalpine forest, wet meadow and montane forest ecosystems.

The wilderness boundary generally follows the north and east park boundary from La Poudre Pass to the Estes Park area. It then follows natural and topographic features westward along the Fall River Road and Trail Ridge Road passing the Timber Creek Campground and then going west along the park boundary to the Grand River Ditch which it follows to La Poudre Pass.

Excluded from this wilderness unit are the following: A 300-foot wide buffer area south of the high water elevation of Long Draw Reservoir; Mirror Lake where there are private water rights; Colorado State University property along the South Fork Cache La Poudre River; private property along Cow Creek; City of Estes Park Water Treatment Plant and access in Black Canyon, a 200-foot set back from the edge of the Grand River Ditch road; a 200-foot set back from the center of the Grand River Ditch; and an area around Specimen Ditch; and a corridor from the Fall River Road to Lawn Lake.

Potential wilderness additions total 75 acres which are: Mirror Lake water rights—25 acres; and Colorado State University property—50 acres.

Never Summer—Rocky Mountain National Park

This unit includes 9,620 acres of the steep upper slopes and peaks of the eastern side of the Never Summer Mountains. About ⅔ of the area is above timberline, capped by a row of 12 peaks reaching over 12,000 feet in altitude.

The wilderness boundary follows the park boundary along the north and west side of the unit. On the east and south the proposed wilderness boundary is along the Grand River Ditch. On the west this unit is adjacent to the existing Never Summer Wilderness on the Arapaho National Forest.

Excluded from this wilderness unit is a 200-foot set back from the center of the Grand River Ditch.

Trail Ridge—Rocky Mountain National Park

This unit which totals 4,300 acres is the forested mountainside sloping northward to Fall River, between the Trail Ridge and Fall River roads. It contains much studied examples of sub-alpine forest and alpine tundra. Lodgepole pine, Englemann spruce and subalpine fir are dominant in the forest cover. Although the area is visible from various points along the two roads, the wilderness traveler within it finds himself quite isolated.

The wilderness boundary is delineated by natural features, including Fall River on the north, and slopes adjacent to Trail Ridge Road on the south. A corridor containing the 10-foot-wide paved trail to Toll Memorial, the Hidden Valley Ski Area, and the Fall River Pass Information-Store complex are not included in the proposed wilderness.

Enos Mills—Rocky Mountain National Park

This proposed wilderness area contains examples of all the ecosystems present in Rocky Mountain National Park, including a spectacular array of rugged peaks, snow fields and glacial cirques. In this 140,428 acre wilderness are both the most popular backcountry destinations and some of the park's least visited valleys. The high peaks are visible from Fort Collins, the Denver urban strip, and many points to the east

The proposed wilderness starts east of Many Parks Curve near Trail Ridge Road, goes southeast along the drainage to Beaver Meadows and follows topographic features in a wandering fashion excluding a dirt road, pipeline and filtration plant in Beaver Meadows, a road terminus, an existing maintenance yard in Hallowell Park and the Bear Lake-Nymph Lake developed area. From there it goes generally east excluding the Bear Lake Road corridor to the park's east boundary which it follows southward except for a 160 acre parcel west of Lily Lake, a 40 acre parcel north of Inn Brook and the Longs Peak Campground area to the Wild Basin area. It then goes westward excluding Sandbeach, Bluebird and Pear Reservoirs. From Pear Reservoir it goes northeasterly excluding the Allens Park Trail to the southeast corner of the park near Allens Park. Then it follows the southern and western park boundary to the Grand Lake Area.

After excluding inholdings, water inlets and structures around the Grand Lake entrance area, it follows topographic features north to Beaver Creek, roughly paralleling the existing highway. The wilderness line then turns northeast to exclude road realignment and communications lines, then roughly follows the Trail Ridge Road on topographic features and excluding the Hidden Valley Ski Area, to the Many Parks Curve area.

The Eureka Ditch is excluded from the wilderness in a corridor 20 feet wide.

The 9 acres of the Redwood Fisher property near the south end of Shadow Mountain lake and the 5 acres of the Lynch life estate near Deer Mountain make up the 14 acres of potential wilderness additions in this unit.

Monument Mesa—Colorado National Monument

The Monument Mesa unit which contains 10,237 acres generally includes all of the roadless lands north and east of the Rim Rock Drive. This area includes an unusual and extremely interesting series of box canyons which erosion has carved out of the Uncompahgre Highland. The Highland forms one rim of the Grand Valley of the Colorado River. Scattered minor archaeological sites where primitive man visited and hunted are evident.

Visitors to this deep canyon area experience solitude and isolation from man's activities. Hikers and horseback riders reach the area on existing primitive trails which are the only developments existing in the proposed wilderness area.

The boundaries of the area generally follow the National Park boundary on the east side and the mesa rim on the south, west and north sides. Appropriate set backs are excluded for purposes of management.

No Thoroughfare Canyon—Colorado National Monument

This area lying in the southern portion of Colorado National Monument contains 4,542 acres. The area includes the typical erosion patterns and geologic formations. The pinyon/juniper woodland which is interspersed with shrubby plants such as sagebrush, serviceberry and mountain mahogany is common.

The boundaries are generally the National Park boundary on the east, south and far west and the Glade Park and Rim Rock Drive roads on the north and northwest.

Green-Yampa—Dinosaur National Monument

This is the largest of the proposed wilderness units and contains 180,205 acres. This area contains the spectacular canyons of the Green River and its main tributary the Yampa. These river canyons contain outstanding displays of geology. There is a high degree of ruggedness and remoteness which creates a true challenge to the visitor. The high plateaus along the canyon rims offer spectacular views of the canyons and the rivers.

This is a semi-arid environment in which the canyons provide for many different plant and animal communities. Unexpected examples of Ponderosa pine and Douglas fir are found in the protected box canyons and unusual animals such as mountain lion and big horn sheep continue to exist in this remote area.

This unit includes 44 miles of the Green River and 48 miles of the Yampa River. Its boundaries generally follow the Monument boundaries on the east, north and west and the Yampa Bench Road on the south. The developed areas near the quarry and the visitor facilities accessible by road are excluded. There are 2,473 acres of potential wilderness additions. These lands generally consist of road corridors and lands which are not under control of the Park Service at the present time.

Blue Mountain—Dinosaur National Monument

The Blue Mountain unit lies south of the Yampa Bench Road and contains 25,693 acres. The Blue Mountain Plateau is 2,000 feet above the Yampa Bench and offers spectacular views of the canyons and rivers of the Monument.

The boundaries of this unit are generally the Monument boundary on the south and west and the Echo Park and Yampa Bench Roads on the north and east. This unit also contains 883 acres of potential wilderness additions when the conditions for wilderness suitability are met.

SECTION 3

In 1980 Public Law 96-560 transferred a small portion of the Indian Peak Wilderness from the Forest Service to Rocky Mountain National Park. With the creation of the adjacent Enos Mills Wilderness it is appropriate that this small portion of the Indian Peak Wilderness be added to it. This section does that.

SECTION 4

This section provides that the Forest Service and the Park Service will continue to manage their respective portions of the Never Summer Wilderness. However, it also provides that they may coordinate and cooperate in the management of this wilderness.

SECTION 5

This section provides that this Act shall not influence or affect water rights or uses in any rivers that flow through the new wildernesses. The intent is that this Act is neutral as to water rights.

SECTION 6

The Endangered American Wilderness Act of 1978, Public Law 95-237, required that a study of wilderness suitability be made on the area known as the Spruce Creek Addition Study Area. That wilderness study has been completed by the U.S. Forest Service including the necessary public hearings. There has also been a mineral survey of the area completed by the Geological Survey and the Bureau of Mines of the United States Department of the Interior. This section of the bill states that the required wilderness studies have been completed.

SECTION 7

This section adds the entire Spruce Creek Addition Study Area to the existing Hunter-Fryingpan Wilderness. The Hunter-Fryingpan Wilderness which was established in 1978 contains 74,450 acres. The Spruce Creek Addition Study Area lies on the west side of the wilderness and east of the town of Aspen. Elevations range from approximately 9,200 feet to 12,200 feet and the area includes examples of both alpine and montane life zones. The Spruce Creek Area offers outstanding opportunities for solitude and unconfined recreation particularly in conjunction with the Hunter-Fryingpan Wilderness. The boundaries of the area follow the existing Hunter-Fryingpan Wilderness boundary on the south and northeast sides of the area. The west boundary extends south from Porphyry Mountain following the east facing slopes of Spruce Creek and extending across Woody Creek to Bald Knob.

SECTION 8

This section abolishes the Spruce Creek Addition Wilderness Study Area that was created as a part of Public Law 95-237.

SECTION 9

This section is standard language requiring filing of maps and legal descriptions.

SECTION 10

This section is standard language requiring management in accordance with the Wilderness Act of 1964.●

By Mr. DECONCINI (for himself, Mr. HEFLIN, Mr. SIMPSON, Mr. HUDDLESTON, and Mr. BENTSEN):

S. 2784. A bill to clarify the application of the antitrust laws to professional team sports leagues, to protect the public interest in maintaining the stability of professional team sports leagues, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MAJOR LEAGUE SPORTS COMMUNITY PROTECTION ACT OF 1982

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, together with my distinguished colleagues, Senators HEFLIN, SIMPSON, HUDDLESTON, and BENTSEN I rise to introduce the Major League Sports Community Protection Act of 1982.

This legislation reflects the serious concern that each of us shares about the fate of communities throughout the Nation which have invested heavily—both financially and emotionally—in major league sport franchises. Until recently, it was understood that permission for a team owner to leave a particular community would be granted by the league and only under special circumstances. But recent legal actions taken under the antitrust laws open the possibility that each owner will be free to move his or her franchise indiscriminately. While such a situation might well reap owners substantial windfall profits, it would, unfortunately, leave dozens of communities paying off bonds issued to construct stadiums and other sports facilities and with no teams to use them. This financial impact would be compounded by the emotional loss felt by thousands of loyal fans.

In an effort to restore a certain amount of due process and predictability such as has been experienced over the last few decades, my colleagues and I are introducing legislation which essentially clarifies the intent of Congress that antitrust laws not cover situations involving the decision to relocate a team. Under our bill, it would continue to be the prerogative of the league to make those decisions. The bill also addresses the question of revenue sharing since it is intimately and inextricably linked to location. Without a continuation of the practice of revenue sharing among the league's franchises, it would be unfair and unrealistic to disallow complete freedom of mobility.

I am persuaded, however, that narrower legislation aimed at relocation and revenue sharing is in order. Plainly and simply, our bill would recognize as legitimate league conduct (a) any sports league decision to keep a team in its existing community and (b) sports league agreements to share revenues among the league's clubs so as to assure the economic viability of clubs in less well situated communities. Such revenue sharing practices are, in effect, a subsidy to the franchises operating major league sports teams, and the bill directly encourages such revenue sharing practices.

Suggestions for legislation of this type came to the fore in the hearings held by the House subcommittee early this year and during 1981. Persuasive testimony regarding the need for clarification of legal standards in this area was presented by several witnesses, including the mayor of Oakland, Calif., Lionel Wilson. These witnesses then emphasized the unique importance of professional sports teams to our Nation's communities, the lack of clarity in the antitrust standards used in considering sports league issues, and the compelling need for antitrust clarification in the area of transfers of sports franchise locations. They also criticized the efforts of the Oakland Raiders to ignore NFL rules and to use antitrust laws to relocate the NFL's Oakland franchise in Los Angeles, despite the unprecedented and continued financial and moral support the Raiders had received in the Oakland area.

Mayor Wilson cogently put the public interest and legislative policy questions this way:

Now let me turn briefly to how the Oakland community's interests relate to current antitrust concepts. There is an antitrust suit against the NFL and the Oakland-Alameda County Coliseum seeking to strip the Raiders from Oakland. It has been my understanding that the antitrust laws were meant to serve the public interest and to promote consumer welfare. Yet what conceivable public interest is served by using antitrust to allow the Raiders to turn their backs on Oakland and the fans who have given them such faithful support over the years? What public interest is served by leaving the City and the County with over $1.5 million in annual debt service costs—which cannot possibly be paid if the Raiders leave? What public interest is served by telling the NFL that the antitrust laws prevent it from continuing to have one of its most successful teams operate in Oakland? What public purpose is served by telling our community that because Los Angeles has a larger population and is a better pay-TV market, Oakland must forfeit its team despite all it has given the Raiders? I think the answer is clear: None whatsoever.

My concerns with the responsibility of sports leagues in maintaining stable community-team ties have been underscored by recent developments. In addition to the Raiders' proposed move, we have seen efforts by San Diego's professional basketball team to pull up stakes and move out of that community in the face of a binding lease. We all know that professional sports stadiums and arenas subsidized or built entirely with taxpayer funds have become a central feature of our Nation's landscape and of our Nation's recreational, cultural, and civic life. Today there are stadiums such as RFK Stadium here in the Nation's Capital—built with a public bond issue guaranteed by the U.S. Treasury. And other communities have publicly sponsored stadiums such as the New Orleans Superdome, Michigan's great Silverdome, and Seattle's magnificent Kingdome—all built with public bond issues or subsidized with taxpayer funds. As the Washington Post recently reported, communities throughout the Nation are now strongly concerned about their relationships with professional sports teams—and anxious to assure that community interests are adequately protected.

In my judgment, antitrust notions that permit a highly successful and highly profitable professional sports team to abandon a community despite the unanimous opposition of the league's membership do not serve the public interest. The antitrust laws are intended to serve consumer interests but it is unrealistic to treat a member of a league as a totally independent sole proprietor free to hopscotch from community to community without regard to broader public or league interests. Nor do I think that the public is served by allowing sports teams to gravitate only to the big metropolitan markets where owners might see financial bonanzas. Leagues and teams should have incentives to locate teams throughout the Nation, and this bill encourages revenue-sharing practices that serve such purposes.

The primary goal of the conspiracy provisions of the antitrust laws is to guarantee that true economic competitors operate with some distance between each other. But these provisions should not be inflexibly applied to allow big metropolitan areas to compel leagues to locate multiple teams in such areas to the exclusion of geographic dispersion of teams, including in smaller and midsized communities. Sports league agreements that protect stable league-community relations should be encouraged. But inflexible application of antitrust law destroys the very concept of a league by allowing individual clubs to dictate league policy and to elevate individual club interests over league-wide or community interests.

There is a long history of congressional recognition of the importance of geographic balance in the location of teams and stable ties between our Nation's communities and professional sports teams. The present proposed bill merely confirms those policies that Congress has often urged upon sports leagues and requires sports teams to honor their commitments to their leagues and to their communities.

But the immediate cause for concern is the protection of community interests in securing reasonable protection for public and taxpayer rights. As the San Diego Union recently put it, the need for congressional action is now clear:

Mr. Davis is guilty of unconscionable conduct in suing the owners of the NFL, whose revenue sharing has led the Raiders to compete successfully with franchises in much larger cities. And it's a rotten business for Mr. Davis to desert loyal fans who have brought him fame and fortune.

The proposed kidnapping of the Raiders from Oakland has prompted introduction of legislation in Congress which would protect Oakland and other cities that support their sports franchises.

Beyond the Oakland consideration, we have a parochial interest in this legislation. Such a law might defeat the effort by Los Angeles to snatch away our San Diego Clippers. We trust, therefore, that the legislation known as the Major League Sports Community Protection Act of 1982 (H.R. 6467) will gain early passage. Otherwise, there could be mounting chaos in professional sports across the country. An unscrupulous franchise owner could skim off the cream in a given area for a few years, make unreasonable demands upon the city, and move on to greener pastures if they are not met."

The central purpose of the proposed legislation is to permit professional sports leagues to determine where their member clubs will be located and to provide for revenue sharing among their members, without being exposed to challenge under the conspiracy provisions of the Sherman Act. Experience has shown that leagues can be expected to assure that member clubs stay in communities that have faithfully and profitably supported them through many years. If leagues are not permitted to maintain clubs in existing successful locations, communities that have long supported a professional team, possibly helped finance it by constructing a stadium, and that have had various vital interests become dependent on a team's presence, may suddenly find they have lost their investment because of narrow profit opportunities of individual clubs or club owners.

I have noted statements that there is a need to establish guidelines on how to protect fans from sports teams which move from city to city. Such a bill might outline the points under which a team could move, such as falling attendance, poor facilities, and so forth.

But it is essential to understand that the bill being introduced today does not place beyond antitrust challenge decisions of sports leagues to move clubs out of their assigned territories. The bill only authorizes leagues to operate with rules enabling the league's membership to decide that league teams should remain in the communities where they are operating. The bill does not change any legal principle operating in the other direciton—that is, it does not give leagues the authority to permit teams to pick up and move from their assigned communities. In short, the bill is not an authorization for franchise hopscotching.

The fact that the bill places beyond antitrust challenge only league decisions to keep teams in their existing territories was emphasized by Representative STARK when this legislation was introduced in the House of Representatives. He stated:

First, the bill authorizes sports leagues to operate with rules requiring their member clubs to obtain approval of the league membership before abandoning communities in which clubs have been operating successfully. This provision guarantees that the interests of communities and leagues will be evaluated when well supported and financially successful clubs are proposed to transfer their home locations. And if a league rejects such a transfer proposal, the league could not be attacked under the antitrust laws for maintaining the existing team location. This provision will, by the express terms of the proposed legislation, apply to the NFL's decision not to authorize the Raiders to transfer out of the Oakland community.

Concerns have been expressed that any sport-antitrust legislation should not have any effect on player employment or player union matters, and we have respected these concerns in this legislation. The bill is narrowly and explicitly drawn. It expressly reserves to the labor-management sphere and to the labor and antitrust any employment-related matters now subject to those laws. Under this bill, the rights and obligations of players, player unions, clubs, and league regarding labor-management matters will be the same upon enactment of this bill as they are now. In short, we have taken pains to assure that the legislation does not change applicable labor law, antitrust law, or other legal standards on employment matters.

The provision of the bill dealing with revenue sharing among the members of a league does not change any antitrust or labor law principle relative to wage scales or wage agreements. Any collective bargaining that might now occur, for example, on an allocation of revenues to player benefits, would clearly continue to be permissible under this bill. The bill has no effect on other aspects of player employment such as the eligibility of college athletes for play in the professional leagues. I know that these and other player-employment subjects have been priority matters for the various player unions in professional sports, and they will continue to be matters to be dealt with by the unions in collective bargaining or under the antitrust laws as appropriate.

It is with extreme caution that I approach the task of clarifying our antitrust laws. I strongly endorse the purpose of section 1 of the Sherman Act to bar trade restraining agreements among independent parties. However, when the parties in an enterprise are not wholly independent business competitors but instead are dependent on each other for league operations, it makes no sense to apply routine antitrust standards across the board if that disserves the public interest. When section 1 cannot be uniformly and clearly applied by our Federal courts, when private litigants can take any routine league decision and twist it into a "conspiracy," the antitrust laws are not serving the public interests or consumer interests they were designed to serve.

Examination of antitrust law application to sports has occurred on many occasions in Congress, and the Supreme Court itself has urged the Congress to address the unique problems of sports and antitrust. Hearings on sports and antitrust have been held in 1951, 1954, 1957, 1958, 1959, 1960, 1964, 1965, and 1976. In 1958 and 1965, the House and the Senate, respectively, passed separate bills limiting the application of the antitrust laws to professional sports teams. The present bill is consistent with previous congressional action but is, in fact, far narrower than most prior proposals. It also includes express disclaimers and safeguards.

Unless Congress acts, stadiums and other sports facilities built with taxpayer money will be unfairly darkened around the country. Unless Congress acts, every team owner will be free to auction his team for sale to the highest bidder, regardless of how well the team has been supported. Unless Congress acts, the revenue-sharing arrangements that make it possible for communities of all sizes throughout the Nation to support professional sports teams may be subject to legal challenge on misguided standards.

The Major League Sports Community Protection Act will allow sports leagues to operate in the public interest while maintaining the current coverage of professional team sports leagues under applicable antitrust and labor law standards.

I urge my colleagues to support this measure and I ask unanimous consent that the text be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2784

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Major League Sports Community Protection Act of 1982."

FINDINGS AND DECLARATIONS

SEC. 2. The Congress finds and declares that the public has an interest in preserving stability in the relationship between professional sports teams and the communities in which they operate and in encouraging professional team sports leagues to promote the economic and geographic stability of their member clubs: Therefore, be it enacted, that—

(1) It shall not be unlawful by reason of any provision of the antitrust laws for a professional team sports league and its member clubs—

(a) to enforce rules authorizing the membership of the league to decide that a member club of such league shall not be relocated; or

(b) to enforce rules for the division of league or member club revenues that tend to promote comparable economic opportunities for the member clubs of such a league.

INAPPLICABILITY TO CERTAIN MATTERS

SEC. 3. Nothing contained in this Act shall—

(a) be deemed to change, determine, or otherwise affect the applicability or nonapplicability of the labor laws, the antitrust laws, or any other provision of law to the wages, hours, or other terms and conditions of player employment within any sports league, to any player employment matter within any sports league, or to any collective bargaining rights and privileges of any player union within any sports league;

(b) exempt from the antitrust laws any agreement to fix the prices of admission to sports contests;

(c) exempt from the antitrust laws any predatory practice or other conduct with respect to competing sports leagues which would otherwise be unlawful under the antitrust laws; or

(d) modify any existing Federal statutes relating to the television practices of sports leagues, or change, determine, or otherwise affect the applicability or nonapplicability of the antitrust laws or communications laws to any form of joint dealing practices by sports leagues with respect to the sale of cable or subscription television.

FEDERAL PREEMPTION

SEC. 4. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, no State or political subdivision thereof shall establish, maintain, or enforce any regulation of commerce that imposes any limitation on the collective conduct of professional team sports leagues or their member clubs authorized by this Act.

APPLICABILITY TO PENDING ACTIONS

SEC. 5. (a) This Act shall apply to all actions commenced under the antitrust laws of the United States after the date of enactment of this Act.

(b) This Act shall also apply to all actions commenced under the antitrust laws of the United States prior to the date of enactment of this Act unless—

(1) the judgment in an action is final and unappealable on or before the date of enactment of this Act; or

(2) the court determines in an action involving collective conduct of a professional team sports league in which a release or covenant has been signed prior to the date of enactment of this Act that it would be manifestly unjust, in light of subsection (c) of this section and other circumstances, to apply this Act in such action to any unresolved claim of any party not a member club of such league.

(c) No agreement to settle, compromise, or release a claim which has been signed by the parties prior to the date of enactment of this Act may be rescinded, disapproved, reformed, or modified by the parties or by the court because of the application of the provisions of this Act, except upon the written consent of all parties thereto.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 6. For purposes of this Act, the term "Professional team sports league" means the organized professional team sports of basketball, football, hockey or soccer.

By Mr. DURENBERGER:

S. 2785. A bill to amend chapter 89 of title 5, United States Code, relating to the Federal employees health benefits program, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

FEDERAL EMPLOYEES HEALTH PLAN IMPROVEMENT ACT OF 1982

● Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to improve the Federal employees health benefits plan (FEHBP).

The Federal employees health benefits plan, which has served Federal employees well for over 20 years, has had a rough 1982. The real tragedy is that when the health plan suffers, so do Federal employees.

In 1982, the take-home pay of Federal employees was less—by as much as $45 a month—because of an increase in health insurance premiums. But the premium increases this year are just one part of the story. Health plans also reduced coverage. Because of cost pressures, the Office of Personnel Management required all plans to reduce benefits.

And finally, employees were locked into these changes for 6 months. Normally given the chance to change plans in November 1981, Federal employees were forced to wait until May of this year to switch plans.

Clearly, something went wrong. After 20 years of smooth operation, the FEHBP desperately needs a tuneup. This bill is designed to do just that: Reform the FEHBP and get it on firm footing again. We cannot afford another round of problems like the ones we had this year.

The problems this year have their roots in many causes—the policies of past administrations, health cost increases, adverse selection, and the structure of the FEHBP itself.

One of the major corrections needed is in calculating the Government contribution. The present formula is unwieldly and unpredictable; it invites the kind of last-minute adjusting that occurred this year. Health plans and employees should know in advance how much of the premium the Federal Government will pay.

The Government should also adjust its contribution based on the relative risk of enrollees. Federal retirees, for example, have greater health needs than active employees. Health plans that enroll more retirees should receive an additional contribution. This bill makes adjustments in the Government contribution for age, sex, and place of residence.

Another way to control for adverse selection is to require that all plans offer a certain minimum level of benefits. Congress, however, must be careful in setting such minimum requirements. We must be sure that Federal employees have a say in the process. After all, it is Federal employees who will pay for these benefits. My bill establishes an advisory committee made up of Federal employees and annuitants to make recommendations to Congress on minimum benefit levels.

The availability and quality of information on participating health plans also needs to be improved. If employees are to make rational choices based on their needs, they must have adequate and understandable information.

It is not just the Federal worker who has a stake in a well-run Federal employees health benefits plan. All workers benefit from the success of this system. The FEHBP is one of the best examples of consumer choice and health care competition we have in this country. Giving Federal employees the opportunity to choose from among a variety of health care plans forces health providers to keep a close eye on costs—and that is important for everyone.

We must remember that the real victims of the cuts, delays, and premium increases are not the health plans or the providers. The real victims are the employees and their families. It is for their sake that it is so important we act quickly on this bill.

Senator TED STEVENS, chairman of the Subcommittee on Civil Service, Post Office, and General Services, has shown special concern for the problems that have surfaced in the FEHBP. Senator STEVENS has been instrumental in identifying issues, bringing the concerned parties together, and working toward solutions. As a fellow member of the Governmental Affairs Committee, I look forward to working closely with him and others in passing this bill.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a section-by-section summary of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the summary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SECTION-BY-SECTION SUMMARY OF FEDERAL EMPLOYEES HEALTH PLAN IMPROVEMENT ACT OF 1982

SECTION 2—CHANGING PLAN REQUIREMENTS

The bill broadens participation by government-wide plans. Under present law, only one service benefit plan and one indemnity plan are permitted as government-wide plans. Amending language will allow more than two government-wide plans to participate in the Federal Employees Health Benefits Plan (FEHBP).

Benefits in all plans must be at least actuarily equivalent to the lowest level of benefits offered as of January 1, 1982. In effect, this means that benefits must be at least as comprehensive as the low option Aetna plan offered in 1982.

Certain conditions are set for offering health plans. First, an organization or its parent organization must have experience in offering such a plan. Furthermore, plans must demonstrate that they have the potential to enroll at least 2.5 percent of the number of potential subscribers in the area, or 5,000 enrollees, whichever is less. The Office of Personnel Management (OPM) is also given the authority to terminate the contract of any carrier if, at any time during the preceding two contract years, the carrier had less than 300 enrollees.

Under present law, both the service benefit plan (Blue Cross) and the indemnity plan (Aetna) must offer two levels of benefits. Amending language does not require carriers to offer more than one level of benefits.

Present law requires that except for group practice prepayment plans, participating plans in the FEHBP must cover services provided by clinical psychologists or optometrists. This section extends the exemption to individual practice prepayment plans.

The section states that the federal government must contract with plans which, under state law, have access to private employer markets through dual choice provisions. In effect, this provision requires the federal government to comply with state HMO laws. However, in order to be offered, these HMOs must still meet the market potential requirements listed earlier.

This section also strikes a sentence in the present Act which requires participating group practice prepayment plans to include physicians representing at least three major medical specialties who receive all or a substantial part of their professional income from the prepaid funds. Striking this sentence loosens the definition and will permit participation by many otherwise qualified plans.

SECTION 3—CHANGE IN CONTRIBUTION FORMULA AND PAYMENT ADJUSTMENTS

Under current law, the government contribution cannot exceed 75 percent of the total premium amount. This section strikes that provision and allows the government contribution to equal up to 100 percent of the premium.

This section also changes the way in which the government contribution is calculated. In the past, the government contribution was tied to the premiums of the "big six" plans. This will be changed. The government contribution in 1983 will be calculated by taking government amounts in 1982 (for individuals and families) and increasing them by the annual percentage increase in the medical care component of the consumer price index (MCPI). That would result in an increase of approximately 12 percent from 1982 to 1983. Government contribution amounts in future years would be indexed by the MCPI for the 12 month period ending with July.

There will be a further adjustment in the government's contribution to account for adverse selection. As far as the employee or annuitant is concerned, the government contribution will be equal. Thus, a single employee and a single annuitant will see the same government contribution when they select a plan. If they join the same health plan, they will each pay the same amount out of pocket. However, after they select a plan the government contribution will be adjusted.

In 1983, the government's contribution will be adjusted so that for an annuitant it will be 130 percent of what it is for an active employee. This adjustment will be done in such a way that the total government expenditures will be the same as if no adjustment had been made. For example, a 12.1 percent increase in the MCPI would raise the government contribution for a family from $86.53/mo. in 1982 to $97.00/mo. in 1983. If the total premium for a plan was $135.00/mo., both an employee and an annuitant would pay $37.00/mo. to join it.

However, the government's contribution would then be adjusted to reflect the relative risk of active employees and annuitants. For active employees, the government contribution in 1983 would be approximately $89.00; for annuitants it would be approximately $116.00. The weighted average is still $97.00/mo. and the total government expenditure is the same as if no adjustment had been made.

The 130 percent difference between $89.00 and $116.00 adjusts for the higher risk of annuitants, and thus addresses the increased expenses plans now face in enrolling annuitants.

After 1983, a more comprehensive indexing system will be put into place to adjust for age, sex, and place of residence for all employees and annuitants. The 130 percent is only a one year fix; after that time, the indexing system would take effect.

SECTION 4—EMPLOYEE INFORMATION PROGRAM

This section describes how information will be disseminated to enrollees. Each government agency that employs 7,500 or more employees will be authorized to employ one health benefits specialist for each 15,000 (or fraction) employees. These health benefits specialists will be responsible for distributing information, arranging meetings, assembling data, evaluating carrier performance, and preparing reports.

SECTION 5—STUDIES, REPORTS, AND ADVISORY COMMITTEE

This section states that the Office of Personnel Management will work closely with the Department of Health and Human Services. They will coordinate policies, the collection of records, and reports.

An advisory committee will be appointed by the President. Of the twelve members, nine will be employees and three will be annuitants. The primary responsibility of the committee will be to advise Congress on minimum benefit levels.

SECTION 6—OPEN ENROLLMENT

An annual open enrollment period not shorter than 30 days will be established. Furthermore, employees and annuitants must reaffirm or change coverage at least once every five years.

SECTION 7—EFFECTIVE DATES

The provisions of this Act apply to pay periods to begin on or after January 1, 1983.●

By Mr. WEICKER:

S.J. Res. 222. Joint resolution to designate the week of February 13 through February 19, 1983, as "National Police Athletic League Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL POLICE ATHLETIC LEAGUE WEEK

● Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, today I am introducing a joint resolution to designate the week of February 13 through February 19, 1983, as "National Police Athletic League Week."

In 1944, the National Police Conference on PAL and Youth Activities was formed to provide for the positive development of America's youths. Many kids, particularly those in low-income urban areas, lacked outlets for their natural energies. Games of stickball in city streets led not only to injury and disturbance, but to ill will between the policeman who's job it was to keep the street safe and clear and the kids who just wanted to play ball. Police athletic leagues filled this void by providing supervised competition. Kids not only got the chance to play ball, but they were brought into close contact with caring adults, who could provide them with guidance and friendship to help them steer clear of trouble and focus their energies on sportsmanship and citizenship.

Among the many successful PAL alumni are tennis champion Althea Gibson who first picked up a racquet in a PAL program on the New York City streets and the great basketball star, Wilt Chamberlain, who began his career in a PAL center in Philadelphia. Hundreds of thousands of other PAL graduates have gone on to lead productive lives in their own communities.

Today, over 1 million youths are involved in PAL programs nationwide, participating in such sports as boxing, baseball, basketball, girl's softball and ice hockey. For those youngsters who are not sportsminded, arts and crafts, dance, music and drama are available. Many PAL's offer services such as job placement, vocational guidance, and remedial reading.

Mr. President, the national PAL office is located in my home State of Connecticut in the city of Bridgeport. For the next 5 years, a constituent of mine, Mr. Michael J. Marella, Jr., will be serving as national executive director of this fine organization. He informs me that the national PAL will be sponsoring their annual national ice hockey tournament in Detroit, Mich., during the week of February 13 to February 19, 1983. It is fitting that the Congress act to declare that week as "National Police Athletic Week" in recognition of the contributions the National Police Conference on PAL and youth activities has made to the prevention of juvenile delinquency and the promotion of sportsmanship among the Nation's youth, as well as in honor of the individual men, women, boys, and girls who work together, sharing and enjoying the valuable companionship that is at the heart of all PAL programs. I urge my colleagues to join me in this effort.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 222

Whereas the Congress recognizes the importance of our youth to the strength of America,

Whereas sports and adult guidance are beneficial to the growth and development of children,

Whereas since 1944, the National Police Conference on Police Athletic Leagues and Youth Activities has promoted sportsmanship and citizenship for boys and girls across the nation,

Whereas today over 1 million youths participate in P.A.L.'s in such sports as baseball, basketball, tennis, hockey and girl's softball and in such activities as arts and crafts, dance, music, and drama.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President is authorized to issue a proclamation designating the week of February 13 through February 19, 1983, as "National Police Athletic League Week" and calling upon the people of the United States to observe the week with appropriate ceremonies, programs and activities.●

By Mr. KENNEDY (for himself, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. EAGLETON, Mr. RANDOLPH, and Mr. METZENBAUM):

S.J. Res. 223. Joint resolution to prohibit the Secretary of Labor from promulgating regulations which expand the number of hours which 14- and 15-year-old children would be permitted to work and which further change the conditions of employment of young children and students; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

PROHIBITING THE IMPLEMENTATION OF CERTAIN CHILD LABOR REGULATIONS

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am today introducing for myself and Senators RIEGLE, EAGLETON, RANDOLPH, and METZENBAUM a joint resolution to prohibit the Secretary of Labor from promulgating regulations which will severely weaken this Nation's child labor laws.

On July 16, Secretary of Labor Donovan proposed regulations which would increase the number of hours that 14- and 15-year-olds may work from 18 to 24 hours a week, would lengthen the workday curfew from 7 to 9 p.m. on schooldays, and would open many jobs to junior high school students which have historically been considered unsafe for young people.

This proposal is the most far-reaching change in the child labor regulations since the law was first enacted and demonstrates a profound insensitivity to millions of unemployed Americans who want and need a job.

The administration claims the new regulations are needed to provide increased job opportunities for schoolchildren. This is a cruel hoax at a time when over 10 million Americans are unemployed, the unemployment rate among teenagers between the ages of 16 and 19 is over 20 percent and millions of able-bodied Americans are forced to work part time because of the disastrous economic policies of this administration.

The purpose of these regulations is to provide a pool of cheap part-time child labor for the service and retail industries. They will not create new jobs but instead will reduce employment opportunities for adult workers who have families to support. While I can sympathize with the economic problems faced by businessmen in the retail and food service industries, I do not believe these problems will be solved by eliminating protections for children which have been on the books for over 40 years.

The Department of Labor claims that longer and later hours of work will not interfere with schooling. No factual evidence has been offered to support this assertion. Quite to the contrary, it is clear that expanding the workday for these children will deemphasize the importance of education and many experts believe they will have a serious impact on school performance.

Current law provides ample opportunity for 14 and 15 year olds to obtain work experience. And while work experience can be of great value, it is simply no substitute for a good education.

The principle reason so many teenagers have difficulty finding and holding a job is because they do not have the basic skills necessary in today's job market. As the GAO pointed out in a study issued in March of this year, "labor market problems of teenagers result largely from doing poorly in school." Implementation of these regulations will simply compound the problem of finding good jobs for yet another generation of American youth.

I believe these proposals clearly violate the intent of Congress which authorized child labor only under conditions which do not "interfere with their schooling or their health and well-being."

This is not the first time the Department has flouted the will of Congress in its pell-mell rush to undermine this Nation's labor laws by executive fiat. Just 2 weeks ago, U.S. District Judge Harold Greene halted the implementation of DOL regulations which would have weakened the Davis-Bacon Act. Judge Greene's decision in that case spoke in terms that are equally applicable here:

When an agency abruptly changes a long-standing administrative position . . . it may be expected at a minimum to show that the earlier understanding of the statute was wrong or that experience has proved it to be defective . . . the Secretary (of Labor) . . . has done neither.

On no less than six occasions since the Reagan administration took office, the Labor Department has proposed or advocated the repeal or rewrite of almost every significant labor protective statute on the books and has virtually abandoned its role as the advocate for the unorganized and the unemployed. This is a sad commentary on a Department whose historic mission has been to assure safe working conditions and fair wages for American workers.

The sorry record of the Department of Labor over the last 18 months reveals the true meaning of supply-side economics. This administration apparently believes that removing protection for the weakest, most powerless workers in our society is an essential element of its economic policy. I reject that idea.

The administration's proposed child labor regulations do not serve the long-term interests of students or unemployed workers. Instead they serve the short-term interests of a few industries which are suffering from the effects of the Reagan administration's economic policies.

This joint resolution provides an opportunity for the Senate to tell the Department, in the most unequivocal terms, that we expect it to resume its traditional role and that the Congress will not permit the further erosion of the basic labor laws of this country.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the joint resolution, together with two articles on the serious employment and education problems of young people, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 223

Whereas the regulations pursuant to the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 dealing with the employment of 14- and 15-year old children are intended to insure that the employment of youth does not interfere with their schooling or their health and well-being, and

Whereas the Secretary of Labor has proposed changes in those regulations which would extend the number of hours in which 14- and 15-year old children could work during school weeks, which would permit these children to work late into the evening, and which would permit the employment of these children in occupations previously deemed to be hazardous, and

Whereas the Secretary of Labor has proposed changes in the regulations to facilitate the employment of students at less than the wage which must be paid to other youthful workers, and

Whereas the Congress finds that the regulations proposed by the Secretary of Labor are cause for grave concern at a time of very high unemployment generally and catastrophically high unemployment among teenage people and young adults who are not in school, and

Whereas the Congress finds that the regulations proposed by the Secretary of Labor will interfere with the schooling of children and with their health and well-being: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, The Congress finds that—

(1) the proposed rule issued by the Secretary of Labor (47 Fed. Reg. 31254) changing the conditions under which 14 and 15-year-old children may be employed, and do not carry out the purposes of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 respecting protection of employees who are children or students.

SEC. 2. (a) The Secretary of Labor may not place into effect the proposed rule referred to in paragraph (1) of the first section or proceed with the rulemaking begun by the notice referred to in paragraph (2) of such section.

(b) Any rulemaking in violation of subsection (a) shall have no legal effect.

NAEP AT AGE 10 SAYS: SCHOOLS ARE IN TROUBLE

The once-controversial National Assessment of Educational Progress (NAEP) is ending its first decade of measuring education achievement and reassessing periodically for possible change. After spending $55.2 million in federal tax dollars and after involving 810,000 students in assessment exercises, what is its message to the American people?

NAEP results since 1969 indicate clearly that the nation's high schools and their students are in real trouble. They also say that the first signs of trouble show up with 13-year-olds in the intermediate or junior high school. All is not grim, however, because the news is more positive from the assessments of 9-year-olds in elementary schools across the country.

The latest assessment results, which provide NAEP's first opportunity to measure change in mathematics achievement, illustrate this point. A comparison of 1973 and 1978 results shows a slight decline for 9-years-olds, a moderate decline for 13-year-olds, and an appreciable decline for 17-year-olds.

Here, in quick summary, is what NAEP has found in other subject areas assessed:

In science, achievement of all three age groups declined between 1970 and 1973; however, between 1973 and 1977 achievement of 17-year-olds continued to fall while that of both younger groups stayed about the same.

In reading, 9-year-olds displayed a slight improvement between 1971 and 1975, while achievement of 13- and 17-year-olds remained unchanged.

In writing, achievement as displayed in written paragraphs stayed about the same for 9-year-olds between 1970 and 1974, but the quality and coherence of 13- and 17-year-olds, declined. Basic mechanics of writing—spelling, punctuation, and capitalization—showed few changes at any grade level.

In social studies, achievement of 9-year-olds did not change from 1972 to 1976; some declines were evident for 13-year-olds and larger drops occurred for 17-year-olds; both teenage groups also declined in their knowledge and attitudes regarding politics.

"While patterns across subject areas are not completely consistent," an NAEP spokesman pointed out, "some trends are apparent. There is a fairly strong pattern of declines for 17-year-olds, the only exception being in the area of reading. Results for 9-year-olds, however, usually did not change greatly between the early and mid-1970s, and improved somewhat in reading.

"Thirteen-year-olds," he continued, "were between these extremes, showing declines in some areas and not in other areas. Generally, their declines were not quite as large as those seen for the older teenagers."

The new math results, comparing 1973 assessments with 1978 assessments, show that on average 17-year-olds performed four percentage points lower than 17-year-olds five years ago and 13-year-olds performed two percentage points lower. The decrease in 9-year-olds' performance was about one percentage point.

Results for skill in computing with whole numbers were mixed. Although there were fluctuations in computational abilities over the five-year period, performance was generally high and declines were, in large part, offset by gains.

Serious declines, however, were noted in problem-solving ability. Here are some examples:

In 1978, 56 percent of the 17-year-olds, compared to 65 percent in 1973, answered this problem correctly: "A car traveled eight kilometers in five minutes. At this speed, how many kilometers could it travel in one hour?"

In 1978, 52 percent of the 17-year-olds, compared to 60 percent in 1973, answered this problem correctly: "A hockey team won five of the 20 games it played. What percent of the games did it win?" Twenty percent of the 13-year-olds in both 1973 and 1978 answered it correctly.

In 1978, 13 percent of the 9-year-olds, 49 percent of the 13-year-olds, and 73 percent of the 17-year-olds, compared to 18 percent, 56 percent, and 81 percent, respectively in 1973, answered this problem correctly: "What does ⅔ of 9 equal?"

In 1978, 36 percent of the 13-year-olds and 53 percent of the 17-year-olds, compared to 43 percent and 61 percent respectively in 1973, solved this problem: "Express 9/100 as a percent."

One of the few bright spots in the math results was a significant improvement of 9-year-old blacks between 1973 and 1978. In 1973 an average of 18 percentage points separated black and white 9-year-olds' performances; by 1978 this difference had decreased to 13 percentage points. Although the 13-year-old blacks did not improve between the two assessments, their achievement did not decline as did their white counterparts. By age 17, however, the favorable trends for blacks were no longer evident.

Another bright spot: Knowledge of metric terminology improved substantially between assessments. In 1978, 63 percent of the 13-years-olds, compared to 37 percent in 1973, correctly identified a kilometer as the largest measure of length in a list of metric units. Also, in 1978, 71 percent of the 17-years-olds correctly gave the English unit most nearly equivalent to a given metric unit—an improvement of 12 percentage points from 1973.

A panel of math experts assembled by NAEP to study the results was highly concerned with the generally low performance on problem-solving items and with the declines on these items that had occurred since 1973. It pointed out that the new emphasis in many schools on "the basics" has often resulted in a narrowing of the curriculum, with more attention focused on computational skills and knowledge of facts and definitions, and in less time spent on problem solving. It also noted that new textbooks have adopted a simplified approach to problem solving.

Unfortunately, in its press release disclosing the results, NAEP made time-pressed news reporters wade through four pages of copy before they could find out the changes that took place between assessments, which, after all, is the main purpose of NAEP. This is dangerous business, because it gives the impression that an attempt is being made to hide bad news. In recent years NAEP has tended to give good news equal billing with bad news, even though the importance of the negative results is often far more significant. Since nothing is more important to NAEP than its credibility, the appearance of possible slanting in the reporting of results is something to avoid at all costs. And instead of following NAEP's lead, the press played up the changes reported on page 5 of the press release.

NAEP, funded by HEW's National Institute of Education, releases detailed reports on the results of each assessment. Reports include useful recommendations to educators on actions they can take to eliminate weaknesses pinpointed by the studies, making them must reading for district and school staffs. Reports of the math assessment are "Changes in Mathematical Achievement, 1973-78" ($1.75); "Mathematical Skills and Knowledge" ($4.65); and "Mathematical Applications" ($4.50). They may be ordered from NAEP, Suite 700, 1860 Lincoln St., Denver, CO 80295.

LEARNING JOBS IN SCHOOL

BOSTON PIONEERS IN TRYING TO BRIDGE SKILLS GAP

(By Kathy Sawyer)

BOSTON.—The Hubert H. Humphrey Occupational Resources Center might be taken for a mirage, an alien shimmer of technology settled like Oz here among the mean housing projects and boarded-up store fronts in the black neighborhood of Roxbury.

To the thousands of kids from nearby high schools, where simply learning to read is considered a rare achievement, it does indeed represent a kind of wizardry. Inside the new Center's sprawl of futuristic classrooms—one of the largest and best-equipped such training facilities in the nation—they get a chance to lay hands on the strangeness of delicate camera settings in a $450,000 TV studio, or punch keys on a $200,000 computer or, in a gaping indoor construction pit of sand, build the bottom of a skyscraper.

"I'd never touched nothin' like that before, something really expensive and technical," said Michael Jones, a soft-spoken 6-foot-2 12th-grader who jumped at the chance to get his basketball-playing hands on the school's new Digital and Apple computers.

Since coming to the Center, he has discovered an unsuspected aptitude in data processing and computer graphics. He has signed up with the Air Force, where he will be able to take advanced computer courses after basic training. Then, he figures he can "go anywhere."

Time was when the more ambitious kids from his neighborhood might have found low-skill jobs, with decent pay and a future, even without the Humphrey Center and without much in the way of skills or even literacy. But such jobs are rapidly disappearing, specialists say.

The Center is a $38 million experiment at the cutting edge of what is called the skills gap, a tragic paradox of critical jobs going unfilled in the nation's plants and offices at the same time precious human talents waste away in unemployment lines, or on street corners in neighborhoods like this one, at great public expense. The cost is great in dollars, greater still in the waste of human capital.

President Reagan highlighted the issue graphically, if unwittingly, at a news conference. There are plenty of jobs available for those who look, he insisted, offering as proof the fat section of help-wanted ads in his Sunday newspaper.

But the bulk of those jobs are available, of course, only for those who know how to program or repair computers, assist artists or doctors, do accounting, speak good English, use good grammar, type 30 words per minute, or otherwise contribute to the new world of clean work.

Entry-level skill requirements in many growth industries "seem to center on one skill, and that is the key punch skill", said Paul Grogan, of Boston's Neighborhood Development and Employment Agency. "And there is an exploded demand for people who can handle themselves in an office setting . . . , who understand things like punctuality, deference, organizing, presenting themselves correctly."

Estimates of the size of the skills gap vary. There were nearly 1 million skilled jobs unfilled last year, at a time when 10 million people were counted as unemployed.

Three in four jobs of the 1980s will require technical training below the college baccalaureate level, the Bureau of Labor Statistics says. Yet more high schoolers than ever are dropping out of science and mathematics after the 10th grade, eliminating themselves from technical careers, warns a recent report by the National Science Foundation.

The changes are further polarizing the haves and the have nots. In the jobs race, more of the poor in the inner cities are being left behind as non starters, and scattered clusters of mature blue collar workers with families and mortgages find themselves suddenly obsolete, sidelined and desperate. The problems are both occupational and geographical.

Accordingly, there is a rising chorus of debate about whether the federal government can or should intervene in this chaotic striving in ways it never has before. We have to do it, some argue, not just for the "bleeding heart" reasons but to keep up with the international Joneses.

Japan, West Germany and other successful industrialized countries have not been so slow to realize the importance of training, retraining and related manpower needs in a time of rapid technological change.

Yet, even as the administration is stressing the need for a revitalized private sector and greater U.S. productivity in a competitive world, it is cutting funds for job training and education.

It now takes 8,000 hours to become a machinist with sufficient skill to build the sophisticated computerized numerical-control tools that are becoming industrial mainstays. "That's about the same amount of time as my students require to get undergraduate degrees in economics," said Barry Bluestone, eonomics professor at Boston College and co-author of a forthcoming book, "The De-Industrialization of America."

"We need to completely rebuild the education system from kindergarten up," he said. "The opposite is happening."

In Boston, a city at the center of a thriving computer industry in the midst of the computer age, the oldest school system in America still provides only 4 percent of the students with any computer education at all. Nationwide, there are an average of only 3.2 computers for each school district.

There are pockets of innovation around the country—in California, Minnesota, the Carolinas. But generally, American education and training falls short in fitting people for a highly technical world, some specialists say.

Having already bottomed out and begun its climb back to economic vitality, Massachusetts offers a fat sampling of the tentative couplings of businesses and schools, public and private money, now being explored.

At the Humphrey Center, for instance, the curriculum is written to a great extent by the employers who, it is hoped, will hire its graduates. Some employers have also contributed hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of equipment and people.

Michael Odom is on the payroll of the Digital Equipment Corp., a Massachusetts mini-computer pioneer. However, Odom has spent his days not at Digital but at the Humphrey Center, ever since the school opened, as "an internal consultant and broker," helping the teachers figure out the best ways to "produce kids who can either get jobs or go to college."

"I guess I'm kind of a shock troop—or a sacrificial lamb," he said with a laugh. "Until a business person gets inside a school, I don't think he can understand the positive and negative pressures. . . . We're asking the schools to do an enormous number of things."

These include providing for students who speak little or no English, for handicapped or troubled children, and for the many children from one-parent homes where there are "no computers and not much enrichment of any kind." At the same time, funds are drying up for federal manpower training programs such as CETA that relieve pressure on the schools.

The Humphrey Center is unusual in focusing on the high school level, Odom said. The high-tech industry, a largely suburban culture, so far has concentrated at the university level, while high schools have had to subsist primarily on rhetoric, says Bill Spring, president of the board of directors of the Tri-lateral Council for Quality Education in Boston, a federally funded cooperative venture of school and business officials.

"You're talking about job openings for kids with skill 'X,' and right now we're still trying to get them up to a level where they can learn that skill. We're still concentrating on teaching them the basics."

"Businesses, the schools and the city are recognizing how close the connection between school and work is as they have never done before," said Catherine Stratton of the city's Private Industry Council. "The theme is clear. If we are going to hire them . . . we have to have a public commitment from the schools that we'll get graduates who can read and write."

The PIC is setting up a program in which the major employers guarantee, say, 3,500 unsubsidized jobs if the schools will guarantee that their graduates can speak, write and compute at 12th-grade level. But that is several years down the road.

Employers are willing, and increasingly able, to provide technical on-the-job training, she said. "But employers are not going to spend their money on basic employment preparation. It's not in their interest to do it. Clearly this should be the linchpin of federal policy."

Private employers spent $800,000 for manpower training in 1981, according to city officials, and are expected to increase that to perhaps $4 million this year.

There is disagreement about which approaches work best. Most specialists seem to agree that, whatever approach is taken, the private-sector contributions will not be enough to offset cutbacks in public funds, and should not be expected to supplant the government. They recommend a mix.

They also caution against relying too much on set, rote skills based on often wrong predictions about the job market.

Jim Caradonio, new head of the Humphrey Center, holds up two newspaper articles to illustrate. Published this year, six weeks apart, one proclaims a "crisis" caused by a high-tech personnel shortage, and the next gloomily describes how the recession has caused high-tech employers to "almost stop hiring."

Given the volatility of the job market, modern workers ideally should be able to transfer their abilities quickly from one setting to another. "We are not 'training' kids. We are teaching kids to think," Caradonio said. "Give them the basics, prepare them for entry-level. The companies can train them on their own machines."

But many of the displaced blue collar workers are not able to transfer their skills into the new high-technology, high-paying jobs, according to Bluestone.

In a study of 833,000 workers in mill-based New England industries since 1957, he found that by 1975 "fewer than 3 percent were employed in high-technology industries, while five times as many went into trade or service jobs. A few made the leap to high-skill jobs, but most others became downwardly mobile."

At the same time, "lower levels of education and training of Boston resident workers (especially the growing proportion of minorities) placed them at a competitive disadvantage with suburban commuters for the better jobs," according to a recent report by city officials.

The economy used to take the form of a "mountain" of manufacturing jobs with a small number of low-skill jobs at one end and a few high-skill jobs at the other, Bluestone said. "But the middle is missing now, and we have a growing gap between high-wage and low-wage jobs."

Said the Tri-lateral Council's Spring, describing what is sometimes called the McDonald's syndrome, "The old decently paid, unskilled jobs are rapidly disappearing." Not so long ago, a kid fresh out of high school could go get a job at a plant which not only paid a decent wage but offered a chance for advancement and union protection, he said. Now, the jobs available to that same kid are likely to be "low-paid, unstable and dead-end."

Even the shiny new Humphrey Center, like most such training approaches, faces formidable obstacles.

The Center sports a seamstress class, with dressmakers' dummines. Though the textile industry has suffered a long decline, there are still teachers who teach the subject, unions to represent them and a bureaucratic inertia that resists change, specialists said. The new director plans to replace the dummies with Apple micro-computers as soon as possible.

The school needs a machine shop—not the old-fashioned kind; the new numerical-control machines—but it hasn't been able to afford the costly equipment and, as in many subjects, it must first retrain the teachers before they can train the students.

The new building is referred to as a white elephant by some employment specialists in Boston because it stands empty so much of the time. The new director is fighting for enough money, he says, to keep it open evenings, and is trying to attract adult retraining classes.

In a school system where maybe half the students drop out before graduating, this school like the others has to strive to keep its enrollment up and keep the students interested.

Still, some students who had dropped out of their regular schools, or threatened to, now have been lured back to school by the glossy promise of the Humphrey Center.

Jobs programs, especially those aimed at disadvantaged populations, have a murky record of scattered successes and considerable controversy. A sentiment heard frequently from workers in the field is the lament that the programs are being eviscerated "just as we had begun to learn what works."

The training is costly, and many of the so-called beneficiaries apparently cannot be helped at any cost. But at least some can be turned into productive workers.

The Humphrey Center, 19 months old, is too young to have much of a track record in placing its graduates in jobs. Yet as Caradonio points out, "This is it for them. There's nothing else."●

ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS

S. 131

At the request of Mr. INOUYE, the name of the Senator from Alabama (Mr. HEFLIN) was added as a cosponsor of S. 131, a bill to incorporate the Pearl Harbor Survivors Association.

S. 1238

At the request of Mr. QUAYLE, the name of the Senator from Idaho (Mr. SYMMS) was added as a cosponsor of S. 1238, a bill to amend title II of the Social Security Act so as to remove the limitation upon the amount of outside income which an individual may earn while receiving benefits thereunder.

S. 1701

At the request of Mrs. HAWKINS, the name of the Senator from Delaware (Mr. BIDEN) was added as a cosponsor of S. 1701, a bill to amend title 28, United States Code, to authorize the Attorney General to acquire and exchange information to assist Federal, State, and local officials in the identification of certain deceased individuals and in the location of missing children and other specified individuals.

At the request of Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD, the name of the Senator from California (Mr. CRANSTON) was added as a cosponsor of S. 2603, a bill to amend the Trade Act of 1974 to insure fair trade opportunities, and for other purposes.

At the request of Mr. COHEN, the name of the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. ABDNOR) was added as a cosponsor of S. 2623, a bill to amend and extend the Tribally Controlled Community Assistance Act of 1978, and for other purposes.

S. 2631

At the request of Mr. KASTEN, the name of the Senator from West Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) was added as a cosponsor of S. 2631, a bill to regulate interstate commerce by providing for a uniform product liability law, and for other purposes.

S. 2674

At the request of Mr. LEVIN, the name of the Senator from Nevada (Mr. CANNON) was added as a cosponsor of S. 2674, a bill to amend title II of the Social Security Act to require a finding of medical improvement when disability benefits are terminated, to provide for a review and right to personal appearance prior to termination of disability benefits, to provide for uniform standards in determining disability, to provide continued payment of disability benefits during the appeals process, and for other purposes.

S. 2725

At the request of Mr. LEVIN, the names of the Senator from Nevada (Mr. CANNON), and the Senator from Oklahoma (Mr. BOREN) were added as cosponsors of S. 2725, a bill to provide that disability benefits under title II of the Social Security Act shall continue to be paid through the end of the administrative appeals process, and that periodic reviews of disability cases shall be carried out only to the extent that adequate time and personnel are available.

S. 2739

At the request of Mr. METZENBAUM, the name of the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. BRADLEY) was added as a cosponsor of S. 2739, a bill to amend title II of the Social Security Act to provide that termination of disability benefits shall require that a finding be made that there has been medical improvement or that the prior decision was clearly erroneous, to provide for continuation of disability benefits through the appeals process, and for other purposes.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 199

At the request of Mr. THURMOND, the name of the Senator from Alabama (Mr. DENTON) was added as a cosponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 199, a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 209

At the request of Mr. LEVIN, the names of the Senator from Michigan (Mr. RIEGLE), the Senator from Idaho (Mr. SYMMS), the Senator from Nevada (Mr. CANNON), and the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. HEINZ) were added as cosponsors of Senate Joint Resolution 209, a joint resolution designating the week beginning September 5, 1982, as "National Adult Day Care Center Week."

SENATE RESOLUTION 428

At the request of Mr. HELMS, the names of the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. EAST), and the Senator from Oklahoma (Mr. NICKLES) were added as cosponsors of Senate Resolution 428, a resolution prohibiting the extension of waiver authority under section 402 of the Trade Act of 1974 with respect to Romania.

AMENDMENT NO. 1930

At the request of Mr. MATTINGLY, the name of the Senator from Idaho (Mr. MCCLURE) was added as a cosponsor of amendment No. 1930 proposed to Senate Joint Resolution 58, a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution altering Federal fiscal decisionmaking procedures.

NOTICE OF HEARINGS

SUBCOMMITTEE ON ENERGY AND MINERAL RESOURCES

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I would like to announce for the information of the Senate and the public that the subcommittee oversight hearings regarding America's role in the world coal export market previously scheduled for August 10, 12, and 13 have been rescheduled for Tuesday, September 14; Thursday, September 16; and Friday, September 17, beginning at 9:30 a.m., in room 3110, of the Dirksen Senate Office Building.

For further information regarding these hearings you may wish to contact Mr. Roger Sindelar of the subcommittee staff, at 224-4236.

AUTHORITY FOR COMMITTEES TO MEET

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Thursday, July 29, 1982, in order to receive testimony pertaining to Senate Joint Resolution 199, a proposed constitutional amendment relating to voluntary school prayer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Foreign Relations Committee be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate at 10 a.m. on Thursday, July 29, to hold a top secret CIA briefing on threshold test ban verification negotiations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Foreign Relations Committee be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate at 11 a.m. on Thursday, July 29, to hold a consultation by State Department and ACDA officials on threshold test ban and peaceful nuclear explosions agreements.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Foreign Relations Committee be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate at 1:40 p.m. on Thursday, July 29, to hold a full committee nomination hearing to consider the nomination of Richard Ellis, for the rank of Ambassador during the term of his service as the U.S. Commissioner on the U.S.-U.S.S.R. Standing Consultative Commission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Foreign Relations Committee be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate at 2 p.m. on Thursday, July 29, to hold a full committee hearing to consider S. 2675, a bill to provide for protection of foreign counselor posts located outside the District of Columbia metropolitan area.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON INTELLIGENCE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Select Committee on Intelligence be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Thursday, July 29, at 10:30 a.m., to receive a briefing on intelligence matters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

TAX EQUITY AND FISCAL RESPONSIBILITY ACT OF 1982

● Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, for the information of my colleagues, I submit for the RECORD the Finance Committee's summary of the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982, as it finally passed the Senate.

The summary follows:

SENATE COMPLETES ACTION ON TAX EQUITY AND FISCAL RESPONSIBILITY ACT OF 1982

SUMMARY OF SPENDING REDUCTION PROVISIONS OF THE "TAX EQUITY AND FISCAL RESPONSIBILITY ACT OF 1982" AS PASSED BY THE SENATE

Medicare provisions

1. Delay Initial Eligibility Date for Medicare Entitlement

The Senate passed a provision which defers eligibility for both parts A and B of medicare until the first day of the month following the month the individual reaches age 65.

2. Modify Coverage of Working Aged

The Senate passed a provision which requires employers to offer employees aged 65 through 69 and their dependents the same health benefit plan offered to younger workers and make medicare the secondary payer to those plans for such employees and their aged spouses. Benefits would be coordinated by reducing medicare payments for any item or services furnished to an employee (or his spouse) if the combined payment under medicare and the employer's health benefits plan would otherwise exceed, for items or services reimbursed on a cost basis, their reasonable cost, or, for items or services reimbursed on a charge basis, the higher of medicare's reasonable charge or the amount allowable under the employer health benefits plan. In no case would medicare pay more than what medicare would otherwise have paid. The Senate also agreed to exempt employers of less than 20 persons from the requirements contained in this provision.

3. Require Minimal Copayments on Home Health Services Under Medicare

The Senate passed a provision which imposes a specified copayment amount (recalculated annually) for all home health visits, beginning with the 20th visit. The copayment amount (which would be uniform nationwide) is equal to 5 percent of the estimated average reasonable cost per visit.

4. Contract for Utilization and Quality Control Peer Review

The Senate passed a provision which requires the Secretary to enter into contracts with peer review organizations for an initial period of 2 years, renewable biannually, for the purpose of promoting the effective, efficient, and economical delivery of quality health care services under medicare. The organizations must be composed of, or have available to them, a substantial number of licensed doctors of medicine or osteopathy actually practicing in the area. These organizations, which can be for profit or nonprofit, would review the professional activities of physicians, other practitioners and institutional and noninstitutional providers in providing services to medicare beneficiaries.

After the date of enactment the Secretary would consolidate geographic areas served by review organizations. In general, each State would be designated as a geographic area. Local or regional areas could be designated only if the volume of review warrants it.

The provision modifies the waiver of liability provision of present law under which hospitals and other providers of services may receive payments for medically unnecessary care under certain circumstances. Under the provision, the review organization would have authority to limit applicability of a waiver of liability granted by an intermediary or carrier so that payment would be denied for services that are part of a pattern of inappropriate utilization which the provider has had an opportunity to correct but has failed to do so.

An organization, in carrying out its functions under contract, will not be considered a Federal agency for purposes of the provisions of the Freedom of Information Act.

A requirement has been included whereby the organization would make available its facilities and resources to private payors paying for health care in its area on a contract basis. The provision continues to require medicare providers to release medical records of medicare patients and requires the release of the same type of information on private patients if so authorized, to allow the review organization to carry out its functions under contract with medicare or with a private payor.

The States may choose to use these organizations or any others to review their patients. The Federal Government will provide a 75-percent match for the cost of the review of medicaid patients.

5. Reimburse Inpatient Radiology and Pathology Services at 80 Percent of Reasonable Charges

The Senate passed a provision which eliminates the special 100-percent reimbursement rate for inpatient radiology and pathology services. Medicare would pay the same rate as for other physician services, i.e., 80 percent of reasonable charges (after satisfaction of the annual deductible).

6. Increase Part B Deductible

The Senate passed a provision to increase the part B deductible to $78 in calendar year 1984 and $80 in calendar year 1985. For years subsequent to 1985, the deductible would remain at $80.

7. Provide for No Increase in Physician Fee Economic Index

The Senate passed a provision which provides for no increase in the economic index in fiscal year 1983 and permits a 5-percent increase in the index in fiscal year 1984.

8. Repeal Routine Nursing Salary Cost Differential

The Senate passed a provision which eliminates the routine nursing salary cost differential for hospitals and SNF's.

9. Impose Salary Equivalency Test for Payment of Hospital-Based Physicians

The Senate passed a provision which insures that medicare payments for physician services provided in hospitals are determined accurately and are reasonable in amount by (1) limiting the amount medicare will recognize as the reasonable cost of physician services to a provider and (2) requiring the Secretary to issue regulations specifying conditions for reasonable charge payments which deal with the differences between medical specialties, particularly radiology, anesthesiology, and pathology. The provision applies to all physician services furnished in a hospital or SNF where medicare patient charges are involved in the delivery of the physician's services.

Under the provision, each provider would be required to allocate physician compensation costs between services to the provider and services to individual patients in proportion to the respective amounts of time that are spent in performing each type of service. Only the costs for physician services allocated to the provider would be allowable in determining the providers cost reimbursement. Furthermore, the costs for physician services allocated to the provider would be subject to limits. Medicare liability would be based on the lower of the actual cost of the services to the provider or a reasonable compensation equivalent. These limits would not force physicians or providers to adopt or abandon any particular type of compensation agreement.

The Secretary would be required to establish reasonable compensation equivalent limits based on reasonable annual compensation levels for full-time equivalent practices of various physician specialties or such other bases as the Secretary approves for this purpose. If a provider is able to demonstrate to the intermediary its inability to recruit physicians at the compensation level allowable under the established limits, then the intermediary may grant an exception to the limits established under this proposal.

10. Hold the Part B Premium Constant as a Percentage of Program Costs

The Senate passed a provision which sets and maintains the part B premium paid by aged enrollees at 25 percent of program costs for fiscal years 1983, 1984, and 1985. This provision would not be in effect for premiums paid after July 1, 1985. Premiums subsequent to July 1, 1985, would be determined as they are presently under the provisions of current law.

11. Limit Medicare Reimbursement to Hospitals

a. Expansion of 223 limits to include ancillary costs

Under present law, medicare reimbursement for a hospital's inpatient routine operating costs (i.e., bed, board, and routine nursing) may not exceed 108 percent of the average routine cost per day incurred by other hospitals of the same type unless it qualifies for an exception or exemption.

The provision as passed by the Senate modifies this existing limitation, effective with hospital cost reporting periods that begin on or after October 1, 1982, by: (1) exempting small (under 50 beds) rural hospitals; (2) extending the limitation to include ancillary costs (i.e., lab services, X-rays, drugs and similar hospital services); (3) increasing the current limit from 108 percent to 110 percent; (4) applying the limitation on an average costs-per-discharge basis; and (5) adusting each hospital's limit to take into account the needs of its patients in comparison to those of other hospitals with which it is being compared (i.e., by a "case mix" adjustment). However, in no case would a hospital's reimbursable cost per discharge be reduced below their previous level.

As now, the Secretary would be given latitude in applying the limits to individual hospitals. It is anticipated that the various exemptions and adjustments that are now allowed under the routine cost limits would continue to apply where appropriate while others will be added.

The provision as passed directs the Secretary to determine the extent to which the reimbursement limit for public hospitals should be adjusted to take account of the extra costs that they necessarily incur in treating low-income patients. Such as adjustment would be made beginning with the first year the limit would be in effect and would be similar to the so-called teaching hospital adjustment, which is presently made to take account of the additional costs incurred by hospitals which engage in teaching activities.

b. Three-year limit on hospital reimbursement increases

Under present law, there is no limitation on the percentage by which a hospital's reimbursable costs may increase from year to year. The provision as passed provides that Medicare would not fully reimburse a hospital for operating costs per discharge incurred in any of the first three of its cost-reporting periods beginning on or after October 1, 1982, to the extent that they increase in excess of a specified percentage (approximately 10 percent), compounded, of the previous year's costs. For the first 2 years the proposal would be in effect, the hospital would be paid 25 percent of its costs that are in excess of the limit; no payment would be made in excess of the limit for the third year.

The specified percentage increase that would be allowed would be calculated by adding 2 percentage points to the percentage by which there was an increase in the wages and prices that hospitals must pay in order to operate. This limit on medicare reimbursement would expire at the end of the hospital's third post-September 30, 1982, reporting period, unless a prospective payment system was put into place prior to that time, in which case the limit on medicare reimbursement would cease upon implementation of the new system.

The Secretary will provide an exceptions process to account for changes in case mix, extraordinary circumstances beyond the hospital's control, or other events which would distort either the hospital's base period or the rate of cost increase during the control period.

c. Prospective payments for hospitals and skilled nursing facilities

Under present law, hospitals and skilled nursing facilities are paid on the basis of the cost they incur in caring for medicare patients. While the above-described limits in present law tend to penalize some inefficient institutions, no provision is made to allow efficient institutions to benefit. Also, the amount of a hospital's reimbursement cannot be accurately determined until sometime after the close of the cost report period in which the costs were incurred. Therefore, hospitals are restricted in their ability to do financial planning.

The provision as passed directs the Department of Health and Human Services to develop for purposes of implementation, in consultation with the Senate Finance Committee and the House Ways and Means Committee, methods under which hospitals, skilled nursing facilities, and, if feasible, other providers, would be paid on the basis of prospectively set fixed rates. The Department would be required to report its proposals within 5 months of enactment.

12. Require Certain Medicare Regulations

The Senate passed a provision which requires the Secretary to issue regulations to (1) eliminate the private room subsidy for hospitals, (2) establish a single reimbursement limit for skilled nursing facility and home health agency services, and (3) eliminate duplicate payments for outpatient services.

13. Audit and Medical Claims Review

The Senate passed a provision which requires that the medicare contracting budget for fiscal years 1983, 1984, and 1985 be supplemented by $45 million in each year to be spent specifically for audit and medical review activities. Funding for these additional activities will be allocated from medicare savings achieved in medicare under the 1983 Reconciliation Act.

14. Temporarily Delay the Periodic Interim Payment (PIP)

The Senate passed a provision which amends the PIP payment procedure for hospitals by providing that payment be withheld during September 1983 so that the lag would be increased to about 6 weeks, the average delay experienced by hospitals that use the standard method. The deferred payments would be paid to the hospitals in October 1983. There would be a similar deferral of PIP payments during September of 1984.

15. Assistants at Surgery

The Senate passed a provision which prohibits reimbursement for assistants at surgery in hospitals where a training program exists in that specialty, except under exceptional medical circumstances. Included in the exceptional circumstances would be: (1) team physicians who perform complex medical procedures (e.g., coronary bypass operations) or (2) concurrent care whereby a medical specialist also provides or is available to provide care during a surgical operation if the patient has another condition requiring care that the surgeon is unable to perform.

16. Medicare Payments to HMO's

The Senate passed a provision which modifies current law requirements for contracting with health maintenance organizations (HMO's) by authorizing prospective reimbursement under risk sharing contracts with competitive medical plans (CMP's) at a rate equal to 95 percent of the Adjusted Average Per Capita Cost (AAPCC).

Medicare payment to a CMP with a risk sharing contract would be on a per-capita basis for each class of medicare beneficiary enrolled in the plan. The classes of individuals would be based on such factors as age, sex, institutional status, disability and health status, and place of residence. The rate of each class would be 95 percent of the AAPCC for that class. If the CMP achieves savings under its prospective rate, then the plan must use the difference for provision of additional benefits or services.

The provision specifies that a CMP can only receive payment under the new prospective system if it enrolls three new medicare members for every one current medicare enrolee allowed to convert to the new payment system.

The new prospective payment system would not be effective until the first day of the thirteenth month after enactment or one month after the Secretary of HHS notifies the Senate Finance Committee and the House Committees on Ways and Means and Energy and Commerce that he is reasonably certain that the methodology for determining the prospective rate based on 95 percent of the AAPCC is developed and can be implemented, whichever is later.

17. Judicial District in Which Providers May Obtain Judicial Review

The Senate passed a provision which permits Federal judicial review of an adverse decision of the Provider Reimbursement Review Board involving actions brought jointly by several providers of medicare part A service to be taken into the district where the "principal party" for the group is located.

18. Ineffective Drug Provision

The Senate passed a provision which prohibits payments for ineffective drugs.

19. Medicare Reimbursement of Hospices

The Senate passed a provision which provides medicare reimbursement for hospice services to terminally ill medicare beneficiaries who elect to receive hospice care rather than other medical benefits. This benefit would become effective on January 1, 1984.

The provision permits medicare beneficiaries who are expected to die within 6 months to elect to receive a full range of hospice services. The services covered include those now covered as home health services plus physicians' services, short-term institutional care, respite services (to periodically relieve family members of the burden of caring for the patient), homemaker services, and outpatient prescription drugs.

A beneficiary could elect to receive hospice benefits for no more than two benefit periods, each lasting no more than 90 days. In electing hospice benefits, the beneficiary would waive entitlement to all the nonhospice benefits available under medicare except for benefits for his attending physician.

A hospice provider would be reimbursed under Part A of medicare for its covered costs subject to a ceiling equal to 40 percent of the regional medicare per capita expenditure amount that would have been spent had the patient been treated in a traditional setting.

The provision requires nominal cost sharing on certain covered services, namely outpatient drugs, home health services, and respite care. Outpatient drugs provided under a hospice program would be subject to a cost sharing amount of 10 percent per prescription or $10 per prescription, whichever is less. Home health services would be subject to a 5 percent coinsurance starting with the 20th visit. Respite care, wherever provided, would also be subject to a 5 percent copayment for each day of care. However, the total copayment amount the patient would be liable to pay for respite services could not exceed the amount of the annual inpatient hospital deductible.

The provision as passed would require a report by the Secretary of HHS prior to the implementation of the hospice benefit. In preparing the report, the Secretary is directed to examine and make legislative recommendations on the cost effectiveness of the hospice benefit; the appropriateness of the cost sharing amounts imposed on benefits; the methods for determining the 40 percent cap on reimbursement to hospice programs; the Department's ability to make such calculations and administer the 40 percent reimbursement cap; ways to assure maintenance of effort with regard to use of volunteers under hospice programs; and other issues related to satisfactory implementation of the hospice benefit.

The Secretary of Health and Human Services would also be required to report to the Congress after 2 years both on hospice reimbursement issues and methodologies and on benefit coverage recommendations based upon program experience.

20. Report on Assignment Rates

The Senate passed a provision requiring the Secretary of Health and Human Services to report to Congress by July 1, 1983 on changes in physician assignment patterns and in the physician service costs paid by beneficiaries as a result of changes in physician reimbursement under the provisions of H.R. 4961.

Medicaid Provisions

1. Allow Nominal Medicaid Copayments

The Senate passed a provision which allows States to impose nominal copayments on all Medicaid beneficiaries (both categorically and medically needy) for all services except both inpatient and ambulatory services for children and pregnant women, for services provided to inpatients in medical institutions who are required to spend, except for a personal needs allowance, all their income for medical expenses, and for emergency care.

2. Eliminate Matching Rate for Medicare Part B "Buy-In"

The Senate passed a provision which eliminates Federal matching for the monthly part B premium payments that States make for their dual eligible beneficiaries.

3. Modify Lien Provision

The Senate passed a provision which allows States to make earlier recoupment for long-term care costs. States could only take such action where the property is not longer needed by the recipient, spouse, or minor children. States would be allowed to attach the real property of medicaid recipients who are permanently institutionalized in nursing homes or other long-term care medical institutions. They could recover the cost of medical assistance provided to the recipient only when the property is no longer needed by the recipient, spouse or minor children. Disposal would not make them ineligible for supplemental security income (SSI). States could either deny eligibility to all such individuals for periods reasonably related to the uncompensated value, or could deny eligibility in all cases for a minimum of 24 months, with the option to provide for longer periods of ineligibility in the case of individuals who disposed of homes worth substantial amounts. The provision would not apply in the case of individuals who reasonably expected to be discharged from the medical institution and return home; individuals who demonstrated that they had intended to obtain fair market value or other valuable consideration in exchange for their homes; or individuals who transferred title to their homes to a spouse or a minor or handicapped child.

The State could also make an exception in other cases where undue hardship would otherwise result.

4. Reduce Error Rate Tolerance

The Senate passed a provision to require States to reduce their Medicaid error rates to 3 percent, beginning in fiscal year 1983, but delay the imposition of prospective fiscal sanctions until mid-fiscal year. The provision repeals the current statutory error rate targets and sanctions. In addition, the provision would provide to the Secretary the discretion to allow waivers from the requirements for States making a good faith effort to meet the 3 percent rate. The 6-month delay of the imposition of fiscal sanctions would be used by the Finance Committee to study the existing quality control system.

5. Continuation of Medicaid Eligibility

The Senate passed a provision to allow States the option of continuing coverage for certain working families who are made ineligible for AFDC as a result of the 1981 Reconciliation Act.

Supplemental security income (SSI)

1. Prorate First Month's Benefit Based Upon Date of Application

Under present law, the payment of SSI benefits begins with the first day of the month in which the recipient applies and meets the eligibility requirements.

The Senate passed a provision to prorate the first month's SSI benefit from the date of application or the date of eligibility, whichever is later.

2. Round SSI Eligibility and Benefit Amounts

Under present law, monthly benefit amounts and income eligibility amounts for SSI (which are adjusted annually to reflect changes in the cost-of-living) are rounded to the next higher ten cents.

The Senate passed a provision to round SSI monthly benefit and income eligibility amounts to the next lower dollar. Rounding would take place after the cost-of-living adjustment is made.

3. Coordination of SSI and OASDI Cost-of-Living Adjustment

A provision of the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1981 requires that SSI benefits be determined on the basis of a monthly retrospective accounting system. Because of a defect in drafting this legislation, the annual cost-of-living increase in SSI and OASDI benefits were not coordinated. As a result, for people who receive SSI and OASDI, the new, higher OASDI benefit paid each July will not immediately be reflected in the SSI benefit. One or two months later, the SSI benefit will fall when the new higher income is taken into account.

The Senate passed a provision coordinating the SSI and social security (OASDI) benefit increases so that at the time the cost-of-living adjustment is made, the recipient's SSI benefit is based on his or her social security payment in the same month. Also, whenever the Secretary judges there to be reliable information on the recipient's income or resources in a given month, the SSI benefit in that month would be based on that information. The Secretary would be required to prescribe by regulation the circumstances in which such information concerning a future event could be used to determine the monthly SSI benefit.

4. Phase-Out of "Hold Harmless" Protection

The Senate passed a provision continuing the phase out of "hold harmless" payments as follows: hold harmless payments would be reduced to 40 percent of what they would otherwise be in 1983, to 20 percent in 1984, with no hold harmless payments made in 1985 and future years.

5. Recovery of SSI Overpayments

Under present law, the Secretary is authorized to recover SSI overpayments by adjusting future payments, or by recovery from the recipient. Recovery of overpayments is to be made with a view to avoiding penalizing the individual who is without fault. Recovery of overpayments is not required, for example, if the individual is without fault and if recovery would defeat the purpose of the program, or be against equity or good conscience, or the amount to be recovered is so small as to impede efficient or effective administration.

The Senate passed a provision allowing recovery of SSI overpayments from benefits payable under other programs administered by the Social Security Administration (Black Lung and OASDI benefits).

6. Exclusion From Resources of Amounts Set Aside for Burial Expenses

For purposes of SSI eligibility, the Senate passed a provision to exclude from countable resources an amount an individual sets aside for providing a burial place for himself or members of his immediate family. The allowable exclusion would be subject to limits prescribed by the Secretary.

Aid to families with dependent children

1. Rounding of AFDC Eligibility and Benefit Amounts

The Senate passed a provision requiring States to round both their need standards and actual monthly benefit amounts to the lower whole dollar.

2. Prorate First Month's Benefit Based on Date of Application

The Senate passed a provision requiring that States pay benefits beginning no earlier than the date an application is filed. Payment for the month's benefit would be prorated based on the date of application.

3. Eliminate Military Service as Basis for AFDC Eligibility

The Senate passed a provision excluding absence based solely on military duty as a basis for need. However, if the parent has left the home for other reasons and is actually not supporting the family, the family may still be eligible for assistance. In this case, as provided in present law, the custodial parent would have to assign to the State any rights to child support which have accrued.

4. Refusal To Work

The Senate passed a provision requiring that individuals who voluntarily terminate their employment, reduce their hours of employment without good cause, or refuse a bona fide job offer, be denied assistance for a certain period of time. In AFDC–UP cases, the family is denied assistance. This provision covers all individuals who are required to register for work activities and those persons exempt from registration because they are remote from a project site or because they are working at least 30 hours a week. If the sanctions were applied, protective payments (or foster care payments) would be made on behalf of an eligible dependent child.

5. Mandatory Job Search

The Senate passed a provision requiring each State to include in its State plan the requirement that as a condition of eligibility, individuals required to register for employment and training will be required to participate in a program of employment search beginning at the time of application. The individual would be required to continue in a program of employment search after his application becomes effective whenever the State agency prescribes, but not more than a total of 8 weeks each year. An individual who refuses to comply with the requirement for employment search would be subject to the same penalties as an individual who refused to comply with other work requirements.

6. Eligibility of a Parent

The Senate passed a provision requiring States to end the benefit of an AFDC parent when the youngest child in the assistance unit reaches age 16. The child's benefit would continue as under current law.

7. Eligibility of a Child

The Senate passed a provision requiring the States to include all minor children in the AFDC unit and to count the income of those children (except those receiving SSI, and stepbrothers and stepsisters).

8. Counting of Income of Unrelated Individuals

The Senate passed a provision requiring States to count the income of unrelated adults (who are living in the same household) as available to the AFDC family, after setting aside certain amounts to cover the needs of the unrelated adult and any dependents.

9. Repeal Emergency Assistance Program

The Senate passed a provision repealing the Emergency Assistance program (currently a State option).

10. Prorating Shelter and Utilities for AFDC Families Which Share Households

The Senate passed a provision allowing States to adjust the AFDC benefit when the AFDC family shares a household with other individuals. States would be authorized to prorate the portion of the AFDC grant which the State designates for shelter and utilities. In States which elect this option, the State would be free to design the method of proration and the circumstances in which proration would be applied. The Secretary will prescribe broad guidelines for States which use this option.

11. Reduce Federal Match for Errors

The Senate passed a provision limiting the Federal match for erroneous benefit payments in the AFDC program to 4 percent in fiscal year 1983, and 3 percent in fiscal years 1984 and 1985. The imposition of prospective fiscal sanctions would be delayed to the second half of fiscal year 1983. In cases he determines appropriate, the Secretary of Health and Human services would have waiver authority.

The 6-month delay in imposition of prospective fiscal sanctions would be used by the Finance Committee to study the existing quality control program. Additionally, the delay would enable the Secretary to work with the States to develop procedures to accelerate the quality control computation process so that findings of error can be made on a more timely basis than is now the case.

12. Receipt of AFDC by Minor Parent

The Senate passed a provision altering AFDC eligibility for minor parents. Under the provision, in order to qualify for AFDC provision benefits, a minor parent and her child who meet all other eligibility criteria would have to reside in the home of the minor parent's own parent or guardian. Both the minor and her child would be treated as if they were the children of the minor's parent, so the income of the parent or guardian would count toward determining eligibility and benefit level. The AFDC benefit would be paid to the parent or guardian of the minor parent.

13. Retrospective Accounting Option

The Senate passed a provision allowing States the option of excluding from calculations of AFDC benefit amounts any payments made solely from State funds that are designed to compensate for lost income in the period before the new benefit amount can be calculated.

14. WIN Demonstration Authority

The Senate passed a provision reopening the option for States to operate Work Incentive (WIN) Demonstration Programs. A provision of the 1981 Reconciliation Act authorized the States, at their option, to operate 3-year work incentive demonstration programs. However, the State had to declare its intention to operate such a demonstration program within 60 days of enactment of the Reconciliation Act. The provision agreed to by the Senate reopens this option for the States for an additional 2 years. The requirements and regulations which applied to the earlier WIN Demonstration Program would apply to the extension.

Child support enforcement

1. Collection of Administrative Costs for Non-AFDC Child Support Enforcement

The Senate passed a provision repealing the provisions enacted in P.L. 97-35 which would require States, in cases involving non-AFDC families, to charge any absent parent who is obligated to pay child support through the State Child Support Enforcement Agency a fee equal to 10 percent of the child support payment. The provision restores the law in effect prior to P.L. 97-35 which allows States to charge a reasonable fee for a non-AFDC collection and retain from the amount collected an amount equal to administrative costs not covered by the fee. The provision also retains, as a State option, the authority to collect from the parent who owed child or spousal support an amount to cover administrative costs, in addition to the child support payment.

2. Allotments for Child and Spousal Support by Members of the Armed Forces

The Senate passed a provision requiring allotments from the pay and allowances of any member of the uniformed service, on active duty, when he fails to make child (or minor and spousel) support payments. The requirement would arise when the member failed to make support payments in an amount at least equivalent to the value of a 2 months' worth of support. Provisions of the Consumer Credit Protection Act would apply so that the percentage of the member's pay which could be garnished would be limited. The amount of the allotment will be that of the support payment, as established under a legally enforceable administrative or judicial order.

3. Reimbursement of State Agency

The Senate passed a provision allowing States to make certain adjustments concerning child support collected for an AFDC family. Under current law, a family can receive a double payment for the same month, first in the form of AFDC and then through later receipt of a child support collection making the family ineligible for AFDC. The provision agreed to by the Senate would eliminate the double payments by allowing the State to use the child support to reimburse itself for AFDC already paid for that month.

Unemployment compensation benefits

1. Rounding of Unemployment Benefits

The Senate passed a provision under which the Federal 50 percent matching share of extended unemployment benefits would not be available on that part of extended unemployment benefit payments which result from a failure on the part of the State to have a benefit structure in which benefits are rounded down to the next lower dollar.

SUMMARY OF REVENUE PROVISIONS OF THE "TAX EQUITY AND FISCAL RESPONSIBILITY ACT OF 1982" AS PASSED BY THE SENATE

Individual income tax provisions

Individual Minimum Tax

The bill repeals the "add-on" minimum tax for individuals and restructures the existing alternative minimum tax, effective generally for taxable years beginning after 1982.

All present law preferences under the existing add-on and alternative minimum taxes, except adjusted itemized deductions, are included in the base of the expanded alternative minimum tax. Several new preferences are added: interest and dividend income excluded under the $100 dividend exclusion, the All-Savers exclusion, or the 15-percent net interest exclusion (which takes effect after 1984) and the excess of expensing over 10-year amortization for mining exploration and development costs, research and development costs, and magazine circulation and prepublication expenditures.

To calculate minimum taxable income, preference amounts are added to adjusted gross income, and deductions are allowed for charitable contributions, medical expenses, casualty losses, home mortgage interest, other interest to the extent of investment income, and net operating losses not attributable to preferences. Under the bill, the first $30,000 of minimum taxable income ($40,000 on joint returns) is exempt from the alternative minimum tax. Minimum taxable income in excess of $30,000 but less than $50,000 ($40,000-$60,000 for couples filing joint returns) is taxed at a 10-percent rate, and the excess is taxed at a 20-percent rate.

The bill allows individuals, other than limited partners, producing oil and gas to elect to depreciate intangible drilling costs under the rules for the 5-year ACRS class with an investment credit but without safe-harbor leasing.

Medical Expense and Casualty Loss Deductions

The bill restricts the availability of the itemized deductions for medical expenses and nonbusiness casualty or theft losses, effective for taxable years beginning after 1982.

The bill provides that nonbusiness casualty losses will be deductible only to the extent total losses sustained during the year exceed 10 percent of adjusted gross income. As under present law, each casualty loss will be deductible only to the extent it exceeds $100.

The bill raises the floor for deductible medical expenses from 3 percent to 7 percent of adjusted gross income. Also, the bill reduces from $150 to $100 the ceiling on the amount of the one-half of health insurance premiums which are deductible without regard to the percentage floor.

Capital Gains Holding Period

The bill reduces the holding period distinguishing long-term from short-term capital gains and losses from 1 year to 6 months, effective for sales or exchanges after June 30, 1982.

Capital Gains Indexing

The bill generally provides for an inflation adjustment (or indexing) to the basis of certain assets for purposes of determining gain or loss on the sale or other disposition of the assets. The inflation adjustment is based on the level of the gross national product deflator in the quarter the asset is purchased compared with the index for the quarter of sale. Assets eligible for the indexing adjustment are corporate stock and real property where these assets are capital assets or assets used in a trade or business and held for more than 1 year. The inflation adjustment applies only to inflation occurring after December 31, 1984.

Under the bill, the inflation adjustment applies with respect to sales, exchanges, or other dispositions of property whether or not gain or loss is recognized. However, it does not apply for purposes of determining any deduction for depreciation, cost depletion, or amortization.

Business tax provisions

Corporate Tax Preferences

The bill reduces the following corporate tax preferences by 15 percent: percentage depletion for coal and iron ore, excess bad debt reserves, interest on debt used to carry tax-exempt securities acquired after 1982, deferred DISC income, section 1250 recapture on structures, rapid amortization of pollution control facilities, intangible drilling costs of integrated oil companies, and mineral exploration and development costs.

Under the bill, integrated oil producers are allowed to expense up to 85 percent of intangible drilling costs. The remainder will be written off under the ACRS 5-year recovery percentages with an investment credit but without safe-harbor leasing. (Fifteen percent of mineral exploration and development costs will be recovered under these ACRS rules as well.)

To prevent preferences from being cut back excessively through the interaction of this provision and the add-on minimum tax, the bill provides that only 71.6 percent of these tax preferences are to be included in the base of the add-on minimum tax for corporations.

These provisions apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1982, except that the change in percentage depletion applies after 1983, the change in section 1250 applies to sales or other dispositions after December 31, 1982, the change in amortization of pollution control facilities applies to property placed in service after December 31, 1982, and the change in intangible drilling costs applies to expenditures after December 31, 1982, and the change in the add-on minimum tax applies to taxable years ending after December 31, 1982.

Investment Tax Credit

The bill provides that taxpayers must reduce the basis of assets by one-half of the amount of regular, historic rehabilitation, and energy investment tax credits for the assets. This lower basis will be used, for example, to compute cost recovery deductions and gain or loss when the asset is sold or exchanged. The basis adjustment applies to property placed in service after December 31, 1982, except in the case of new equipment (other than public utility property) placed in service before July 1, 1984, for which there was a contract entered into after August 13, 1981, which was binding on July 1, 1982, and all times thereafter.

To limit on the amount of income tax liability which may be offset by the investment tax credit for both individuals and corporations is reduced from 90 percent to 85 percent, effective for taxable years beginning after December 31, 1982.

1985 and 1986 ACRS Changes

The bill eliminates the 1985 and 1986 further acceleration of depreciation which had been scheduled for property placed in service after 1984.

Construction Period Interest and Taxes

The bill requires corporations to capitalize and amortize over 10 years interest and real property taxes paid or accrued on nonresidential real property, the construction of which begins after 1982. The bill exempts the Alaska gas pipeline from this rule, and provides a special rule for certain hotels and motels, the construction of which begins before 1984.

Safe-harbor Leasing

The bill substantially modifies the safe-harbor leasing rules.

A 50-percent limitation is imposed on the percentage of tax liability that a lessor may avoid through the use of safe-harbor leasing, and lessors are not permitted to carry back tax benefits obtained as safe-harbor lessors to prior tax years.

The bill lowers the maximum interest rate on obligations of the lessor to the lessee in a safe-harbor sale-leaseback to 5 percentage points less than the interest rate on overpayments and underpayments of tax or 8 percent, whichever is greater.

The maximum lease term is reduced to 100 percent of the ADR midpoint life of the asset.

The maximum percentage of eligible property (including property used by the taxpayer subject to certain types of leases) that may be leased by any lessee in a safe-harbor lease is set at 45 percent in 1982 and 1983 and 40 percent in 1984 and 1985.

Property leased under the safe-harbor rules is depreciated under the cost recovery methods and periods provided for the minimum tax.

The bill provides that the investment tax credits earned on leased property are allowable over 3 years—50 percent the first year and 25 percent in each of the next 2 years.

The bill prohibits the use of leasing to increase foreign tax credits and percentage depletion and prohibits safe-harbor leasing between related parties.

The bill provides that safe-harbor leasing is not available for public utility property.

Under the bill, certain tax-exempt entities are not permitted to structure transactions to benefit from leasing.

The at-risk rules will not prevent certain closely held corporations from acting as safe-harbor lessors.

Starting January 1, 1985, all leases will be permitted to include a fixed price purchase option at the end of the lease term of at least 10 percent of the original cost. Such options will be permitted after July 1, 1982, for leases of up to $150,000 of farm implements.

Mass transit leasing is permitted for property placed in service on or before December 31, 1987, if the property is purchased under certain binding contracts or commitments entered into on or before March 31, 1983.

So-called "investment tax credit strips" entered into before October 20, 1981, are permitted.

The bill prevents the Internal Revenue Service from retroactively denying lease treatment under rules in effect prior to safe-harbor leasing for motor vehicle operating leases involving business users by reason of the fact the lease contained a terminal rental adjustment clause. However, Treasury is not to be prevented from issuing regulations on a prospective basis that preclude lease treatment for such leases. The provision applies on a retroactive basis to any open taxable year.

The bill repeals safe-harbor leasing for property placed in service after September 30, 1985.

These rules are generally effective for leases entered into or property placed in service after July 1, 1982, except for certain anti-abuse rules, which are generally effective after February 19, 1982. The bill does not alter lease treatment for certain auto manufacturing equipment placed in service before July 1, 1982, and leased prior to August 15, 1982. In addition, the bill does not alter the lease treatment for property placed in service before January 1, 1983, if after June 25, 1981, and before February 20, 1982, the lessee has (1) commenced construction or acquired the property or (2) entered into a binding contract for the property. For papermaking plants, a March 31 date is substituted for the June 25 date in that transitional rule. Aircraft qualifies for the transitional rule if it is placed in service before January 1, 1984, and if after June 25, 1981, and before February 20, 1982, construction of a subassembly was commenced or the stub wing joiner occurred.

Foreign Oil and Gas Income

The bill repeals the country-by-country loss feature of the rule for the foreign tax credit limitation affecting oil and gas extraction income. Oil companies thus will not be permitted to use credits or losses arising out of their foreign oil and gas extraction activities to shelter other income from U.S. tax.

The bill expands the present anti-tax haven rules (subpart F) so that controlled foreign corporations generally will be subject to tax currently on their foreign nonextraction oil income related to activities carried on in countries other than those where the oil and gas is extracted or consumed. U.S. tax on foreign shipping income will continue to be deferred to the extent the income is reinvested in shipping assets.

The provisions generally apply for taxable years beginning after 1982.

Possessions Credit Limitation

The bill makes several changes in the present tax credit for income earned in U.S. possessions. It provides that income of a corporation that qualifies for the possessions credit does not include income allocable to intangibles. Such income will be allocated to the U.S. affiliates of a qualifying corporation or to the qualifying corporation itself as noncreditable U.S. source income. In addition, the current rule that permits a qualifying corporation to earn up to 50 percent passive income is changed to permit only 10 percent passive income. Similar rules are provided for U.S. corporations effectively exempt from tax because they are inhabitants of the Virgin Islands. The provisions are effective for taxable years beginning after 1982.

Industrial Development and Mortgage Subsidy Bonds

The bill imposes a number of restrictions on the use of tax-exempt bonds for private activities. Reporting is required for all post-1982 private-activities bonds. Also, public hearing and approval by an elected official or legislature is required for all post-1982 industrial development bonds (IDB's).

The cost of IDB-financed property placed in service after December 31, 1982 (except for property financed by bonds issued before July 1, 1982, or certain rollovers of such bonds, or property which is part of a facility under construction by July 1, 1982, or for which a binding contract existed as of that date), generally will be required to be recovered under the straight-line depreciation method over present law regular ACRS lives. Exceptions are provided for low-income housing, for municipal solid waste facilities, for new pollution control equipment to be used in connection with a plant in operation on or before July 1, 1982, and for facilities with respect to which certain UDAG grants are made. Bonds are not permitted under the $1 million small issue limit as part of an issue which includes bonds which are tax-exempt under other provisions. Certain composite issues are permitted. Certain research and development expenditures are not treated as capital expenditures for purposes of the $10 million capital expenditure limit on small issue IDB's. Small issue IDB's cannot be issued after September 30, 1987.

The bill allows tax-exempt IDB's for local district heating or cooling facilities which use water or steam and for facilities that provide gas to a service area comprised of no more than a city and one contiguous county or two contiguous counties. Also, the bill allows tax-exempt financing for the acquisition of existing pollution control facilities by a regional pollution control authority if the acquisition is on an arms-length basis. A small issue IDB cannot be used for certain facilities, such as auto sales and service facilities, racket sports facilities, suntan facilities, hot tub facilities, and massage parlors.

The bill makes the following changes to the restrictions on the use of tax-exempt bonds for single-family housing imposed by the Mortgage Subsidy Bond Tax Act of 1980: (1) the arbitrage limitations are increased from 1.0 percentage points to 1 1/16 to 1 1/8 percentage points depending upon the size of the bond issue, (2) distributions of arbitrage on nonmortgage investments are not required to the extent that they require recognition of a loss in excess of undistributed arbitrage on nonmortgage investments at such time, (3) the 3-year rule is applied to 80 percent of the bond proceeds, and (4) the purchase price limitations are increased from 90 percent of area average purchase price (110 percent in targeted areas) to 110 percent (120 percent in targeted areas).

Mergers and Acquisitions

The bill modifies the treatment of partial liquidations. Present law rules applicable to distributions of appreciated assets in a partial liquidation permit a step-up in the basis of such assets without the tax consequences normally incident to a disposition of property. Capital gain treatment is retained for noncorporate shareholders who receive property in a partial liquidation and nonrecognition of gain to the distributing corporation is retained for such distributions to certain long-term noncorporate shareholders with at least a 10-percent interest. Distributions to corporate shareholders will generally receive dividend treatment.

The bill also repeals certain exceptions from the general rule that gain is recognized when appreciated property is used to redeem the stock of a distributing corporation. One such exception applicable to the distribution of stock in a subsidiary is modified so as to apply only if the distribution is to long-term, noncorporate, 10-percent shareholders and would have qualified as a partial liquidation if the subsidiary's assets had been distributed in lieu of stock.

The bill replaces the present law rules for treating the acquisition of a controlled corporation as an asset acquisition with a new elective provision no longer requiring a liquidation. Within 75 days after a purchase of 80 percent or more of the stock of an acquired corporation, a corporate purchaser may elect to treat the acquired corporation as if it had sold all of its assets in a complete liquidation on the date of the stock purchase. The acquired corporation's tax attributes will be terminated, and the basis of its assets will be adjusted, as of the stock acquisition date, to reflect the price paid for its stock.

The bill requires consistent treatment where an acquiring corporation or affiliated group of corporations acquires stock in two or more corporations that are members of the same affiliated group. If a purchase of assets (other than in the ordinary course of business) is made from a corporation, the bill treats an acquisition of stock of the same corporation or of a member of the same affiliated group as a purchase of assets. Regulations are authorized to prevent the circumvention of this requirement of consistent treatment through the use of other provisions of a law or regulations.

Generally, the provisions relating to mergers and acquisitions apply to property distributions after August 31, 1982, and acquisitions of target corporations after August 31, 1982. However, if a target corporation was purchased at any time during 1982, the new asset acquisition election may be made to avoid the present law requirement of an actual liquidation. Transitional rules are also provided to afford relief from the modification of the treatment of partial liquidations for transactions currently in progress.

Completed Contract Method of Accounting

The bill instructs the Treasury Department to amend its regulations relating to the methods of accounting for long-term contracts, the use of which permits significant tax deferral on income from such contracts. The amended regulations will address certain problems relating to the determination of when a contract is considered completed and the determination of whether contracts should be treated as one or several contracts.

The amended regulations also will require that taxpayers generally must allocate additional costs to extended period long-term contracts, i.e., contracts with an estimated completion date of more than 2 years. However, a taxpayer engaged in an extended period long-term contract for the construction of improvements to real property or the installation of integral components thereof will not be subject to the new cost allocation rules if either the construction contract is expected to be completed within 3 years or less, or the taxpayer's average annual gross receipts are $25 million or less for the preceding taxable years.

The new termination, segregation, and aggregation rules generally apply to taxable years ending after December 31, 1982. A special rule is provided for the application of the new contract termination rules to existing contracts. Another special rule is provided for the application of the new severance and aggregation rules to existing contracts. The cost allocation rules will apply to contracts entered into after December 31, 1982. During a transition period, a portion of the costs that will be required to be allocated to extended period long-term contracts by reason of the amended regulations will continue to be currently deductible. The portion of costs that will continue to be currently deductible is as follows:

1983	66⅔
1984	33⅓
1985 and thereafter	0

[1] The percentage of costs that continue to be currently deductible.

Dividend Reinvestment Plans for Utilities

The bill repeals the exclusion for dividends reinvested in public utility stock, effective for distributions made after 1982.

Modified Treatment of Original Issue Discount Bonds and Stripped Coupon Bonds

The bill replaces the present linear formula for amortization of original issue discounts with a formula which approximates the way in which interest accrues under borrowing with ordinary bonds. Also, the rules that govern amortization of original issue discount on bonds issued by corporations will be extended to certain noncorporate bonds. The bill provides that taxpayers who strip coupons from bonds will allocate basis between the coupons and the corpus of the bonds (i.e., the right to receive the principal amount of the bond at maturity) with the result that no artificial loss may be created through sale of the detached corpus. The retained portion of the stripped corpus or coupons will be treated as an original issue discount bond, requiring periodic inclusion of discount income. Purchasers of stripped corpus or coupons also will be treated as having purchased OID bonds. The effective dates for these proposals are those announced in the relevant Treasury Department news releases issued on May 3, 1982 and June 9, 1982.

Acceleration of Corporate Income Tax Payments

The bill accelerates the collection of corporate estimated income taxes by (1) increasing the amount of estimated tax payments needed to avoid the estimated tax penalty from 80 percent to 90 percent of the actual tax due, (2) requiring that all remaining tax owed be fully paid on the return due date, and (3) requiring large corporations (those with $1 million or more of taxable income in any one of the three preceding years) which base their estimated tax payments on the prior year's income or tax liability, to pay at least 90 percent of their current year's tax liability in 1984 and thereafter. In addition, the penalty on underpayments of estimated tax will be one-half the full rate for underpayments on the portion of the underpayment between 80 and 90 percent of the actual tax due.

Business Meals

Any deduction otherwise allowable for business meals and beverages (unless connected with business-related travel away from home) is limited to 50 percent of expenses, effective for taxable years beginning after 1982.

Soil and Water Conservation Expenditures

The bill extends the investment tax credit to soil and water conservation expenditures which the taxpayer does not elect to expense, effective for expenditures after 1982.

Compliance provisions

Withholding on Interest and Dividends

The bill requires withholding at a flat rate of 10 percent on payments of interest, dividends and certain patronage dividends. Payments to certain tax-exempt institutions, corporations, certain low-income and elderly individuals, interest payments made by individuals and interest payments of $100 or less on an annualized basis are generally exempt. An individual is entitled to withholding exemption if his or her prior year tax liability was $600 or less ($1,000 on a joint return). For the elderly (age 65 and over), the prior year tax liability exemption is $1,500 or less ($2,500 on a joint return). Exemption may be claimed by providing an exemption certificate to the payor.

The bill provides the Treasury Department with authority to set the frequency of deposits of taxes withheld on interest income and to exempt banks and similar depository institutions until it determines that they can comply with withholding.

These provisons are generally effective for payments made after 1982.

Taxpayer Compliance Improvements

The bill contains a series of provisions designed to encourage complete and accurate reporting of income and deductions. These include provisions improving information reporting, increasing penalties for noncompliance, amending the methods under which interest on tax deficiencies and overpayments is computed, substantially revising the withholding rules for pension distributions, encouraging reporting on foreign transactions, and revising certain rules governing information gathering by the Internal Revenue Service. (The bill does not change the present reporting requirements for tip income.) These compliance provisions have various effective dates.

The bill includes a sense of the Congress resolution that additional funds should be appropriated to the Internal Revenue Service to provide the staff proposed by the Administration and additional staff over that requested by the Administration's 1983 Budget sufficient to collect at least $1 billion in fiscal year 1984 and $2 billion in fiscal year 1985 over the amount which would be collected in the absence of such increased staff. In particular, the bill imposes a 10-percent penalty on substantial understatements for which the taxpayer does not rely on substantial authority and does not disclose the relevant facts of the item giving rise to the underpayment.

Pension provisions

The bill makes several changes affecting the overall limits on contributions and benefits under tax-qualified pension plans.

The bill (1) reduces the maximum annual addition for profit-sharing and other defined contribution plans (other than H.R. 10 plans) from $45,475 to $30,000; (2) reduces the maximum annual retirement benefit under a defined benefit pension plan from $136,425 to $90,000; (3) increases the maximum deductible contribution limit for defined contribution H.R. 10 plans from $15,000 in 1982 to $20,000 in 1983, $25,000 in 1984, and $30,000 in 1985; (4) provides adjustments for post-1984 inflation beginning in 1986, for the limits on all plans (including corporate and H.R. 10 plans) based upon the social security benefit index formula then in effect; (5) increases the age below which actuarial reductions are required in the maximum benefit limit for defined benefit plans from 55 to 62; (6) reduces the overall limit where both a defined contribution and a defined benefit plan are provided from 1.4 to 1.25 with respect to the dollar limits only; and (7) generally places a $10,000 limit on outstanding loan balances of plan participants under all qualified plans and requires reporting to the Internal Revenue Service by plans with respect to participant loans. (A higher limit is provided for certain loans used to acquire, construct or rehabilitate residential real property.) The bill does not affect benefits already earned under a plan or loans already made.

The bill permits an employer to provide additional contributions on behalf of disabled participants (other than officers, shareholders, or highly compensated individuals), based upon their pre-disability compensation. These participants are immediately vested in their accrued benefit derived from those additional contributions.

Under the bill, participants in certain defined benefit State judicial plans will not be subject to the rule requiring participants in an ineligible deferred compensation plan to include plan benefits in gross income merely because there is no substantial risk that the benefits will be forfeited.

The bill permits churches to provide certain retirement savings arrangements to their employees, subject to revised limitations.

The bill also permits a trust which is a part of a governmental plan to participate in a group trust without regard to whether the governmental plan is a tax-qualified pension plan.

Life insurance and annuity provisions

Modified Coinsurance

The bill repeals the modified coinsurance ("Modco") rules in section 820; treats existing Modco agreements as terminated on January 1, 1982, but allows a three-year installment payment of the tax increase from termination treatment of existing agreements for certain reinsurers; provides related party allocation authority for Treasury for future conventional reinsurance agreements; prevents tax avoidance by disallowing an interest deduction with respect to conventional reinsurance funded by a debt obligation; and grandfathers prior Modco transactions except in the event of fraud.

Policyholder Dividends

The bill raises the present $250,000 special deductions limit to $1 million, imposes an affiliated group limit, and targets the provision to smaller companies. The bill also allows a 100-percent deduction for policyholder dividends and interest for qualified pension business.

Under the bill, mutual life insurance companies are allowed to deduct a minimum of 77½ percent of policyholder dividends on non-qualified business. Stock life insurance companies are allowed a minimum policyholder dividend and interest deduction of 85 percent of amounts paid or credited on non-qualified business.

Menge Formula

A geometric "Menge" formula is provided to compute adjusted life insurance reserves for purposes of allocating investment yield to policyholders.

Consolidated Returns

A "bottom-line" method of consolidation is allowed for determining consolidated life insurance company taxable income.

Reserves and Contract Liabilities

The bill revises the approximate revaluation formula for preliminary term reserves by reducing the revaluation from $21 to $19 per $1,000 of other than term insurance in force, for business written after March 31, 1982.

No reserve deductions are allowed for interest guaranteed beyond the close of a taxable year.

Beginning July 1, 1983, the amount taken into account as the policy or contract liability for a group pension contract, for purposes of determining the excludable policyholder share of investment yield, is limited to the amount of interest actually credited to the policyholder. This will eliminate the so-called "double-dip" available under present law with respect to these contracts. Also, for any taxable year ending before January 1, 1985, the Internal Revenue Service will be precluded from denying life insurance company status to a company for cases when disqualification might result from the Service's treatment of pension reserves for contracts without a permanent annuity purchase rate guarantee as not being life insurance reserves.

Grandfather Rules

Tax treatment for modified coinsurance transactions with a section 820 election for periods prior to January 1, 1982 is grandfathered except in cases of fraud. Excess interest credited to policyholders for years prior to 1982 is fully deductible. Similarly, treatment claimed with respect to consolidation of two or more life insurance companies is grandfathered for years prior to 1982. For taxable years beginning before 1982, amounts that could have been charged as a premium or mortality charge, but were not, will not be included in premium income.

Deferred Annuities

The tax treatment of recipients of annuities is modified. Withdrawals are deemed to be taxable to the extent income from investment had been earned. A rule for treating loans as distributions and a 10-percent penalty for withdrawals prior to age 59½ or within 10 years of contribution, whichever period is shorter, are added. The penalty will not apply if annuity payments are received over a period of not less than 60 months. A 100-percent interest deduction is allowed to insurance companies for amounts credited to deferred annuity business (limited to 92½ percent in the case of participating contracts).

Flexible Premium Policies

The bill prescribes guidelines for eligibility of the proceeds from "universal life" products for the income tax death benefit exclusion and, except for grandfather protection for prior periods, does not prescribe tax treatment of excess interest (leaving the issue open for litigation during the effective period as to characterization as fully deductible interest paid, or as a policyholder dividend deductible to the extent allowed under the percentage limitation safety net).

Stop-gap Termination Date

All of the above provisions terminate after 1984 (a three-year stop-gap period) except for (1) the treatment of modified coinsurance and related transactions, (2) the tax treatment of amounts received under an annuity contract and the deductibility of excess interest credited on deferred annuities, and (3) the "grandfather" rules.

Employment tax provisions

Independent Contractors

The bill establishes a safe-harbor test that, if satisfied, results in classification of an individual as an independent contractor for Federal employment tax purposes (other than under the Railroad Retirement Tax Act). If all five requirements of the test are met with respect to service performed by an individual, then that service is treated as performed by an individual who is not an employee, and the service-recipient (i.e., the person for whom services are performed) is not treated as an employer with respect to that service. The safe-harbor requirements relate to (1) control of hours worked, (2) place of business, (3) investment or income fluctuation, (4) written contract and notice of tax responsibilities, and (5) the filing of required returns. The failure of a worker to satisfy the safe-harbor test will not affect his or her classification under the common law rules.

The bill also provides for reduction of certain employment tax liabilities in situations involving the reclassification of workers as employees and provides for Tax Court jurisdiction over employment tax reclassification disputes.

Federal Unemployment Tax (FUTA)

Effective January 1, 1983, the FUTA wage base is increased to $7,000, and the Federal tax rate is increased to 3.5 percent. Effective January 1, 1985, the tax rate is increased to 6.2 percent (a permanent tax of 6.0 percent and an extended benefit tax of 0.2 percent), and the credit which employers receive against the tax is increased to 5.4 percent. The progressive reduction of the FUTA credit applicable to States in default is retained as under current law.

Extension of Social Security Hospital Insurance Taxes and Medicare Coverage to Federal Employees

Under the bill, Federal employees will be subject to the FICA hospital insurance tax. (The tax is imposed at the rate of 1.3 percent of wages received during 1982–1984, 1.35 percent of wages received during 1985, and 1.45 percent of wages received after December 31, 1985.) Federal employees will receive Medicare coverage after paying hospital insurance taxes for the required period of time.

Excise tax provisions

Airport and Airway Measures

Under present law, no tax revenues are being transferred to the Airport and Airway Trust Fund. Under the bill, the following aviation excise taxes are designated for the Trust Fund: (1) an 8-percent passenger ticket tax (increased from the present 5-percent rate); (2) a 12-cents-per-gallon tax on noncommercial aviation gasoline (increased from the present 4-cent rate); (3) a 14-cents-per-gallon tax on nongasoline fuels for noncommercial aviation (no tax under present law); (4) a 5-percent air freight waybill tax (no tax under present law); (5) a $3 per person international departure ticket tax (no tax under present law); and (6) amounts equal to revenues from the present taxes on aircraft tires and tubes. (Certain helicopters engaged in natural resources and timber operations not using Federal aid or Federal facilities will be exempt from the fuel taxes and the air passenger ticket tax.) The tax changes apply to tickets and fuels purchased after August 31, 1982.

In addition, the bill includes a separate provision regarding the Airport and Airway System Development Act which would: (1) authorize appropriations for certain capital improvements to airports; (2) authorize certain expenditures for Federal Aviation Administration program; (3) establish a state block grant program; (4) require the Secretary of Transportation to study an airport defederalization program; and (5) permit airports to voluntarily withdraw from the Federal airport improvement program. The bill provides Trust fund program authorizations for fiscal years 1982–1987.

Telephone Excise Tax

The bill increases the telephone excise tax to 2 percent in 1983, 3 percent in 1984, 3 percent in 1985, and 2 percent for years after 1985.

Cigarette Excise Tax

The bill increases the present Federal excise tax on small cigarettes from $4 to $8 per thousand (from 8 to 16 cents per package) for the period January 1, 1983 to September 30, 1985. The tax on large cigarettes is increased from $8.40 to $16.80 per thousand.

Expansion of Dingell-Johnston Fund Taxes

The bill expands the articles of fishing equipment which are subject to the 10-percent manufacturers excise tax and imposes a 3-percent excise tax on recreational fishing boats and boating equipment, with the revenues to be available for expansion of the Dingell-Johnston Fund program. The provision also extends the time for payment of the excise tax on fishing equipment.

Repeal of TAPS Adjustment for Crude Oil Windfall Profit Tax

Oil produced at Prudhoe Bay in Alaska would be treated like other oil under the windfall profit tax by repealing the special Trans-Alaska Pipeline System (TAPS) adjustment presently applicable to that oil, effective for oil removed after 1982.

National Research Service Awards

The bill extends for two additional years (to awards made through 1983) the income tax exclusion for National Research Service Awards.

Annual Accrual Accounting for Certain Joint Ventures

Under the bill, a "qualified" partnership (a partnership composed entirely of corporations other than subchapter S corporations or personal holding companies engaged in the business of sugar cane farming) will be treated the same as a corporation for purposes of the annual accrual accounting method rules. Thus, a corporation that is allowed to use the annual accrual accounting method for the business of growing sugar cane could transfer substantially all of the assets of the business to a qualified partnership in exchange for an interest in the partnership, and the qualified partnership will be allowed to use the annual accrual method to compute the taxable income from the transferred business.

Targeted Jobs Tax Credit

The targeted jobs tax credit is extended for three years. The credit is made available with respect to any member of a targeted group who begins work on or before December 31, 1985.

In addition, the jobs credit is modified to encourage summer youth employment. Employers will receive a credit for hiring economically disadvantaged youths who are 16 or 17 years of age for any 90-day period between May 1 and September 15. Employees can qualify only one time for this credit with respect to a particular employer, and the credit will be 85 percent of up to $3,000 of wages paid.

Cooperative education students will be eligible for certification regardless of whether they are economically disadvantaged, but the credit for the group will be limited to 30 percent of the first $3,000 of wages paid in the first year of employment and 15 percent of the first $3,000 of wages paid in the second year of employment.

Coverage of general assistance recipients under the program will be amended to indicate that recipients of non-cash, as well as cash, assistance will be eligible for certification.

The extension of the jobs credit will take effect on January 1, 1983. The credit for summer youth employment and the change affecting coverage of general assistance recipients takes effect July 1, 1982, and the change with respect to cooperative education students is effective after August 31, 1982.

Foreign Corrupt Practices Act

An otherwise allowable business expense deduction is not disallowed for any payment to foreign officials or agents of a foreign government as long as the payment is legal under the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, regardless of whether such payment would be illegal under other U.S. laws if those laws applied.

Debt Management Provisions

The authority given to the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds paying interest rates above the statutory ceiling of 4¼ percent is increased by $40 billion, from $70 billion to $110 billion. This change applies to bonds with maturities, when issued, that are longer than 10 years.

The statutory limitations on interest rates payable on savings bonds issued by the Treasury Department is repealed. This action will allow the issuance of savings bonds bearing interest rates related to market-determined rates paid on bonds of comparable character and maturity.

Study of Alternative Tax Systems

The bill instructs the Secretary of the Treasury to conduct a study within 6 months covering the advisability of developing an alternative tax system that would reduce the complexity of the present income tax system and improve the efficiency and equity of the tax system. Alternative tax systems that should be evaluated include a simplified income tax based on gross income, a consumption-based tax structure, and broadening of the current income tax base combined with lowering of current tax rates.

Study of Monetary Policy

The bill requires the Administration to prepare a study in which it analyzes the effects on capital markets of a measurement of the growth of debt as the long-term target of monetary policy, and a measurement of total liquid assets as an interim target of monetary policy, instead of measuring the growth of the money supply.

New Jersey General Revenue Sharing Allocation

The New Jersey Franchise and Gross Receipts Tax will be deemed an adjusted tax of units of local government within New Jersey for the quarterly payment period for the quarter beginning October 1, 1982. This change will remain in effect for future quarterly payment periods provided that the State of New Jersey amends the Franchise and Gross Receipts Tax no later than January 1, 1983, to provide for the collection and retention of the tax by units of local government for years beginning January 1, 1983.

Relief for the Jefferson County Mental Health Center

The bill authorizes the payment of $50,000 to the Jefferson County Mental Health Center, Lakewood, Colorado, in full settlemant of its claims against the United States for repayment of the $74,128 the Center refunded to its employees for individual social security contributions after the Internal Revenue Service erroneously advised the Center that the contributions had been incorrectly withheld.

Disclosure of Tax Returns and Return Information for Nontax Criminal Investigation Purposes

The bill facilitates the disclosure of tax returns and return information for nontax criminal investigation purposes. The bill also expands the access of the General Accounting Office to tax returns and return information.

Alaska Native Claims Settlement Corporations

The bill amends the windfall profit tax provisions to clarify that wholly owned subsidiaries of native Indian corporations formed under the Alaskan Native Claims Settlement Act are exempt from the windfall profit tax.

Veterans Organizations

The bill extends tax-exempt status to veterans organizations at least 75 percent of whose membership consists of past or present members of the Armed Forces of the United States (whether or not war veterans) and whose remaining membership consists substantially of cadets or spouses, widows, or widowers of past or present members of the U.S. Armed Forces or of cadets.

Amateur Athletic Organizations

The bill allows tax-exempt status to amateur athletic organizations that conduct national or international competition in Olympic sports, or support and develop amateur athletes for such competition. Such organizations may be eligible for exemption whether or not they provide facilities to members, and whether their membership is local or regional in nature.

Applicability of Certain Private Foundation Rules

The bill provides that the Otto Bremer Foundation, the El Pomar Foundation, the Houston Endowment, the Public Welfare Foundation, and the Sand Springs Home may retain certain business interests (if the foundation held such interests on May 26, 1969 and meets certain other conditions) without regard to the private foundation divestiture requirements of present law which otherwise would require divestiture of part of such interests by May 26, 1989. The bill allows the Ahmanson Foundation an additional 5 years to meet a private foundation divestiture requirement with respect to certain stock held on May 26, 1969. The bill provides that the New London Day Trust is not subject to the private foundation requirements which apply to charitable trusts, effective for taxable years beginning after November 20, 1978.

Certain Income of Religious Orders From PHS Leprosarium

The bill provides that income derived from services of certain members of religious orders from salaries from the Public Health Service in a leprosarium will be income of the religious organization rather than income of the member.

FCC Policy Toward VHF Stations

The bill contains an amendment to the Communications Act of 1934 stating that it should be the policy of the Federal Communications Commission to allocate channels for very high frequency television broadcasting in a manner which ensures that not less than one such channel shall be allocated to each State if technically feasible.●

RETREAT ON ARMS CONTROL

● Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, the Reagan administration has announced ambitious goals for nuclear arms control, but it remains stubbornly reluctant to accept the measures—already negotiated and signed with the Soviet Union—which would provide immediate restraints on the nuclear arms race and prompt benefits for U.S national security. It is risky and unwise, in my judgment, to neglect the solid foundations already built when seeking to construct overarching agreements.

Driven by his own campaign rhetoric, the President has pronounced the SALT II treaty "fatally flawed" and has even refused to challenge the Russians about possible violations of that still-unratified agreement. Nevertheless, he has pledged not to "undercut" the treaty's provisions so long as the Soviet Union does likewise. This formula guarantees maximum uncertainty about the durability and effectiveness of SALT II's limits. We are now in the position of trying to negotiate substantial cuts and radical changes in the superpowers' strategic forces without an agreed consensus on the starting point, the basic definitions of terms, or the units of account.

The Russians have good reasons to doubt the seriousness of the United States to reach and implement an agreement, for the United States has failed to ratify any of the three major nuclear arms control treaties signed in the past 8 years. This disappointing record has been made worse by the President's decision last week to reopen negotiations on two of those agreements and to postpone indefinitely talks on a comprehensive nuclear test ban treaty, which had achieved remarkable progress by the end of 1980.

According to anonymous White House officials, the administration will seek "improved verification procedures" in the 1974 Threshold Test Ban (TTB) and the 1976 Peaceful Nuclear Explosions (PNE) Treaties. The former would forbid underground tests in excess of 150 kilotons (kt) of explosive yield; the latter would prevent allegedly peaceful nuclear explosions from being used for military purposes and would permit verification by onsite inspections, a long-sought U.S. goal. The anonymous briefers did not indicate what changes would be sought, or what deficiencies had developed in U.S. verification capabilities.

When the Senate Foreign Relations Committee considered these treaties in 1977, there was substantial agreement that Soviet compliance could be adequately monitored. Dr. Jack Ingley, then chief of the Nuclear Energy Division at the CIA testified unequivocally that "the Threshold Test Ban Treaty covers only 150 kt and above, where detection and identification is no problem." Data exchanges at the time of ratification would provide detailed geological information about underground test sites which would reduce the range of uncertainty that currently troubles our intelligence community.

The Nixon and Ford treaties were sidetracked in the Carter administration in order to pursue a comprehensive test ban (CTB), which would put more significant brakes on nuclear weapons development, would be easier to verify, and would strengthen our leverage in efforts to halt the proliferation of nuclear weapons to other countries. By the end of 1980, CTB negotiations among the United States, Soviet Union, and United Kingdom had made surprising progress, including joint agreement on a moratorium on even peaceful nuclear tests and on far-reaching verification measures such as onsite seismic monitoring devices and onsite inspections.

Mr. President, perhaps we were wrong to defer action on the TTB and PNE Treaties while we sought a comprehensive test ban. Too often in arms control negotiations, the best has been the enemy of the good, and we have failed to take modest steps to improve our security because of a wish to make giant strides. Nevertheless, the administration's latest decisions to reopen issues on the partial measures and to postpone indefinitely CTB negotiations constitute a retreat on arms control.

The logic behind the administration's new policy is curious, if not circular. Why should we abandon efforts to force the Russians to stop all nuclear testing and let them continue at a level which is adequate for them—and more than adequate for us? If we have doubts about reading the needle at precisely 150 kilotons, should we not press more vigorously for confident verification of zero testing? Does it make sense to tinker with the limited treaties and deny ourselves the opportunity for hard data and onsite inspections? And especially if, as some allege, the Russians have broken their promise not to test above 150 kilotons, should we not ratify the treaty, challenge the Russians, and expose their perfidy?

Mr. President, I fear that the real motive for some in this administration who pressed for this new policy is not to achieve better agreements but to undermine the whole foundation of arms control agreements. My concerns have been heightened by an editorial in the Wall Street Journal—which frequently repeats hardline criticisms of arms control efforts—praising the latest decisions as "a first hesitant step away from the whole notion of negotiating arms agreements with the Soviet Union." The editorial suggests refusing to negotiate new treaties while old ones are being broken.

I agree, Mr. President, that the Russians should be held to account for their behavior. But this administration has adopted a deliberate policy of refusing to challenge the U.S.S.R. for possible violations of SALT II in the established mechanism of the Standing Consultative Commission. It also rings hollow for the administration to complain about violations of a not-yet-binding treaty which they consider flawed and refuse to ratify. And because we have not been able to exchange the data on nuclear test sites, we "cannot prove beyond reasonable doubt" any Soviet violations of the TTB.

We are tying our own hands by these shortsighted policies. And by refusing to ratify the agreements already signed, we are freeing the Russians from the limitations they would impose on their own nuclear weapons programs.

We have nothing to fear from the TTB and PNE treaties. The then Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Gen. David Jones, told the Foreign Relations Committee last fall that "we have no plans to do testing above 150 kilotons." Nor do we plan any peaceful nuclear explosions.

The Russians, however, could exploit the absence of binding limits to develop and test even bigger warheads—and giant warheads could render the new Dense Pack basing system for the MX missile vulnerable to just a handful of Soviet weapons.

Mr. President, this administration waited 10 months to develop its first arms control proposals—for nuclear systems in Europe—and 16 months to decide on a plan for limiting strategic weapons. These modest but useful initiatives have now been called into question by its retreat on the issue of nuclear testing.

The American people want a halt in the nuclear arms race. They know, as even our military leaders have testified, that we can be secure, even more secure, if there are fewer nuclear weapons and nuclear-armed nations in the world. They have been jaded by promises and want results.

We can achieve those results, immediately, if we move quickly to ratify the agreements we have already negotiated and then press ahead for more comprehensive measures.

Mr. President, I ask that certain articles on this issue from the Los Angeles Times, the New York Times, and the Washington Post be printed in the RECORD.

The articles follow:

U.S. SEEKS NEW GUARANTEES ON A-BOMB TESTS

(By Robert C. Toth)

WASHINGTON.—The Reagan Administration announced Tuesday that it will seek to strengthen the anti-cheating provisions of two Soviet-American treaties that impose limits on nuclear testing before attempting to hammer out a new, comprehensive treaty banning all tests.

A ranking White House official said the verification provisions of the present treaties, which prohibit test explosions below the 150-kiloton level, are inadequate. Considered relatively small, nuclear devices of 150 kilotons are the equivalent of 150,000 tons of TNT.

Thus, the official said, while the Administration still favors negotiation of a comprehensive test ban agreement, "first priority" should be given to strengthening the existing treaties.

Some Democrats immediately charged the Administration with taking a step backward in arms control efforts, since the Soviets have already agreed in principle to stronger verification provisions in a comprehensive treaty, including on-site inspection.

The Soviet reaction is not yet known. Moscow may well refuse to reopen the 1974 and 1976 agreements, some analysts believe.

Formal negotiations on a comprehensive test-ban treaty were suspended in 1980, though lower-level talks on technical problems continue.

The Reagan decision, which in effect continues the suspension of formal negotiations, is consistent with the Administration's program to build new MK and Trident missiles. Nuclear warheads for those missiles should be tested for reliability, in the view of Pentagon officials, and such tests would be barred by a comprehensive treaty.

TIMING IS UNCLEAR

Why the Administration made a formal decision on the matter now is not clear, however. Beyond stirring up opposition at home, the move will probably be used by European opponents of weapon modernization there as further proof of what they feel is Reagan's lack of interest in serious arms-control efforts.

One Administration official suggested that the decision, made at a National Security Council meeting Monday, is the final chapter in the Administration's review of arms control. Earlier decisions were made on new strategic arms reduction plans and on other proposals.

"This was just rounding out the Administration approach to the entire field," the official said.

The decision goes some distance toward following up on Republican campaign charges in 1980 that the Soviets had violated strategic arms agreements.

PERIODIC CHARGES AGAINST SOVIETS

The Soviets have been charged periodically with violating the two nuclear-test-ban agreements, which are not considered strategic arms accords as well as the biological and chemical warfare conventions. No incontrovertible evidence of such violations has been produced, however.

Neither of the two existing nuclear-test-ban treaties has been ratified by either the U.S. Congress or the Supreme Soviet, Moscow's nominal Parliament. But their provisions have been largely honored by both sides, and the White House official said the United States will continue this policy.

The U.S. decision announced Tuesday does not affect the atmospheric test ban that was agreed to by the two superpowers in 1963 as the first arms control measure of the nuclear age.

The Threshold Test Ban Treaty of 1974 limits underground weapons testing to specific sites and provides for exchange of geological data on those sites—including rock density and water table levels—to help verify the size of the test blast by seismic (earthquake) wave analysis.

ROOM FOR ERROR

After the treaty was signed, the United States complained about Soviet tests that might have been somewhat above the 150-kiloton ceiling. According to a U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament document, the Soviets proposed, and the United States agreed to, a so-called "mistakes' understanding," which states that "one or two slight, unintended breaches per year" would not be considered a violation of the treaty.

The 1976 treaty limits nuclear explosions for peace purposes to the same 150-kiloton ceiling. "Information and access to sites" of such tests are to be provided to each side, according to the arms control agency. But no tests under the treaty have been announced since it was signed.

The White House official, in explaining Reagan's decision to reporters, said "seismic signals from the U.S.S.R. have called into question Soviet compliance" with the threshold treaty. "Because of uncertainties in the yield-estimating process, the U.S. cannot prove beyond reasonable doubt" any Soviet violation.

"But this underscores the problem of uncertainty, and the requirement to remove the uncertainty to the maximum extent feasible by improving verification procedures," the official said.

The official acknowledged, however, that Reagan has not yet decided how much improvement is required and how much uncertainty is acceptable.

TWO DORMANT TREATIES AWAKEN DISPUTE OVER A-TEST INSPECTION

(By Murrey Marder)

A decision by President Reagan last Monday to seek changes in two dormant treaties with the Soviet Union has opened up one of the most contentious issues between the two superpowers: foreign inspection or rival nuclear weapons tests.

At a meeting in the Cabinet Room of the White House, the president and his National Security Council advisers planned to portray the decision as a step forward in nuclear arms control. Instead, the plan back-fired badly, enmeshing the administration in a new domestic and international dispute about its nuclear policy.

"I thought we had moved the process forward an inch," one senior administration official said ruefully at the end of the week. "But the way it comes out is that it looks like everthing has gone to hell in a handbasket."

According to other sources, a potentially larger controversy exists behind the administration's latest nuclear decisions than anything that has emerged.

Administration advocates of hardline bargaining with the Soviet Union are now seeking tougher terms for limiting nuclear weapons tests than any previous administration. They want the United States to insist on the right to send American inspectors to Soviet weapons tests, to drill holes and implant U.S. instruments, to verify Soviet compliance with limits on the size of nuclear explosions.

Other officials are advocating much more limited demands on the Soviet Union. There is no indication which course the president will choose. In either case, new American terms for verification are bound to be reflected as well in the central negotiations on nuclear arms control, the Strategic Arms Reduction Talks now under way in Geneva.

Furthermore, intrusion into Soviet territory to verify nuclear tests means equal Soviet penetration of American test sites. Although the United States is generally free of the Soviet obsession with secrecy, the Joint Chiefs of Staff and nuclear weapons specialists in the Energy Department are reported to be registering adamant opposition to the idea of admitting Soviet observers to American test sites in Nevada.

One Senate specialist said that the Joint Chiefs "turn pasty white at the idea."

None of these specifics was discussed, administration sources said, in the National Security Council last Monday. In that session, Secretary of State George P. Shultz, who carries the responsibility for negotiating on arms control, was the novice on the subject.

He was joining Defense Secretary Caspar W. Wienberger, Gen. John W. Vessey Jr., chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff; Vice President Bush; national security adviser William P. Clark, and other senior officials in deciding, as one source described it, "what our declaratory policy should be," rather than the specifics of the policy.

The intention was to portray the administration in a positive way seeking to improve and salvage two treaties negotiated by the Nixon and Ford administrations.

But what first leaked from the meeting was wholly negative: confirmation that the Reagan administration has no intention of resuming far more ambitious American-Soviet-British negotiations to end all nuclear weapons tests.

Those negotiations were last conducted by the Carter administration in November, 1980.

The formal decision to close off a channel for negotiating what is known as a Comprehensive Test Ban, came as no great surprise; it was publicly foreshadowed by administration officials last year. Even so, confirmation of that position touched off attacks from arms-control advocates.

To try to offset that damage, the White House disclosed the decision to seek changes in the two treaties to limit explosions underground, the only area where American-Soviet testing has been permitted since 1963. Those treaties were negotiated in the 1970s but never ratified. This disclosure, however, only added to the controversy.

The first sidetracked pact, the Threshold Test Ban Treaty, signed in 1974, prohibits underground nuclear tests greater than 150 kilotons—the equivalent of 150,000 tons of TNT. The second, the Peaceful Nuclear Explosions Treaty, signed in 1956, is a companion pact, setting the same level on explosions for civilian purposes, such as changing the course of rivers.

The peaceful-users treaty contains the only negotiated authority for each nation to send nuclear observers to each others' territory, under tightly controlled conditions. There is no comparable authority, however, to inspect weapons tests.

Both treaties were heavily criticized, largely by liberals, on grounds that the 150-kiloton threshold was too high to be meaningful as an alternative to a halt in testing.

The two treaties were in limbo until this administration, when the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, spurred by Chairman Charles H. Percy (R-Ill.) and other arms control advocates, sought to counter Soviet charges that the United States had defaulted on them.

Administration officials say the two pacts are seriously defective. They charge that the Soviet Union, while ostensibly honoring the ceiling on explosions, has tested nuclear weapons of up to 300 or 400 kilotons, with no recourse in that treaty to produce incontrovertible proof of violations.

Eugene V. Rostow, director of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, told the Senate committee May 13, however, that there was more than one barrier to ratification. Rostow testified that he had "run into a profound stone wall" in trying to get action on the two treaties.

"The stone wall," Rostow testified, "is the feeling in many parts of the government that, given the uncertainty of the nuclear situation, the nuclear balance and the need for new weapons and modernization . . . we are going to need testing and perhaps even testing above the 150-kiloton limit for a long time to come."

In addition, Rostow said, there are "grave doubts" about the adequacy of the verification procedure in the weapons treaty.

A senior Pentagon official privately acknowledged last week "concern about a legitimate need for testing in the future over the threshold," but he said, as did Rostow, that the verification inadequacies in the treaties are the main difficulty.

The administration's official position is that the verification weakness is the only problem.

To avoid the charge that the administration was rejecting the treaties, spokesmen were told not to use the term "renegotiation." Officials talked instead about the need to "strengthen the verification provisions," which some officials described as "technical refinements."

One source involved in the process, however, ridiculed these descriptions as circumlocutions.

Rostow, nevertheless, said Friday that he was pleased with the outcome—except for the critical publicity—because "we have some prospects for improving the verification procedure."

Percy has described himself as "pleased that the administration has decided not to reject" the two treaties, and he expressed hope for an early resolution of the verification requirements. No administration official anticipates that.

If the hard-liners in the Defense Department and other agencies should prevail, the administration would end up asking the Soviet Union not only for advance notice of all weapons tests, but also for the right to choose what tests to inspect.

This would involve, said one advocate of this approach, "our technicians having an opportunity to 'instrument' their test program," combined with authority "to drill holes and to place instruments" for measuring the yield of nuclear explosions.

In such a test observed by Americans, this specialist said, the Soviet warhead being tested "could be shrouded as it is lowered into the test hole," to screen it from the Americans.

When asked how he would expect the Soviet Union to react to such a demand, he said, "It will be a jolt," but added: "This is the only way to verify—and even then there would be some margin for doubt."

EXPERTS SPLIT ON FLAWS IN PACTS LIMITING NUCLEAR TESTS

(By Judith Miller)

WASHINGTON, July 25.—Arms control experts agree that the two treaties limiting underground nuclear testing pose verification problems for the United States, but they disagree on whether the risks of Soviet violations are serious enough to require renegotiating sections of the accords.

Similarly, these experts are divided on whether the United States can develop adequate technical methods to detect violations and can obtain Soviet agreement on verification procedures.

These disputes have been revived by reports that President Reagan decided last Monday to postpone efforts to negotiate a complete nuclear testing ban with Britain and the Soviet Union until verification measures could be strengthened in the two treaties that have been signed but not ratified.

The pacts at issue are the Threshold Test Ban Treaty, signed in 1974, which limits to 150 kilotons all underground Soviet and United States tests, the only kind permitted, and its companion accord, the Peaceful Nuclear Explosions Treaty, signed in 1976, which puts the same limits on explosions for ostensibly peaceful purposes. A kiloton is a unit used to measure the power of a nuclear explosion and is equal to the force of 1,000 tons of TNT.

SOME DEFICIENCIES SEEN

In interviews last week, Administration officials described what they said were some of the deficiencies in the treaties' verification provisions, and asserted that Mr. Reagan was committed to finding ways to bolster the accords.

According to officials of the Pentagon and the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, it is difficult for the United States to estimate the actual force of Soviet underground tests.

Seismic measuring stations outside the Soviet Union record the ground waves generated by an explosion. These are then calibrated into a range of yield estimates. However, officials say the range can be off by a factor of two, so that a nuclear explosion estimated at 150 kilotons could actually be 75 kilotons or 300 kilotons. One official said that there had been several Soviet tests, many at one particular site, that had been estimated at 300 kilotons.

Proponents of immediate ratification of the treaties say that once the Threshold Test Ban Treaty is ratified, the Soviet Union would have to comply with its protocol, which requires that Moscow provide detailed geological data about its designated test sites. The protocol also requires that both nations provide information on a specific test explosion for calibration purposes.

ENHANCED ABILITY TO CHECK TESTS

This would permit the United States to adjust its seismic stations, enhancing the nation's ability to measure the Soviet tests and ending some of the uncertainty, the proponents of ratification say.

Manfred Eimer who heads the arm control agency's verification division, agreed that ratification would be beneficial because estimates of the size of the tests would improve. But he expressed concern about the reliability of data the Russians would provide.

"How could we verify that data about the calibration short were correct?" Dr. Eimer said. In other words, if the calibration explosion was actually larger than the Russians disclosed, future estimates based on that figure might be too low.

Dr. Eimer added that "some kind of on-site presence at some point" would probably be required for the United States to verify independently the accuracy of the Soviet information. Such a request, he said, might well be acceptable to the Soviet Union, since Moscow had agreed to permit opportunities for on-site inspection as part of the Peaceful Nuclear Explosion Treaty's protocol. In fact, Dr. Eimer noted, that protocol which would also take effect after United States ratification, explicitly provided for advance notice of very large tests and some limited

United States inspection and installation of measuring devices before such tests.

Therefore, Dr. Eimer concluded it was not "unreasonable" to believe that the Soviet Union might accept the provisions' application to the Threshold Test Ban Treaty.

PREDICTION CALLED OPTIMISTIC

Several arms control experts, however, called this prediction optimistic. They noted that the Soviet Union had historically been suspicious about United States demands for on-site inspection and other "intrusive" monitoring, which the Russians say is a ploy for strengthening United States intelligence.

One expert who worked on the 1976 treaty said that the Soviet Union had agreed to the stricter inspection provisions because the treaty allowed a series of consecutive 150 kiloton explosions that could total as much as 1.5 megatons. A megaton is equal to the explosive power of a million tons of TNT.

Joe Wit, a Washington-based military consultant who has specialized in the test ban treaties, asserted that the Reagan Administration had "a good case" in its concerns about verifying the treaty. But he said the same concerns existed when the treaty was signed.

"What has changed is the political calculus," he said. "These kinds of verification risks are no longer politically acceptable."

Reagan Administration officials, noting evidence that the Soviet Union appears to have violated agreements on the use of biological and chemical agents, say good faith is no longer sufficient in arms control treaties.

One White House official, asked what would happen if the Soviet Union refused American requests for strengthened verification measures, replied: "The Soviets usually say no at first. But more often than not they wind up sitting down and negotiating."●

THE VOICE OF AMERICA

● Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, the Voice of America is the global radio network of the International Communication Agency, which seeks to promote understanding abroad for the United States, its people, culture, and policies.

Broadcasting over 950 hours a week in 41 languages, the Voice of America is charged to serve as a consistently reliable and authoritative source of news, to represent America, and to present the policies of the United States clearly and effectively.

As my colleagues know, the Voice of America and its parent organization, the International Communication Agency, have been the subjects of much controversy. The VOA's performance is becoming of increasing concern to many, including this Senator. On Sunday, July 25, 1982, the Chicago Tribune carried a very thoughtful editorial which I believe will be of interest to those concerned about this Nation's public diplomacy efforts. In order that this editorial may receive wider circulation, I ask that it be printed in full in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The editorial follows:

WHOSE VOICE?

President Reagan's efforts to turn the Voice of America into a more effective mouthpiece for U.S. government policies have won him few friends in Washington. The agency itself is reportedly in turmoil over the presumption of a president who thinks a government agency should be accountable to the voters. Mr. Reagan's first director of VOA, frustrated by resistance from employees and criticism from outside, resigned in March.

Now Mr. Reagan's effort to make VOA serve the aims of elected officials has drawn new criticism. A report by the U.S. advisory Commission on Public Diplomacy, an independent body chartered by Congress, warns of the danger of "stridency and propaganda" creeping into VOA broadcasts and insists that "VOA's credibility is its most precious asset." It also says that "actions and policies which are easily misinterpreted and cast doubt on the organization's commitment to truth can seriously damage it."

Both the commission and VOA's disgruntled employees mistakenly regard the body as no different from any other journalistic enterprise. It is different. Any journalist whose paycheck comes from the Treasury Department is not an independent journalist. No private newspaper would have a shred of credibility if it accepted government funds—and rightly so. VOA's entire budget comes from the government, so its credibility is compromised before it starts.

Mr. Reagan's position is the only intelligible one. It is that the VOA's reason for existence is to advance the aims of the American government. It should answer, like other arms of the government, to the people in power. The alternative is to turn it over to an unelected group of people who can be controlled only in the clumsiest way—through the appropriations process.

As a matter of tactics, VOA can best serve U.S. interests by telling the truth. Credibility is as important for a government propaganda agency as it is for an independent newspaper—something that Moscow has yet to learn. To this extent the VOA employees have a point. But it is the interests of this country, not traditional journalistic standards, that must be the agency's ultimate concern. A lot of people have forgotten that; Mr. Reagan is wise to remind them.●

THE PROPOSED SALE OF FORT DE RUSSY

● Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, the administration appears intent on selling a portion of Fort De Russy for commercial purposes despite the protests from all over this great Nation. Although my office and others have received innumerable requests to prevent the sale, we have yet to receive one letter, to my knowledge, in favor of the sale. Consequently, I will continue to oppose such action from happening.

As further proof of this widespread support in opposition to the sale of Fort De Russy, I am enclosing a copy of the resolution which was introduced at the June 1982 meeting of the U.S. Conference of Mayors held in Minneapolis, Minn. It was unanimously endorsed and, in my view, is a significant addition to the growing number of individuals and groups opposing the sale of Fort De Russy.

Mr. President, I ask that this resolution be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The resolution follows:

RESOLUTION

Whereas, the Reagan Administration has called for the sale of federal lands, in part, to raise revenues to lessen the national debt, and, in part, to reduce the cost of running the federal government; and

Whereas, Senator Charles Percy has introduced a resolution, Senate Resolution 231, calling for the sale of federal lands, in general, and the sale of Fort DeRussy in Waikiki, Hawaii, in particular; and

Whereas, these policies regarding the sale of federal lands have been articulated without consultation with local communities; and

Whereas, the sale of Fort DeRussy in Waikiki, Hawaii, and the sale of federal lands in many other communities is likely to have a detrimental effect upon those communities; and

Whereas, the benefits to be derived from retaining federal lands that are now used for national defense, conservation, recreational, open space and other environmental purposes far outweigh the benefits to be gained from the sale of those lands; and

Whereas, the federal officials proposing these actions have grossly overstated the revenue that will be generated from the sale of federal lands; now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That any policy to sell federal lands should include provisions that recognize the sovereignty of local communities over the uses which such lands may be put to and of the necessity of local input into the decision to sell federal lands, including consideration of environmental, community, economic and social concerns and for local public hearings.●

CONNAUGHT MARSHNER AND FAMILY FORUM II

● Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, the names of the personalities behind what is known as the New Right may not yet be household words, but I do not think it will be very long before the hard-working people who have put family issues at the forefront of our national political agenda receive their due need of recognition.

Washington is this week playing host to Family Forum II, a leadership training conference focusing on a wide span of issues affecting the American family. It features a galaxy of speakers from the Congress, the ministry, political, and social action groups, including pro family leader Connaught Marshner, whose National Pro Family Coalition had a great deal to do with making this conference a reality.

In point of fact, Mrs. Marshner had a great deal to do with raising the consciousness, as the saying goes; of family minded people in this country to the magnitude of the collectivist threat confronting traditional values and mores. The Washington Times of July 27, 1982, has published a wide ranging and timely interview with Connie Marshner, which certainly captures the fire and zeal of this determined lady, and examines the motivations that have made her a champion of the cause of the family.

Mr. President, I recommend this interview for its very instructive insights into what distinguishes family activists from the camp of radical feminists, liberationists, and what have you, and I ask that the full text be printed in the RECORD.

MARSHNER: IRISH FIRE ON THE RIGHT

(By Sue Mullin)

Her parents had a sense that this child, a feisty little colleen, would grow up to shake her fist at passing fad and fancy and become a revolutionary of a different sort.

So they named her Connaught, after one of Ireland's four, tradition-steeped provinces. And she grew up, this daughter of a U.S. Navy man and his wife, an Irish-Catholic American with a sense of destiny that is out of synch with modern interpretations of power, riches or celebrity.

Connaught Coyne Marshner, now 31, who claims she never spent much time on girlish dreams of the 1950s—picking out names for future babies or considering the convent if a prince didn't show up—grew up to lead the New Right battle to preserve the American family.

One result of that battle is Family Forum II, a three-day conference beginning in Washington today that will feature discussion of family issues by members of Marshner's movement.

"When my teen-age girlfriends fell in love with the Beatles," said the primly dressed chairman of the National Pro-Family coalition, "I had a crush on Irish patriots like Patrick Perase and Robert Emmet who'd already been dead for 50 years."

While she finds the tactics of today's IRA an aberration of the principles of the original Irish Proclamation, a copy of which hangs in her office, the Easter Rising of 1916 inspires her. And the conservatist cause is no less glorious to Marshner.

Both have to do with "sacrificing for a great and noble cause," she said with unabashed zeal, her usually brooding eyes flashing fire and, yes, maybe a little brimstone.

Marshner's straight-laced style, however, is in stark contrast to her rhetoric. She and her associates don't chain themselves to gates, splatter blood on historic buildings or go on hunger strikes. Hers, the New Right style, is reserved, cooly intellectual, well-organized, politely gracious—never strident. But no less committed to its ideals, and very effective, she added.

Most of her work is done from her office behind Union Station in a handsome, iron-grilled rowhouse on Second Street. The two buildings, one rowhouse behind the other, are the pulse for a number of New Right causes, including the Committee for the Survival of a Free Congress.

The front house is perched on a hillside and imperiously peers down on sidewalks that suddenly turn into overgrown dirt paths. A mangy dog tiptoes over broken glass and wine bottles at the corner to explore a fermenting bag of garbage.

Inside the bastion against urban blight, however, all is well. Tiny offices buzzed with activity, and there are women's faces and black faces poring over reports.

"Crickum here," said Marshner, pausing to answer her phone which rings constantly. Crickum is Marshner's inner-office nickname, an acronym of her initials, CRCM. Her outer-office nickname is Connie.

"Oh, on prayer in the schools, huh? Yes, yes, I'll take this one," she told a secretary.

It was a congressman's legislative assistant calling to tell her that the legislator would be returning a completed questionnaire Marshner had sent him.

Rubbing her hands together afterwards in mock villainish fashion, she said, "Sorry, just had to take that one because he (the congressman) is one of the saveables."

She explained that in lobbying, she divides the Congress into three groups—sinners, saints and saveables.

"The saints, who make up about 20 percent, are folks like Jesse Helms who will always do the right thing for the right reason," she said.

"The sinners are people like Ted Kennedy and Alan Cranston, the 20 to 25 percent who will always do the wrong thing for the wrong reason.

"Politically, you don't waste time on the sinners. You spend time on the saveables—the 50 to 60 percent that could go either way. They can blow away the prevailing winds."

Marshner, a key figure in a group Conservative Digest calls the New Right's Washington Connection, spends little of her time lobbying directly. As a veteran of the movement and a protege of such leaders as Paul Weyrich, president of the Free Congress Committee, and Morton Blackwell, a White House special assistant, she spends more time training other lobbyists.

Her students are not fat cats, she emphasized, but "mothers and grandmothers fired up enough by an issue that they come to Washington at their own expense."

They are representatives of pro-family groups from across the country, said Marshner, sitting straight and looking more formidable than her 5-feet 4-inches. "They're from groups official Washington has never heard of," she said knowingly. "And they're not old ladies in aprons, full skirts and tennis shoes who never leave the house except to go to church."

Thumbing through a filing box of index cards, she reeled off a random membership sampling. More intimately aware of these groups' projects than a presidential candidate is of big unions and industries, she related anecdotes about each.

"Arkansas has FLAG," she began, her computer-like monotone growing stacatto. "That stands for Family, Life, America and God. They organized a few years ago and everybody laughed. But at a recent breakfast, half the state legislature attended and the governor and lieutenant governor spoke."

She spewed forth facts and figures about similar groups in Alaska, California ('The Right Perspective,' founded by a high school kid in Northern California), Colorado, Massachusetts, Minnesota ("the most active pro-life group in the country—imagine that in our most left-wing state), Missouri, Nevada, Arizona, Georgia, Alabama, Washington and Maryland ("a liberal state, but here we have Families Associated of Maryland and the Family Protection Lobby. Maryland may be south of the Mason-Dixon line, but that is only by accident.")

The Eagle Forum, founded by Phyllis Schlafly—a woman Marshner greatly admires—is in every state, she added, and those groups are also part of the National Pro-Family Coalition.

The conservative movement didn't begin—nor will it end—with the election of Reagan and the subsequent defeat of the ERA, said Marshner, the glint of the silver Celtic cross around her neck matching the gleam in her eyes. Those were simply signs of the movement's strength, she added.

More than a decade ago when she first came to Washington, fresh from the University of South Carolina, Marshner said she witnessed the "awesome potential" of the New Right women. At the forefront of a successful drive to get then President Nixon to veto a bill which would have established federal day care centers, she said "that's when a sleeping giant rose up."

Not even the Washington Connection expected the volume of mail that flooded the White House in opposition to the bill, she said.

"There was more mail than on any other issue before or since—including Watergate. I realized then that there are real women out there in the real world who are concerned about family values. Until then, they were basically isolated from the political process."

Joining ranks with conservatives at USC in the late 1960s "when craziness was breaking loose all over the country," Marshner said she saw "pockets of sanity" in Young Republican and Christian Fellowship groups. After graduation, she leaped at the chance to become a secretary to the editor of New Guard, she said. It's a magazine published by the Young Americans for Freedom in Washington and catapulted the unflashy education major into the flamboyant, political scene.

Her boss, editor Dan Joy, would later leave Washington, but by that time the quite, mannerly young lady had written scorching articles about liberals. Meticulously researched; they caught the eye of conservatives who would expand the Free Congress Committee, lay the groundwork for a conservative political caucus in Congress and found the Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank.

They were a rag-tag bunch then, Marshner reminisced. Her mentor, Paul Weyrich, was then an administrative assistant to former Colorado Senator Gordon Allott. An associate, Ed Fulner, was then an AA to Rep. Phil Crane. Fulner is now president of the Heritage Foundation. Another friend, Howard Phillips, was working for several congressional staffs who were trying to form a caucus. He now heads the Conservative Caucus.

"I was just dropped down in the middle of a group that became the New Right leadership," she said, alluding again to her destiny. "When Phillips was hired to coordinate the caucus in the early 1970s, he just walked in with me trailing behind. I was supposed to be his secretary and he hadn't even been authorized yet to hire a secretary. But within six months, I was still there and I was writing speeches.

"None of us worried about titles," she added, noting that she is still occasionally mistaken for a secretary before she is introduced. "We all pitched in to do Xeroxing, mimeographing, typing—whatever needed doing. We were a political force being born and it was very exhilarating."

Being female and feminine—she almost always wears dresses, no more makeup than a nun in modern dress and her speech is as immaculate as her attire—was and is no liability, she insisted.

"In conservative circles which are cast as archaic by feminists I've never known an educated, hard-working woman who was held back."

When mistaken for a secretary, she said she just smiles to herself and goes on with her business.

"I suppose feminists would get in high drive if that happened to them, but I feel it only proves how superficial some men can be," she said.

The pro-family Washington Connection—which includes Marshner, Weyrich, Phillips, Robert Billings of the Moral Majority, Bill Billings of the National Christian Action Coalition and Kathy Teague of the American Legislative Exchange Council—has played musical chairs but always to the same conservative tune.

Marshner and her former boss Joy, for example, went to the Office of Economic Opportunity with Phillips when he was named acting director of the agency by Nixon.

After a brief "look inside the bureaucracy," Marshner said she moved back and forth between the Free Congress Committee and the Heritage Foundation, wherever her services were most needed.

Critics call her "the conservative gadfly" or "the ubiquitous Connie." The Conservative Digest touts her as "The Pro-Family Dynamo." But probably because of her low-key style, she is not as recognizable as Schlafly, Moral Majoritarian Jerry Falwell and others.

It's not that she's a recluse. Along her way toward heading the Pro-Family Coalition, she also managed to write a book for parents cut off from decision-making in the public schools, and she was chairman of the federal family policy committee for the Reagan campaign.

She debated George McGovern before a recent meeting of the National Home Economists Association. She has appeared on "Good Morning America" to speak against a federal domestic violence bill, and she has testified before Congress on numerous issues, including a gay rights proposal which she opposed.

On her way to the top, the girl who said she would forego marriage until at least her 30s, met and married Bill Marshner, a former reporter for a Catholic newspaper who now teaches theology at Christendom College in Front Royal, Va.

The couple has two young sons, Pearse, 6, named for the Irish poet-patriot, and Michael, 5.

Seemingly oblivious to the irony, the "Pro-Family Dynamo" sat behind a sheaf of paperwork and offered a reporter a store-bought cookie from her brown-bag lunch.

"I'm not here for purposes of self-fulfillment," she snapped when asked how she can be against day care centers and ERA while she works four days a week leaving her children at home.

"I'm doing this work because my husband wants me to do it," she said, getting her Irish up. "I would stop tomorrow, but Bill says I have important work to do and that I must continue. I would stop tomorrow if my children were being harmed or my husband thought my being here were no longer proper."

Marshner's aunt, who makes her home with the couple, cares for the children while the parents are working.

"My aunt's coming to us was a sign to me that my work is pleasing to the Lord," she said.

On the surface, the Marshners could be mistaken for any other modern couple who share family financial and child-nurturing responsibilities.

Connie, when pregnant with their first child, left Washington with Bill while he attended graduate school in Texas. Instead of writing position papers and testifying before Congress during that two-year period, she said, she typed other students' term papers to make ends meet. And Bill changed diapers and washed bottles, she added, when she want out to do research on her book.

The difference between her and a feminist is deeply philosophical, she insisted. It centers on why she is in the work force, she said, and not on "how we manage to work out the details of who puts on the kids' pajamas."

She finds the feminist battle cry of self-fulfillment an intrinsically selfish, anti-family goal.

"The proof is in the pudding," she said. "A person who says 'I want to go out and do thus and so' and who gets the kids taken care of at the expense of family values has a whole different motive."

"That person is able to rationalize abortion, daycare centers and discarding a husband—anything that gets in the way of the goal."

She acknowledged, however, that many women are not so fortunate as to have a relative who lovingly takes care of their children while they work.

"That's why I would like to see some significant tax changes for family men," she said. "Ones that would enable women to stay home with their children rather than go out and work at a minimum-wage job. Ones that would encourage the formation and the stability of families."

Obviously, Marshner and the feminist movement are at odds on most issues. And although their views converge on one—pornography—she said feminists have not treated the New Right very "sisterly."

"There have been overtures to meet with the National Organization for Women (NOW) by the Moral Majority," she said. "NOW never returned the phone call. Unfortunately, NOW is part and parcel of the left-wing establishment, and its members wouldn't be caught dead operating with us even though we have the same concerns on pornography."

One figure on the other side has agreed to participate in this week's Family Forum II. Dr. Michael P. Lerner, whose organization Friends of Families, says it wants to prove that liberals are as much concerned with the family as conservatives. He will debate New Right leader Paul Weyrich, whose Free Congress Foundation is co-sponsoring the forum. Their discussion will be one of many over a three day period. Subjects will include the family and the law and the family and education. Several pro-family spokesmen will appear, including Sens. William Armstrong, R-Colo., and Jeremiah Denton, R-Ala., author George Gilder and the Rev. Jerry Falwell.●

H.R. 6663—EFFECTIVE DATE DELAY OF AMENDMENTS TO RULE 4 OF FEDERAL RULES OF CIVIL PROCEDURE

● Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, this bill (H.R. 6663) seeks to delay the effective date of the proposed amendments to rule 4 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Due to urgent time considerations it has not been through committee but has been left at the desk for immediate Senate consideration.

The rationale for the bill, which delays the enactment of the proposed amendments from August 1, 1982, until October 1, 1983, is in three parts.

The first part, subsection (c) of rule 4 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, provides that service of process will be made by a "United States marshal, by his deputy, or by some person specially appointed by the court for that purpose." Service of process may also be made by a person "authorized to serve process in an action brought in courts of general jurisdiction of the State in which the district court is held or in which service is made."

The proposed amendment of H.R. 6663 to subsection (c) would authorize service of process by any person over the age of 18 who is not a party to the action. Under the proposed revision subsection (c) U.S. marshals are authorized to serve summons and complaints in three instances: First, on behalf of the party proceeding "in forma pauperis" or under 28 U.S.C. 1916 (which authorizes seamen to bring certain action without paying fees or costs); second, to comply with an express statutory mandate; and third, where the court issues an order stating that the presence of a marshal is specially required.

The goal of reducing the role of marshals in serving summons and complaints is desirable. The problem lies in the proposed subsection (c)(2)(B) which requires marshals to serve process "pursuant to any statutory provision expressly providing service by a United States marshal or his deputy." Under current law, 28 U.S.C. 569(b), a marshal or deputy is compelled to "execute all lawful writs, processes and orders issued under the authority of the United States, including those of the courts." Any party, therefore, could rely on 28 U.S.C. 569(b) to utilize a marshal for service thereby frustrating the intent of the new subsection of limiting the use of marshals in service of process.

The second problem area is proposed revision of subsection (d). Currently subsection (d) favors personal service, but service by mail is possible in some instances when such service is in accordance with the law of the State in which the district court sits. The proposed amendments to subsection (d) requires, where mail is used, that the mail be sent registered or certified, return receipt requested, with delivery restricted to the addressee. The amendments also remove the option to follow State law.

In some instances, due to mistaken signatures, illegible signatures, unclaimed mail or where the name signed is different from the named defendant in the complaint, it is difficult to determine if adequate notice is actually received. Yet this inadequate notice may be responsible for a default judgment against the defendant.

Finally, rule 4 does not provide a time limit on the service of process. A new subsection, (j), has been added requiring that service be made within 120 days of the filing of the complaint. If it is not served within that period the proposed amendment calls for the "action to be dismissed as to that defendant without prejudice upon the motion." The problem with this subsection is if an action is filed on the day before the statute of limitations is due to expire and service is not made within 120 days of filing, the action must be dismissed without prejudice under new subsection (j). Could the plaintiff refile the action without being barred by the statute of limitations? This question is not adequately answered. If the action does not survive, then there has been a dismissal with prejudice. It is this type of prejudice the new subsection (j) seeks to cure.

Therefore, section 1 of H.R. 6663 postpones, until October 1, 1983, the effective date of the proposed amendment to rule 4. The additional time provided will be used to study and review all aspects of the proposed amendments.

Hence, Mr. President, I join with the distinguished Senator from South Carolina, Senator THURMOND, and urge favorable consideration of this bill.●

OUTYEAR DEFENSE SPENDING CEILINGS

● Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, today's New York Times reported that administration officials have said that President Reagan does not feel bound by the outyear defense spending ceilings set forth in the fiscal year 1983 budget resolution. The article goes on to report that President Reagan is planning to use his midyear economic report to signal his intention to seek higher levels of military spending.

In my opinion, this report could not have come at a worse time. Yesterday, Alice Rivlin, the Director of the Congressional Budget Office, testified before the Senate Budget Committee. She told us to expect deficits in the range of $140 to $160 billion in each of the next 3 years, even assuming that we have a moderate recovery and Congress agrees to spending cuts called for in the budget resolution. She affirmed what most of us knew already, that deficits in that range will weaken economic recovery. Her recommendation to us was to make more cuts than we have already made in Government spending, including cuts in defense.

Mr. President, I am chagrined at the timing and substance of President Reagan's reported inclination to exceed defense spending ceilings for 1984 and 1985. As a member of the Budget Committee, I took part from the beginning in the process that yielded the 1983 budget. Republican members of the Budget Committee took more than a little political heat to submit a budget that could be accepted by Congress and the American people. Many Members of this body have cast votes that, were we thinking strictly in terms of political expediency we would never have cast. We did this in an effort to continue the economic recovery program begun by President Reagan.

Mr. President, I know that the outyear spending guidelines in the budget resolution are not binding. But if there is one thing that has been driven home to me in the last few months, it is the symbolic importance of those outyear ceilings. Business leaders and economists have told us how vitally important it is that we show a downward trend in the deficit. What we do this year is not as important as what business and the financial markets think we will be willing to do in future years.

Another important symbolism is that we appear to be making cuts fairly, and in all programs. If we lose that appearance, we will lose the support of the American people. Therefore, Congress moderated the defense increase requested by the administration by some $23 billion. Even at that, many people thought we should have made further cuts, but we did not, partly out of deference to President Reagan's own wishes, and partly because we realized the need to rebuild America's defenses. I would have preferred more restraint in the growth of the Defense budget, and I voted for an amendment to the budget resolution that would have restrained military spending. When that amendment was not adopted, I nevertheless supported a budget resolution that provides for substantial defense increases while substantially restricting entitlements and discretionary domestic programs.

Mr. President, President Reagan agreed to support the budget resolution passed by Congress. By backing out now, he runs the risk of seriously undermining the economic recovery program, and invites deep cuts in defense as well.●

JEFF ROZENBERG PLEADS FOR UNITY

● Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I would like to submit for the RECORD a copy of a letter—no a plea—from a young Minnesotan.

Jeff Rozenberg is only 15 years old, yet he has taken a keen interest in our political system. His letter addresses an issue that we, in our election-year fervor, may have forgotten or pushed to the back of our minds. We are here to serve the interests of the people of the United States of America, not ourselves nor our party.

Perhaps we should take Jeff's plea to heart and stop our in-house fighting and unite in our efforts to correct our current problems and strive for a better government.

Mr. President, I ask that Jeff Rozenberg's letter be printed in the RECORD.

The letter follows:

DEAR MEMBERS OF CONGRESS: My name is Jeff Rozenberg, and I am 15 years old.

I know it must be hard to be a Senator or Congressman, with all the responsibilities and power you possess, not to mention all the decision(s) you make on a daily basis.

Right now the nation is in severe economic trouble, as you are surely aware.

What I don't understand is that when troubles hit a large group of people, they usually come to each other's aid.

That is what happened 206 years ago when the United States was formed. The people came to each other's aid and formed a nation.

A government was formed to help the people and to uphold the majestic words of the Constitution.

Some people don't believe in government, but I do. I think it is important to keep order.

However, lately I have seen commercials that blame the Democrats for this and the Republicans for that. You are acting like children.

Don't "ununite" us!

If you would spend as much time and money on helping the country as you do trying to destroy each other, I feel things would be much better.

P.S.—Don't give us kids your burden when you leave Congress.

STATEMENT OF UNITED TECHNOLOGIES CORPORATION ON NEED FOR CLARIFICATION OF THE FOREIGN CORRUPT PRACTICES ACT

● Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I ask that the statement of United Technologies Corp. on the need to clarify the provisions of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act submitted to the Banking Committee on July 16, 1981, be printed in the RECORD.

WRITTEN STATEMENT ON BEHALF OF UNITED TECHNOLOGIES CORPORATION

Congress unanimously enacted the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act in 1977 after a series of disclosures which showed that U.S. Corporations were following international business practices that were unethical, potentially harmful to U.S. relations with foreign governments and, hence, in conflict with long-term interests of the United States.

United Technologies Corporation does not wish to turn back the clock to the era prior to the adoption of the FCPA. The concern which led to the FCPA was justified. However, we believe that the law should be less ambiguous. We support the Chafee/Rinaldo bill because it would clarify the FCPA and make it more workable.

We have reviewed the testimony by government officials and business representatives which was presented on May 20 and 21 and June 16 to the Joint Subcommittee hearings. In general, we agree with the comments of those who support enactment of S. 708. In addition, we share the Administration's view that Section 102 of the FCPA, the recordkeeping provision, is an unnecessary and unjustified burden on registered American companies [such as United Technologies] and would prefer its repeal rather than enactment of amendments along the lines of the Chafee bill. If repeal of Section 102 proves impractical, we would regard S. 708's proposed changes in the section as essential.

While we welcome the SEC's support for changes in the FCPA, we are strongly opposed to the SEC's efforts to broaden Senator CHAFEE's bill in ways that would substantially reduce the value of the amendments (e.g., imposing a prudent businessman standard in defining materiality rather than relying on generally accepted accounting principles and deeming officers and directors of greater than 50 percent affiliates to be officers and directors of the parent company).

We would not propose to repeat here the cogent arguments that others have advanced in favor of the Chafee bill. Rather, we will limit this submission to those points relating to the FCPA which seem most significant to us.

DEFINITENESS A REQUIREMENT FOR CRIMINAL LAWS

Definiteness was more important to the FCPA than most legislation because the Act provides for criminal penalties. The U.S. Courts have long held that criminal laws must be defined with appropriate definiteness and has held them to be unconstitutional if too vague or indefinite. If the government considers a law so important that criminal penalties are to be attached for its violation then that law must be clear to the citizens so that they can take steps to see that no violation occurs. It is ironic that in this case the government's actions and inactions made a poorly drafted criminal law even more confusing.

PROVISIONS TO PREVENT DIFFICULTIES WITH FOREIGN AFFILIATES, PARTNERS AND EMPLOYEES ARISING FROM EXTRATERRITORIAL APPLICATION OF THE FCPA

United Technologies is an international company. We have more than 60,000 employees and some 80 plants located in foreign countries. Our international sales and U.S. exports total more than $5 billion, or over 40 percent of our total sales. Obviously, our foreign employees and international business are extremely important to our success. Anything that disrupts them receives our attention.

We believe that the FCPA as currently written is one such disruptive force. The statute applies U.S. law to foreign transactions and affects not only U.S. companies, but also their foreign subsidiaries. This extraterritorial application of our law is offensive to our foreign customers and employees. This effect is particularly acute because, as the record before the Subcommittees make clear, the uncertainty and indefiniteness of the FCPA have confused the American business community and caused it to forgo legitimate commercial opportunities. Moreover, efforts to secure clarification have failed as a result of the Justice Department's restrictive approach to the FCPA Review Procedure and the SEC's reluctance to be bound by its results.

In conducting the operations of foreign subsidiaries, we must recognize our foreign employees' sensitivity towards the actions and policies of the U.S. management. However, in some cases, such as with the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, we have no choice but to insist that these subsidiaries adopt complicated procedures and obtain numerous certifications. A number of our foreign employees justifiably regard these certifications of compliance with our policies, based on requirements of the FCPA, as unnecessary and offensive because the request for them appears to question their ethics and to imply that we view foreign businessmen as basically untrustworthy and corrupt.

The SEC takes the position that the accounting provisions of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act apply to those foreign subsidiaries in which we hold a 20 percent or greater interest. It is difficult enough to exert control over a foreign subsidiary when the U.S. company holds 100 percent of the stock. It is often impossible to control a foreign subsidiary when the stock ownership is 50 percent or less. This is because decisionmaking in such situations can only be exercised through mutual cooperation with a foreign partner. Should the U.S. parent attempt to control a foreign business through its authority as owner of its subsidiary without seeking the cooperation of local management, it will soon find that its arbitrary action will result in the loss of key employees and the local cooperation which is so necessary in running a business thousands of miles away from the United States.

With this background, it is understandable why we have had great difficulty in explaining to our foreign affiliates, partners and employees how two agencies of the U.S. government are responsible for enforcing the same statute and are providing conflicting signals on how the law would be applied. Nor could we cause these same foreign parties to understand why, at first, both agencies refused to clarify the FCPA on the ground that this would enable American companies to circumvent the statute. This seemed particularly anomalous to us in view of the importance of definiteness in criminal statutes. Sound policy arguments strengthen this constitutional imperative in the case of a statute with extraterritorial reach. Finally, we could offer our foreign colleagues little hope that the rules would be made clearer by virtue of the Justice Department's Review Procedure with its many procedural failings and the initial unwillingness of the SEC to abide by its results.

Because of these experiences with our foreign affiliates, partners and employees, we support the provisions of the Chafee/Rinaldo bill that should reduce uncertainty concerning the FCPA's meaning by unifying the civil and criminal enforcement provisions in the Department of Justice. The SEC would return to its traditional role of enforcing the disclosure rquirements of the securities law as well as the accounting provisions of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act. The Chafee/Rinaldo bill also authorizes an interagency group, including officials with a trade policy perspective, to issue clear guidance as to permissible conduct if a need for clarifying future ambiguities arises. We support this proposal provided that those officials giving the guidance are not limited to enforcement officials who do not possess the trade policy background which is essential in furnishing useful clarification of the statute.

The Chafee/Rinaldo bill would also make two substantive changes to the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act which would be important steps in the direction of easing our problems overseas in meeting our responsibilities. The first would provide that the FCPA is applicable only if local law is also being violated (Sec. 6 of S. 708). Most countries in the world have their own bribery laws. Thus, this amendment would not make a substantial change in the scope of the FCPA. However, it would have a profound effect on what we would be able to tell our foreign affiliates and partners. If this provision of the Chafee/Rinaldo bill is enacted, we will be able to point out that we are no longer imposing U.S. law but rather supporting their local laws. This should make our U.S. requirements much more acceptable to our foreign colleagues.

The second important change in the FCPA made by S. 708 is recognition that in those foreign affiliates in which we hold a 50 percent or minority interest, we satisfy our obligations under Section 102 by proceeding in good faith to use our influence to the extent reasonable under the circumstances to cause transactions to be carried out consistent with the recordkeeping and accounting control provisions of the FCPA. This amendment would recognize the critical ingredient of such foreign operations—namely, the need for mutual cooperation of our overseas partners to achieve the objectives of the FCPA. We are in a far better position to secure such cooperation if we are asking for it in the context of a statute that calls for our good faith efforts rather than under a law compelling us to demand that our foreign partners agree to certain recordkeeping and accounting control requirements.

CLARIFICATION OF THE FCPA BY THE CHAFEE/RINALDO BILL

We support other provisions of the Chafee/Rinaldo bill as essential and reasonable clarification of the FCPA. In addition, these amendments would ease our problems in interpreting the statute for foreign employees.

1. Facilitating payments

Though the FCPA allows the use of facilitating payments, the ambiguity of this provision has caused us many problems. The FCPA excludes payments to foreign government employees whose duties are essentially ministerial or clerical. Thus, before facilitating payments can be made, it is necessary to know whether a foreign official is at a low enough level or performs sufficiently mundane duties to qualify. Generally the amounts of money involved are inconsequential and the cost of making the determination substantial. You can imagine the reaction of our foreign employees who wish to make a modest payment to have a local official do his job only to be told that the disbursement must wait for a decision from the corporate headquarters. While our corporate officials attempt to respond promptly to such requests, the fact-gathering on the duties of the official in question can take weeks or even months.

2. Hospitality and product demonstration

We have encountered similar problems in dealing with hospitality and demonstrations of our products. We are in the rather ridiculous position of being able to buy a lunch for a Congressman or member of his staff, but in potential technical violation of the FCPA if such a lunch were purchased for a foreign government official. The FCPA prohibits the giving of anything of value. We are confused about the extent to which we may continue to pay for travel and lodging in connection with the demonstration of our products.

At first we thought the word "corruptly," which appears in the antibribery provision of the FCPA, would bring some common sense to this matter. However, some responsible officials in the Administration and the SEC apparently took the position that the word "corruptly" did not carry its ordinary meaning in this statute. Accordingly, if a U.S. company gave anything of value to a foreign government employee, the corrupt intent could be read into the law. We felt this interpretation was unreasonable and would not be supported in the courts. However, we concluded that in dealing with this criminal statute and with all the potentially adverse effects of a challenge to our conduct, we had no choice but to be extremely cautious.

Our inability to give clear and concise responses on this subject to inquiries from our foreign officers and employees has been extremely troublesome to us and to our relations with them. The Chafee/Rinaldo bill takes a commonsense approach to this subject. It says no more than what we think Congress intended when it enacted the FCPA.

3. Foreign sales representatives—know or have reason to know.

We have obviously experienced great difficulty in applying the provision that makes the FCPA applicable if a company "knows or has reason to know" that a foreign sales representative is planning to engage in improper payments. We have instituted an elaborate and exacting procedure for the selection and appointment of foreign sales representatives. The procedure is expensive to implement, requiring numerous investigations, approvals and certifications by our employees and the foreign representative. Perhaps we overreacted. Because of the uncertain scope of this criminal statute, we felt we had no choice but to show that we had done all we could and that, consequently, we should not be held to have had "reason to know." The Chafee/Rinaldo bill, in changing this standard and limiting it to those situations to which a domestic concern corruptly directs or authorizes the payment, not only alleviates the uncertainty that existed under the current law but is more compatible with our domestic bribery law. Like the Deputy Attorney General, we see little reason for having a foreign bribery statute that is broader than our two domestic bribery law—especially when the foreign statute applies U.S. criminal sanctions to essentially extraterritorial activities.

4. Recordkeeping and internal accounting controls

Despite the learned studies from the legal and accounting professions, Section 102 of the FCPA continues to be one of the most confusing areas under the statute. We have added extensive effort by both our internal and external audit staffs. Both outside and inside counsel participate in an annual review to insure compliance with our policies. The additional cost is approximately $1 million annually. Some of this undertaking was instituted prior to the enactment of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, and will continue even if the Section 102 amendments in the Chafee/Rinaldo bill are adopted. However, with these amendments, we could reformulate on a more reasonable basis aspects of our procedures that were adopted because we felt we needed to exhaust every possible effort to prevent and uncover any possible violation involved, and we will be able to modify our procedures so that the results are approximately the same but at significant savings in time and expense.

AMENDMENT OF INTERNAL REVENUE CODE SECTION 162

We believe that it is most desirable to resolve the current conflict between the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act and the Internal Revenue Code. Section 162 of the Internal Revenue Code prevents the deduction of facilitating payments even though the Congress expressly recognized their business necessity and did not prohibit them under the FCPA. This provision of the Internal Revenue Code also disturbs us because it determines deductability of a payment abroad by hypothetically applying U.S. law regardless of the law in the foreign country. It is extremely difficult to tell a foreign manager that a particular payment that is completely open and legal in his country is not deductible under out tax laws since it would violate U.S. law if the action happened to occur in the United States. Making the requisite statutory determination and applying U.S. law to a foreign fact situation involves a time-consuming and costly exercise. Finally, whatever the original justification of Section 162's approach prior to the FCPA's enactment, there is no longer any basis for hypothetically applying U.S. law for tax purposes to situations that Congress expressly chose not to prohibit under the FCPA.

We appreciate this opportunity to present our views on the Chafee/Rinaldo bill. We respectfully urge prompt Senate action on this important legislative initiative to amend the FCPA so that American companies like United Technologies can avoid further unnecessary expenses and restore relations with foreign affiliates, partners and employees on the basis of mutual trust and confidence.●

THE 150TH CELEBRATION OF THE UNION BAPTIST CHURCH

● Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, it gives me great pleasure to rise today and offer my congratulations to the Union Baptist Church of Philadelphia for their 150 years of life.

For these many years, the Union Baptist Church has thrived in Philadelphia—imparting to millions of Philadelphians spiritual well-being; 21 Christians from Virginia—brought together by Dr. Daniel Scott—settled in the neighborhood of Eighth and Locust. A keen desire to fulfill the ambitions of the American ideal encouraged these men and women to organize the Union Baptist Church on September 18, 1832 at Benezet Hall. There, these 21 Americans developed their faith and provided for its regeneration.

These Americans planted the seed for what was to become the largest Black Baptist congregation in Philadelphia. The seed planted in 1832 developed into one of the largest contributors to missions and education among not only American black Baptist churches but also to our entire Nation.

Today the Union Baptist Church is at Fitzwater and Martin Streets. The foundations laid in 1832 have been built upon and modernized, but the fundamental tenents still remain. At a time when so many institutions within American cities are experiencing decay, the Union Baptist Church has experienced a spiritual, intellectual, and financial upsurge that inspires all Philadelphians.

As a Pennsylvanian, I am proud to join with the people of the Union Baptist Church in the celebration of an historic milestone.●

CERTIFICATION OF U.S. ASSISTANCE TO EL SALVADOR

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, the President's decision to provide Congress with a further certification on El Salvador is a travesty of justice and truth. Congress required the President to make findings as to progress in such important areas as human rights, land reforms, control of security and military forces, and the investigation into the murders of Americans. This requirement reflected serious concerns that the United States must remain committed to democratic principles and human rights.

President Reagan has chosen to compromise the truth and in doing so compromises the American conscience. Torture exists, the President says, but not too much. Murders occur, but not too many. Reforms are being undermined, but their remnants still exist—on paper. Never mind that there has been no progress in investigating the murders of the four American churchwomen and the two American labor advisers, or the disappearance of the American journalist. The President has turned his back on values that should be fundamental to America, and his administration displays a shameful callousness toward the feelings of families and friends whose loved ones have been brutally victimized and killed in El Salvador.●

AMERICA'S UNDERPAID CONGRESS

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, recently Mr. Charles Tower, a vice president of the Dun & Bradstreet Corp., wrote a very interesting article concerning congressional compensation which was published in the Washington Times.

As everyone in this body is well aware, we have made ourselves look foolish in several different ways while we attempted to deal with the issue of compensation for Members of Congress. Mr. Charles Tower has made some very cogent recommendations for dealing with this issue. There is little doubt that the recommendations of a high-level, first-rate commission could help alleviate the situation in which we find ourselves. This issue of compensation has become wrapped up in election year politics and that is not appropriate. We need to objectively look at what the Members of Congress should be paid and we should include, as Mr. Tower has suggested, any future changes in the mechanism which adjusts other high-level governmental compensaton.

Mr. President, I ask that the article of Mr. Charles Tower, entitled "America's Underpaid Congress," be printed at this point in its entirety and I urge my fellow colleagues to carefully consider Mr. Tower's remarks.

The article follows:

AMERICA'S UNDERPAID CONGRESS

(By Charles Tower)

The recent repeal in the Senate and then in the House of the controversial $75 a day tax break for members of Congress highlights the political contortions of Congressional compensation. The special treatment was repealed this year in large part because incumbents facing re-election this fall did not want to hand their opponents a damaging campaign issue. The tax formula had been passed last year because Congress felt that it deserved additional compensation.

The fact is that members of Congress do deserve a compensation increase. Members of House and Senate are substantially underpaid. Failure to correct the situation will, over the long haul, adversely affect that quality of our legislative effort.

The setting by Congress of fair compensation for members of Congress has always been a suprisingly difficult thing to do, and the effort to do it has taken more legislative time over the years than should be directed to the problem. Here are the basic elements of the congressional compensation picture.

1. The Job: On the men and women who represent us in Congress, we place the responsibility for making the basic policy decisions which impact so greatly on the lives of all of us in so many ways. To handle the job well requires: (a) substantial intellectual capacity because of the extraordinary variety and complexity of legislative issues; (b) the ability and willingness to participate constructively in the give-and-take of the legislative process; (c) ability to communicate effectively with colleagues and constituents; (d) capacity and willingness to work hard often under hectic conditions; and (e) a hide thick enough to endure what Shakespeare so aptly described as the "insolence of office."

2. The Present Level of Compensation: Base pay for members of both House and Senate is $60,662.50 per year. Members can accept honorariums for speeches and articles up to a limit of $18,198.75 per year in the House and as of this year, without total dollar limit in the Senate.

Senators have more opportunity than House members to add to their income in this way, and key committee leaders in both House and Senate are in greater demand than others.

Supreme Court justices are paid $93,000, Circuit Court of Appeal judges, $74,300, and Federal District Court judges, $70,300. Members of the president's Cabinet get $69,630. The top civil service classification is $58,500.

3. The Existing Mechanism for Determining Congressional Compensation: The Constitution gives Congress the power to set its own compensation. In 1967 Congress passed a law establishing what is now known as the quadrennial commission. Appointed by the president every four years, it reviews the compensation of Cabinet officers, federal judges and members of Congress. Its recommendaitons for change go to the president for his approval, rejection or modification, and then to Congress.

This system has not worked because of the political snarl which develops when Congress debates its own pay increases. Too often it has happened that a majority are understandably unwilling to give potential campaign opponents the political ammunition of a self-voted pay increase, however justified such an increase may be. This concern is grounded in the fact that the average voter obviously gets along on a lot less than $60,000 a year.

Indeed, to the average voter that sum sounds like the pot of gold at the end of the rainbow. His gut response to a plea of Congressional poverty is "baloney." Thus an opposing candidate who is looking for issues does not have much trouble scoring points against an incumbent who has voted himself a raise.

4. What is Fair Congressional Compensation: How is the adequacy of congressional compensation to be measured? Unfortunately, there is no clear or applicable yardstick. Private sector and some public sector comparisons provide a limited perspective.

For example, most successful private sector lawyers and doctors have much higher levels of compensation. The same is true of most top business executives, particularly those in medium size and large companies. The compensation of state, county and municipal executives is a mixed bag. However, it is not unusual for those in charge of education or public safety in the larger cities to get as much as $60,000 a year and occasionally more.

Comparisons aside, there is a matter of equity. A member of the House or Senate cannot live professionally and comfortably in Washington and raise and educate a family on $60,000 a year. It is just as complicated and as simple as that. Adding the burden of financial hardship to the inevitable uncertainty of political life contributes to a package which is increasingly unacceptable to able people who lack outside financial resources.

5. The Long-Term Impact of Inadequated Compensation: leaving aside the matter of fairness, the harm is—and a very real harm it is—that over time the quality of members and thus the quality of legislative decisions will be substantially reduced. Many able people without independent means will be reluctant to run for office and some of the best incumbents who find a demand for their talents elsewhere will not continue to serve.

Thus, instead of having a broad spectrum of representation there will be a gradual trend toward polarization favoring those with independent means at one end, many of whom now serve with distinction, and at the other those who lack substantial earning power and thus for whom $60,000 per year looks good. Gradually squeezed out will be those of substantial ability and a desire for public service but who lack outside financial resources. It is these people who should constitute the largest single block in both Senate and House.

6. A Proposal: Let's start with the fact that there is no easy solution. If there were, the problem, festering as it has been for so many years, would long since have been resolved.

Several senators have proposed a constitutional amendment giving the Supreme Court the task of reviewing congressional compensation every two years and ordering recommended changes. Whether the Court would be happy with such a sensitive political bequest, would regard it as an appropriate matter for its consideration and would be competent to resolve a purely economic issue are matters needing careful consideration. It is a radical solution to a problem for which there seems to be a scarcity of simple solutions.

Two things are needed: A mechanism for getting congressional pay back on the track and then a mechanism for periodic adjustments as economic facts may justify. To handle the first task, a commission of impeccable credentials should be established. Let its recommendation be subject only to presidential review and then put into effect.

On-going changes should be related to the mechanism which provides for changes in high level governmental compensation. Limited congressional review may be appropriate, but it should not be done on a selective basis which would permit separate treatments of members of Congress.

Whatever the best mechanism for change may be, the problem cries out for attention. Both equity and the quality of legislative decisions demand a solution. Let's get at it.●

THE BALTIC STATES

● Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, today is the 60th anniversary of the continuous recognition of the Governments of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania by the United States. Although we recognize these Baltic States as being free, the Soviet Union does not and has not for the past 42 years. The illegal occupation of the Baltic States by the Soviet Union has been regarded by successive U.S. administrations as detrimental to the self-determination and basic human dignity of the peoples of these states.

The American people, through their elected Members of Congress, have consistently supported the Baltic States. On June 9, 1982, the Senate displayed support for the now captive nations by voting unanimously for Senate Joint Resolution 201, naming June 14 as "Baltic Freedom Day." As a cosponsor of that bill, I was pleased with that affirmation of our solidarity with the Estonians, Latvians, and Lithuanians, who have been denied their freedom for several generations now.

Mr. President, one may wonder why we persist in recognizing these governments, which ceased to be independent 42 years ago, and why we make these speeches and celebrate "Baltic Freedom Day." I think that question can be answered in two words: Afghanistan and Poland. It is clear that Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania were not the last nations to feel the weight of Soviet influence, and we need to remind ourselves that there are nations today which are fighting to retain some freedom from the Soviet Union.

I hope my colleagues will take a moment today to consider the suppressed states of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania and the consequences of Soviet rule.●

IDA NUDEL

● Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, Judy Mann's column in the Washington Post this morning confirmed what many of us concerned with the abuse of human rights had feared: Ida Nudel has disappeared.

Ida Nudel, the courageous refusenik known as The Guardian Angel for her activities on behalf of Soviet Jewish Prisoners of Conscience, has sought to leave the Soviet Union since 1971. After 7 long years of harassment, she displayed a banner which read: "KGB, Give Me A Visa To Israel." She was sentenced to 4 years of internal exile. Suffering with ulcer, kidney problems, and heart trouble, Ida Nudel is in constant pain. Suffering from the denial of freedom to speak, work or practice her religion, Ida Nudel's pain is doubled.

Ida Nudel paid the Soviet Government for the crime they insisted she committed. Still, she was denied exit permission to join her sister in Israel. She was denied, in fact, precisely the same right guaranteed to Soviet citizens under the Helsinki Final Act.

Earlier this month I visited the Soviet Union where I personally witnessed the plight of Soviet Jews who have, for too long, waited to escape Soviet repression. I did not meet Ida Nudel but I heard her story frequently. David Chernoglaz who went to Israel after 5 years in a labor camp similar to Ida Nudel's said:

> The one person above all others who helped to keep up morale and who constantly helped with letter and parcels, the person rated by all to be a superhuman angel, is Ida Nudel.

Only Ida Nudel's superhuman qualities have allowed her to persist in her determination to find freedom. Shortly before being sentenced to exile, Ms. Nudel wrote:

> What haven't they done to me since I first applied to leave? I was placed in a prison punishment cell . . . there I was tortured with hunger and with difficult conditions. I was beaten and hounded like a wild beast during a hunt. Many times I have been seized on the street and thrown into dirty smelly cellars they call detention cells.

Ida Nudel's story is, to use Judy Mann's words, "a living indictment of a system that does not work." Ida Nudel does not stand alone. For every celebrated refusenik, hundreds of other wait in obscurity, coping with the everyday harassment of Soviet life.

Bernard Malamud's famous lines for "The Fixer" come to mind:

> There is no such thing as an unpolitical man, especially a Jew. You cannot be one without the other. You cannot sit still and see yourself destroyed.

Neither Ida Nudel nor those with whom she shares the same plight wait silently while the Messiah tarries. Ida Nudel prompts recollection of Shakespeare's famous line. "There is no wrath like a woman's wrath."

The candle Ida Nudel has lit here in the United States shall continue to illuminate the world to the injustices perpetrated by the Soviet Government against its citizens.

I submit for the RECORD Judy Mann's article.

The article follows:

[From the Washington Post, July 28, 1982]

MARTYR

(By Judy Mann)

Ida Nudel, the only Jewish woman to serve a term in Siberia as a "prisoner of conscience," has disappeared. Nudel, 51, has spent the last 11 years of her life trying to leave the Soviet Union to join her sister in Israel. For her efforts, she was sentenced to four years of internal exile, living part of the time in barracks that housed hardened male criminals.

She was released in March but told she would never be allowed to leave the Soviet Union. Her last contact with the West was on July 13, when she spoke with her sister, and signed off in despair. She was being made a homeless person.

Ida Nudel first requested permission to leave in 1971. At the time she was an economist, working in the Institute of Planning and Production and monitoring hygiene standards in food stores. Permission was refused on the grounds she possessed "state secrets." Her room was bugged. She was followed. She was repeatedly detained and beaten. She was also fired from her job and, in order to avoid the charge of being a parasite, worked as a cleaning woman. She spent the next seven years trying to get out and sending chocolates, photographs, reading material, clothing, food and medicine to imprisoned Jews on the rare visits they could have with their families. She came to be known as the "guardian angel," of the "prisoners of conscience" and in the Soviet Jewish community, she became a legend.

Then on June 1, 1978, she hung a banner from the balcony of her Moscow apartment saying, "KGB, give me my visa." She was arrested and three weeks later convicted of malicious hooliganism and banished to Krivosheina, 1,800 miles east of Moscow. Her main companion was a collie that was with her when she returned to Moscow.

Marcia Weinberg, who is married to Rabbi Joseph Weinberg of the Washington Hebrew Congregation and who heads the Committee for Soviet Jewry here, met Ida Nudel shortly before her arrest. Nudel has been "adopted" as a special prisoner by the sisterhood of the Washington Hebrew Congregation.

After her release, says Weinberg, Nudel told her sister by telephone that she had been told she should "rehabilitate herself and become a good Soviet citizen." In April, she was denied permission to live in Moscow. Then she was sent to Riga. "But when she got to Riga she was told she couldn't live in Riga," says Weinberg.

The last contact she had with her sister came on the 13th of July. Weinberg says Nudel told her sister she had spend one night in a bus station. "This is when we, as a world group, became concerned," says Weinberg. "She's not an alarmist. She said, 'Don't try to reach me; I just don't know where I'm going to be. I will try to find you.' It was in that kind of despair she signed off and nobody knows where she is. We know she's not in Moscow and not in Riga." One theory is that she has been sent to a closed city where no Western press or tourists are allowed to go.

On Tuesday, July 20, a delegation from organizations concerned with Soviet Jews met with presidential assistant Elizabeth Dole. Dole, who is a member of Congressional Wives on Soviet Jewry, says Nudel's plight has now been drawn to the attention of the highest levels of the American government. The reduced flow of emigrants from the Soviet Union has been raised again and again at meetings with Soviet officials, says Dole, and it is a concern of which President Reagan often speaks.

The meeting with Dole left Weinberg with a profound sense of the difference between the two nations. "We could call the White House and say 'help.' The United States is a place where government can stop long enough to talk about one human being and that person's plight. It's such a juxtaposition to the Soviet Union where individuals are trampled on and stomped on and lost." Later that day, a vigil was held at the Soviet Embassy on Nudel's behalf; among the speakers was a representative of Dole's office.

What has happened to Ida Nudel is so alien to the American experience that it seems unbelievable. As Weinberg puts it, it is senseless. "It is almost like they are trying to destroy a spirit totally. For what? Why? She's done it already. She's been in exile, she's been in prison. It would just seem enough."

Sometimes the story of a single person can tell more about a system of government than all the statistics in the world. The Soviets have created a martyr, yet another human being who is a living indictment of a system that doesn't work. It is only fitting that when those in the free world think of the Soviet Union they should think, also, of Ida Nudel.●

THE PASSING OF CAREY CRONAN

● Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, those who serve the State of Connecticut in the Congress and a generation of newspaper readers across the State suffered a great loss this weekend with the passing of Carey Cronan, the dean of Connecticut's Washington press corps. Both the man and his work deserve our praise and recognition.

Carey Cronan began his career in journalism in 1928 as a reporter for the Bridgeport Telegram, for whom he wrote at his death. The pioneer reporter from Connecticut papers, Carey came to this city in 1949; for years he has been the elder statesman of an expanding Connecticut media contingent. During his three decades as a Washington correspondent for the Bridgeport Post and Telegram, the Stamford Advocate, the Waterbury Republican American, and the Greenwich Time, he provided much of the information the people of Connecticut have had about Washington during their lifetimes.

Over the dozen years that I worked with Carey Cronan, I was struck by the degree of his professionalism and the quality of his humanity. In fulfilling his role as a journalist, there were times when he made the people he covered mad. But they never stayed mad for long. Everyone realized that Carey Cronan's hard shots were always fair shots. There can be no higher praise for a newsman, or a person.

The career of this extraordinary man stretches over a very significant period in the development of journalism in this country. He was ahead of his time in recognizing that the integrity of his work required an objective distance between himself and those he covered. He was very much a figure in the tradition of front page newsmen who so deeply influenced the thoughts and concerns of the Nation during the fifties and sixties. he conveyed a sense of perspective and depth, which the urgency of electronic media cannot allow.

I will personally miss Carey's gentle, gracious manner. His wit and warmth charmed the mighty and the common over his 50 years in journalism. He enjoyed life and people with a special relish; no one who ever heard Carey tell one of his famous stories will dispute this. Carey Cronan led a full and rich life and he was good enough to share that richness with those he met.

Mr. President, the Nation relies on people like Carey Cronan to study, interpret, and report on the events and ideas of the day. Without men like him, our democracy is a blind and senseless object without the ability to respond to new challenges.

Carey Cronan was a remarkable person who will surely be missed for the contributions he made to people's understanding of events which affected them and to their enjoyment of life. For me, Washington has lost a landmark and I have lost a friend.●

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 9:30 A.M. ON THURSDAY, JULY 29, AND FRIDAY, JULY 30, 1982

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow and Friday, when the Senate completes its business on the preceding day, the Senate stand in recess until 9:30 a.m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The Senator does not mean 9:30 a.m. on Saturday?

Mr. BAKER. No, Mr. President, that is for Thursday and Friday.

ORDER FOR RECOGNITION OF SENATOR BRADLEY AND SENATOR CHILES TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I am advised that Senators BRADLEY and CHILES desire special orders for the morning. I ask unanimous consent that, after the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order, those Senators be granted special orders in that order for not more than 15 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS AND TO RESUME CONSIDERATION OF SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 58 TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, after the execution of the special orders tomorrow, there be a brief period for the transaction of routine morning business to extend not past the hour of 10:30 a.m., in which Senators may speak for not more than 2 minutes each and that, at the expiration of that time, the Senate resume consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 58.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Hearing none, it is so ordered.

RECESS UNTIL 9:30 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I know of no other business to be transacted by the Senate. In accordance with the order previously entered, I now move that the Senate stand in recess until 9:30 a.m. tomorrow.

There being no objection, at 6:27 p.m., the Senate recessed until tomorrow, Thursday, July 29, 1982, at 9:30 a.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Wednesday, July 28, 1982

The House met at 10 a.m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

May Your blessing, O Lord, be with those who truly seek Your way, Your truth, and Your life. Amid the competing voices that clamor for attention, may we hear also Your Word that has given purpose to the human family from the beginning of time. Open our ears to Your prophetic Word, our minds to Your enlightening Word, and our hearts and souls to Your comforting Word. And may Your peace that passes all human understanding guide us and keep us all our days. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

Mr. CARMAN. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to clause 1, rule I, I demand a vote on agreeing to the Chair's approval of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the Chair's approval of the Journal.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. CARMAN. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 346, nays 28, answered "present" 1, not voting 59, as follows:

So the Journal was approved.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Sparrow, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a joint resolution of the House of the following title:

H.J. Res. 494. Joint resolution with regard to Presidential certifications on conditions in El Salvador.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the amendments of the House to a bill of the Senate of the following title:

S. 2317. An act to recognize the organization known as the National Federation of Music Clubs.

MAKING IN ORDER ON THURSDAY, JULY 29, 1982, OR ANY DAY THEREAFTER, CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 6863, SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS, 1982

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it may be in order on Thursday, July 29, 1982, or any day thereafter, to consider the bill H.R. 6863, making supplemental appropriations for fiscal year 1982.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY TO SIT DURING 5-MINUTE RULE TODAY

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary may meet during the 5-minute rule today.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

CHANGES IN CIVIL DEFENSE

(Mr. BRINKLEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. BRINKLEY. Mr. Speaker, on civil defense, some Members may not be aware of our change in the law last year; 50 U.S.C.A. 2251, congressional declaration of policy, provides in part:

The Congress recognizes that the organizational structure established jointly by the Federal Government and the several States and their political subdivisions for civil defense purposes can be effectively utilized, without adversely affecting the attack-related civil defense objectives of this Act (sections 2251-2297 of this Appendix), to provide relief and assistance to people in areas of the United States struck by disasters other than disasters caused by enemy attack.

50 U.S.C.A. 2252 (b) and a portion of (c):

(b) The term "natural disaster" means any hurricane, tornado, storm, flood, high water, wind-driven water, tidal wave, tsunami, earthquake, volcanic eruption, landslide, mudslide, snowstorm, drought, fire, or other catastrophe in any part of the United States which causes, or which may cause, substantial damage or injury to civilian property or persons and, for the purposes of this Act (sections 2251 to 2303 of this Appendix), any explosion, civil disturbance, or any other manmade catastrophe shall be deemed to be a natural disaster;

(c) The term "civil defense" means all those activities and measures designed or undertaken (1) to minimize the effects upon the civilian population caused or which would be caused by an attack upon the United States or by a natural disaster, (2) to deal with the immediate emergency conditions which would be created by any such attack or natural disaster, and (3) to effectuate emergency repairs to, or the emergency restoration of, vital utilities and facilities destroyed or damaged by any such attack or natural disaster. . . .

Civil Defense is now dual use and we should approve the realistic funding provided in the defense authorization bill.

BUGGING AT A TOWN MEETING

(Mr. ERTEL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ERTEL. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to report an affront to the U.S. Congress.

Later today, during special orders, I will describe to my colleagues how a recent town meeting of mine was bugged. I am sure that my colleagues do not fear having their words quoted accurately from town meetings; but such taping has a very chilling effect on our constitutents who talk with us on a very personal basis during these meetings.

In fact, such secret activities are a serious breach of ethical standards.

Briefly, a campaign operative of my opponent, Richard Thornburgh, tried to hide behind a newspaper and secretly tape—without requesting anyone's permission—all local residents who attended my town meeting last Saturday in the Harrisburg area. I can only speculate that my comments were being recorded to trap me in a tough question or to twist my remarks for a campaign commercial against me or to set me up with a question from a supposedly disgruntled constituent.

Town meetings are a vital way many of us stay in touch with the concerns of our constituents and to hear firsthand what is on their minds; but in the hundreds of town meetings I have held in my 6 years in the House, I have never been subject to such a callous disregard for the rights of citizens to speak freely without fear of being recorded for political purposes.

TRIBUTE TO FEDERAL PROTECTIVE SERVICE OFFICER ROBERT YESUCEVITZ

(Mr. DONNELLY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, last Tuesday night in Boston an officer of the Federal Protective Service was killed in the line of duty.

Officer Robert Yesucevitz was on patrol outside the John Fitzgerald Kennedy Presidential Library in Boston. When he left his patrol car to investigate something suspicious, he was shot from behind. We do not know who killed him, or why.

Robert Yesucevitz was only 24 years old. He had worn the uniform of the Federal Protective Service proudly and honorably. For 4 years he had served in New England and at Fort Chaffee, Ark., when it housed Cuban refugees.

Sadly, Robert died less than a week before he planned to leave Federal Service to return to college. Because of budget cutbacks, the security staff at the Kennedy Library had been cut by two-thirds in the last 2 years. Robert was one of the only two guards on duty at night, something that concerned him very dearly.

I am certain I speak for you, Mr. Speaker, and the membership of this House, when I say that we join Robert's family in mourning his senseless death. We hope that his murderer will be brought to justice and we strongly urge the General Services Administration to provide adequate protection to make sure that this tragedy is not repeated.

A DANGEROUS PIECE OF LEGISLATION

(Mr. PAUL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PAUL. Mr. Speaker, last Friday early in the morning the other body passed a piece of legislation which I consider a rather dangerous piece of legislation. This is the size of it, it is 700 pages long, and what concerns me is that it is a bill to raise taxes by nearly $100 billion.

I believe this is a complete flaunting of the Constitution, because it says that all bills for raising revenues shall originate in the House of Representatives. All that the other body has done is take a number from the House of Representatives. Ironically, the bill that they used to raise taxes by $100 billion, when it was passed in the House lowered taxes by $1 billion.

I think that this is just a typical example of why the American people become cynical of what is happening here in Washington. Every American has learned in his early childhood that the House of Representatives is to originate all tax bills.

I think it is the duty of the leadership of this House and everyone in the House to totally ignore this bill. If we have to have a tax bill, it should originate in our Ways and Means Committee in the House of Representatives and we should not accept this bill written by the Senate.

I think it is bad tax policy, bad politics, and bad constitutional law.

THE LITTLE RED HEN WITH A BIG JOB

(Mr. EVANS of Delaware asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. EVANS of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, I am sure many of my colleagues are familiar with the old fable about the little red hen who had a big job to do. She had to plant her wheat so she would have food to eat. She asked all her friends to help plant it, but they said no, they would not help. She asked them to help water the wheat, and they said no. She asked them to help harvest the wheat, and help make it into bread, and still they refused to help. But, when it came time to eat the bread, all of them asked if they could help her out.

Mr. Speaker, I believe our distinguished Democratic colleagues on the Ways and Means Committee may have had this little story in mind. They do not appear to want to help in the big job of turning this economy around. They apparently do not want to help make the Senate-passed tax plan more palatable. But, I will bet my bottom dollar that when the economy does turn around all the Democrats—especially those on Ways and Means—will be clamoring to join in the political feast.

SAD NEWS—FEDERAL BORROWING WILL CONTINUE

(Mr. CORCORAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CORCORAN. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the House Appropriations Committee took up the matter of the so-called Evans-Corcoran housing stimulus program and came to no resolution.

Also yesterday, you may remember that in the financial pages across the United States there was the twofold report: No. 1, that there has begun the attempt to lower the prime rate of interest from 16 percent to 15½ percent; but also in most of these stories there was the No. 2 point and that is the sad news that Federal borrowing is going to continue to have very heavy upward pressure on interest rates.

Mr. Speaker, today the Treasury will announce that between now and September 30, the Federal Government will be required to borrow $45 billion. This announcement comes on the heels of new CBO projections of escalating budget deficits which will in turn force more Federal borrowing.

This Treasury borrowing will keep pressure on the financial markets. Interest rates will remain high and the recovery will be further delayed.

We can and must do something now to ease the terrible burden Federal borrowing is putting on the credit markets. And we can help the housing industry without adding further to that burden. How? By adopting the Evans-Corcoran amendment to the regular supplemental appropriations bill. We will provide $1 billion in interest rate buydown assistance from funding authority now appropriated for use by the Synthetic Fuels Corporation. We would also suspend the award of $5 to $6 billion in additional federally guaranteed credit now scheduled to be made this year by the Synthetic Fuels Corporation.

At a time when interest rates are so high that hundreds of oil and gas rigs are idle—when we cannot even afford to develop our conventional supplies of oil and gas as we should be—where is the sense in putting more pressure on interest rates by funding exotic and risky synthetic fuels projects?

The Evans-Corcoran amendment makes sense from the standpoint of housing, from the standpoint of energy security, and most importantly, from the standpoint of interest rate relief. Please give us your support.

HOUSE SHOULD ACT ON BALANCED BUDGET AMENDMENT

(Mr. WALKER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, the American people are asking why this House has not yet taken up the balanced budget amendment to the Constitution.

We see the other body working on such an amendment, and yet despite the fact that this House has a balanced budget bill with 231 cosponsors on it, we are not working on such an amendment here.

Normally when you get a bill with that many cosponsors, we bring it out on the floor under unanimous consent, or at least under suspension of the rules. We are not bringing it out at all.

The reason why the American people's question is valid is because that bill is bottled up in committee. The leadership of this House is not permitting that bill onto the House floor. I think that the American people should know that if a balanced budget amendment to the Constitution is not passed this year, it will be because it was bottled up by the Democrats in the House of Representatives.

EQUITY IN EDUCATION

(Mrs. HECKLER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. HECKLER. Mr. Speaker, the Women's Educational Equity Act program provides for the development and distribution of educational materials and programs to assure fairness for girls and women in our educational system. Equity in education is the goal of this program, which has been a priority of mine since I helped get the authorizing legislation enacted in 1974.

This significant program must be continued, as stated in a letter I wrote the Appropriations Committee earlier this month. The program was nearly "zeroed" out of the budget last year, but intensive negotiations saved its funding. This summer, with the cooperation of Department of Education officials and the Appropriations Committee, $1 million in funding has been preserved for the Educational Development Center in Newton, Mass., of which $186,981 is expected to go to the outstanding Wellesley Center for Research on Women, which reviews, publishes, and distributes materials funded by WEAA.

Maintenance and strengthening of the full WEAA program should be a priority of this Congress, to assure education free of sex bias and stereotyping and filled with career options for the girls and women whom we represent. The next time you ask a young constituent what she wants to be when she grows up, think about what you can do for her—through WEAA—in helping her fulfill her potential.

STRATEGIC TRADE ACT OF 1982

(Mrs. BYRON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. BYRON. Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to inform my colleagues that I am introducing the Strategic Trade Act of 1982.

This week we will be asked to approve the authorization of more than $22 billion in defense funds that are intended to provide the advanced technology that helps defend our country.

The encouragement of technology is certainly a sound policy for the United States to follow. But there is one serious drawback. U.S. technology that is employed in civilian sector products is finding its way to the Soviet Union. And the Soviets are turning this technology against us. U.S. technology is being used directly in the production of better weapons for the Soviet military. These same weapons must be countered by the huge amount of DOD funding that this House will seek to authorize this week.

The Strategic Trade Act of 1982 will provide for closer control of the export of technology. As a result, we should expect a reduction in the Soviet use of our own technology against us and our allies. We cannot afford to spend $22 billion on defense R. & D. this year, only to find out 5 years from now that we must spend even more to protect ourselves from our very own technology.

NO AID TO EL SALVADOR

(Mr. WEISS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, it is shocking and dismaying news that the administration has renewed certification for military aid to El Salvador. The recertification arrives on the heels of continuing reports of torture and repression at the hands of the new Salvadoran regime of Alvaro Magana.

The recertification is based on information given to the President which describe more of what the President wishes to hear and less of what is actually taking place in El Salvador. However, information that the White House actually received detailed descriptions of the most inhumane acts of torture from the American Embassy there before issuing the recertification report is cause for even greater alarm.

It is clear to all of us now that the new Salvadoran regime is failing to carry out the reforms it has promised, and worse, has made no progress toward assuring human rights there. One can only assume from the President's recertification request for aid to such a repressive regime, that the administration's own commitment to human rights is questionable as well.

We must not allow our Government to aid repression abroad.

SECRETARY WATT SHOULD RESIGN

(Mr. SKELTON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, a number of days ago Secretary of Interior James Watt came to Missouri and told of his approval of diverting water from the upper part of the Missouri River, which announcement caused considerable concern to those of us from the State of Missouri.

More recently, the Secretary of the Interior has delved into foreign affairs, creating a serious question as to his advisability of serving as a member of the Cabinet. Because of his recent action, I call for his resignation.

By a recent letter to certain Congressmen, Secretary James Watt suggested military force may be necessary to obtain energy supplies in the Middle East. Secretary Watt wrote Members of this body defending his plan for leasing offshore lands for oil and gas drilling.

In that letter, the Secretary of the Interior wrote:

> The world's political leadership will secure with economic strength or military force the needed energy.

I deplore the Secretary using such language. First, Mr. Speaker, he is not the Secretary of State; second, he is not the Secretary of Defense; and third, it is improper for any Cabinet official to loosely talk about the use of military force. He has no legal or constitutional grounds to have any jurisdiction over American forces.

His statement is unwise. The statements about possible military intent are used by our enemies to turn world opinion against us. They undermine the credibility of our foreign diplomats everywhere.

It would be unacceptable for even the lowest Government official to make such statements. It is unforgivable for a Cabinet Secretary, the Secretary of the Interior, to make such statements.

PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 6862, REDUCTION IN BUDGET AUTHORITY AND OUTLAYS UNDER CERTAIN CIVIL SERVICE PROGRAMS, 1983

Mr. BEILENSON. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 536 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 536

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 6862) to reduce budget authority and outlays under certain civil service programs pursuant to the first concurrent resolution on the budget—fiscal year 1983, and the first reading of the bill shall be dispensed with. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, the bill shall be considered as having been read for amendment under the five-minute rule. No amendment to the bill shall be in order except the following amendment, which shall not be subject to amendment, but shall be debatable for not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the proponent of the amendment, and a Member opposed thereto, and all points of order against said amendment for failure to comply with the provisions of clause 7, rule XVI are hereby waived:

After section 3, add the following new section:

"4 PERCENT LIMIT ON COST-OF-LIVING ADJUSTMENTS UNDER FEDERAL RETIREMENT PROGRAMS

"SEC. 4. (a)(1) The amount of any annuity increase in fiscal years 1983, 1984, and 1985 under section 8340(b) of title 5, United States Code, (relating to cost-of-living adjustments for civil service retirees and survivors) shall not exceed 4 percent each year. For purposes of subsection (c) of such section 8340, the applicable percent change computed each such year under subsection (b) of section 8340 shall be deemed not to exceed 4 percent.

"(2) The amount of any annuity increase in fiscal years 1983, 1984, and 1985 pursuant to section 826 of the Foreign Service Act of 1980 (relating to cost-of-living adjustments for foreign service retirees and survivors) shall not exceed 4 percent each year.

"(3) The amount of any annuity increase in fiscal years 1983, 1984, and 1985 pursuant to the Central Intelligence Agency Act of 1964 for Certain Employees (50 U.S.C. 403 note) shall not exceed 4 percent each year.

"(b) The amount of any increase in fiscal years 1983, 1984, and 1985 in retired and retainer pay or annuities pursuant to section 1401a(b) of title 10, United States Code, (relating to members and former members of the armed forces, including the Coast Guard, the commissioned corps of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, and the Public Health Service, and their survivors) shall not exceed 4 percent each year.".

At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California (Mr. BEILENSON) is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. BEILENSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield the customary 30 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LATTA) for purposes of debate only, and pending that I yield myself such time as I may use.

Mr. Speaker, the reconciliation savings recommendations of the committee on Post Office and Civil Service were contained in H.R. 6785 which was reported from the committee on July 23, 1982. Section 3 of that bill established a new entitlement of a 4-percent minimum pay increase for Federal employees effective for fiscal year 1983. Under House procedures this new entitlement would require referral to the Committee on Appropriations. However, it was not the intention of the Post Office Committee to provide a new entitlement. Therefore, section 3 has been redrafted in a manner to eliminate the entitlement authority and the new language together with the other provisions of H.R. 6785 have been incorporated in the bill, H.R. 6862, which is made in order by this rule.

The new language in H.R. 6862 provides that the October 1982 pay increase for Federal employees shall be 4 percent—the amount assumed in the first budget resolution—if the President submits an alternative plan for less than 4 percent and either House of Congress disapproves that plan.

Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the request of the chairman of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, House Resolution 536 is a modified closed rule providing for the consideration of H.R. 6862. The rule provides 1 hour of general debate to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. In order to expedite consideration of the bill, the rule provides that H.R. 6862 shall be considered as read for amendment.

The Post Office Committee rejected the 4-percent cap on cost-of-living adjustments for retirees, and as recently as May 27, 1982, the House voted 327 to 94 on the Downey amendment to House Concurrent Resolution 345 to reject the cap on COLA's. However, the Committee on Rules granted Chairman FORD's request to allow an amendment which would impose a 4-percent cap on cost-of-living adjustments for civil service, Foreign Service, and military retirees. This amendment would not be subject to amendment and no other amendments to the bill would be in order. This rule adequately protects the rights of the minority while protecting the prerogatives of the Post Office Committee in reporting reconciliation savings within its jurisdiction as directed by the first budget resolution.

Mr. Speaker, it should be noted that the amendment is open to debate for 1 hour to be equally divided and controlled by the proponent of the amendment and a Member opposed to the amendment. Further, the rule waives points of order against the amendment for failure to comply with the provisions of clause 7, rule XVI—which prohibits nongermane amendments. This waiver is necessary because the bill contains no provision relating to cost-of-living adjustments and therefore a COLA amendment would otherwise not be germane. House Resolution 536 also provides one motion to recommit.

H.R. 6862 proposed reductions in outlays for fiscal year 1982 of $32 million and $113 million over the 3-year period of fiscal year 1983 through fiscal year 1985. These savings are accomplished by a provision which requires that civil service annuity benefits be rounded to the next lowest dollar and by providing for later annuity commencing dates for employees and Members who retire voluntarily. These proposals were recommended by the Office of Personnel Management and will reduce outlays by $32 million, $37 million, and $44 million in fiscal years 1983, 1984, and 1985 respectively.

Mr. Speaker, undoubtedly there will be considerable debate and controversy when this bill is considered. House Resolution 536 will provide the House with an opportunity to work its will on the cuts proposed by the Post Office and Civil Service Committee.

I urge adoption of the resolution.

□ 1045

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, so there will be no misunderstanding about my position on this rule, let me say that I am opposed to it and I urge its defeat.

The bill under consideration by this rule does not properly belong on the floor of the House. If we go ahead and pass this rule and debate and vote on this bill, the House of Representatives will be in clear violation not only of the budget resolution it adopted last month, but of the Budget Act itself. Such a procedure, which ignores the spending reductions passed by this Congress, would bring the economic recovery just now getting underway to a dead stop.

The Budget Act adopted by Congress in 1974 is precise in its instructions for handling the reconciliation process. Section 310 of the act states that the budget resolution directs standing committees to determine and recommend changes in the law to achieve savings. Such recommendations are to be submitted to the House and Senate Budget Committees for inclusion in an omnibus reconciliation bill. The Budget Act reads, and let me quote:

> Upon receiving all such recommendations, the Budget Committee shall report to its House a reconciliation bill or reconciliation resolution, or both, carrying out all such recommendations without any substantive revision.

I would like to repeat that key phrase:

> Shall—
> Shall report to its House a reconciliation bill or reconciliation resolution . . . .

Let me say to my friends, that is clear. That language is clear. The intent of the act is that reconciliation instructions are to be sent to the Budget Committee, which will draft a single reconciliation bill for consideration by the House. In this case, this bill was not sent to the Budget Committee, nor did the Budget Committee package it in an omnibus bill as provided by the act itself.

The American Law Division of the Library of Congress conducted a study of the legislative history of the 1974 act, and confirmed that it was the intent of the Congress that the Budget Committee report out a single reconciliation bill. Let me say to my colleagues, the Senate is complying with the act. The committees of the Senate have complied with the act, and the Budget Committee of the Senate has complied with the act and has reported a single omnibus reconciliation bill which is now on the desk in the Senate and will be taken up on Wednesday next.

So, why not the House of Representatives? Why is the House Budget Committee being bypassed, and why is this bill being brought directly to the floor? Is the leadership willing to see the House fail in its duty to meet the spending targets it voted?

Let me say that the American people do not want to see the House fail in this responsibility. The people paying those high interest rates across the country because of the outrageous spending approved by this Congress do not want to see the House fail in its responsibility. Well, let me say that, if the House passes this rule to report out this bill ignoring its responsibility and ignoring the mandate of this Congress to make certain reductions, we might just as well bid goodbye to the reductions we are now experiencing in interest rates across this country, which everybody wants, because the money markets will be saying, "The Congress did not mean what it said. It does not have the courage to stand up and vote for the reductions which it said should be made."

Certainly, that reason alone should say to the responsible Members of this Congress who want to see interest rates reduced, to vote against this rule. I cannot for the life of me see any political advantage which might inure to somebody voting against reductions in spending already mandated by this Congress and expected by the American people.

Do we want that $140 billion deficit? Do we want the $182 billion deficit from which we were working when we put in place the budget resolution? What really do we want? I think what the American people want out of this House of Representatives is some responsibility, to act responsibly for a change, and to step up to its responsibility. The only way it can do that is to vote down this rule, because I think we are going to see, if this rule, passes and this bill comes up, that courage is going to be lacking. The people who drafted that Budget Act knew something about courage around this place when they put in that proviso for an omnibus package, one bill to be presented to this Congress. The U.S. Senate has already concurred in the Budget Act and is acting accordingly.

Why not the House of Representatives? Even if it were proper for this bill to be brought directly to the floor, the rule ought to be voted down because it is an attempt to circumvent specific instructions, specific instructions on reconciliation approved by this House in the fiscal 1983 budget resolution for this particular committee.

Now, let me read the instructions to the Post Office and Civil Service Committee contained in the budget resolution just passed a matter of a few weeks ago:

> The House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(c) of Public Law 93-344 sufficient to reduce budget authority by zero and outlays by $376 million in fiscal year 1983; to reduce budget authority by $244 million and outlays by $1 billion 61 million in fiscal year 1984; and to reduce budget authority by $538 million and outlays by $1 billion 808 million in fiscal year 1985.

I end the quote from the budget resolution itself, passed by this House and by the Senate of the United States. Now, what exactly does all this mean? It means that the Post Office and Civil Service Committee was to identify and recommend savings of $376 million for fiscal year 1983 and $3.2 billion over 3 years. Let me repeat—$3.2 billion in savings over 3 years.

What does the bill do that this rule would make in order? It proposes savings of only $32 million in fiscal year 1983 and $113 million over 3 years. That is only 8.5 percent of the savings mandated in the budget resolution for fiscal year 1983, and less than 3.5 percent of the savings mandated over 3 years. Let me repeat—only 3.5 percent of the savings assumed in the budget resolution this House adopted last month.

I just do not understand those Members who seem to think we can simply continue spending and spending and spending and be able to go back home and try to hoodwink the American public into believing that we are not responsible for the high interest rates and the inflation that we have had in this country. How foolish-minded do they think the American people are? They are a lot smarter than a good many Members of this House might think they are.

Who do we think we are fooling if we pass this rule and this bill that it makes in order? Not the American people. A poll taken in June by Time magazine showed that 55 percent of the people blame this Congress for the huge deficits we face. Another 17 percent said Congress and the President share joint responsibility. Now, if the economic recovery that we certainly want to see take place fails, the fault will not lie with Reaganomics as some people like to say is the fault of our decline everybody knows that this recession started last July, even before Reaganomics went into effect. The responsibility will lie with those who prevent the Budget Act itself—that is, a matter of law—from being used and implemented in this House.

Go back home and try to escape that one, because the law is clear; the budget resolution is clear, and now it is up to this House to put up or shut up.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. LOTT).

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, this rule is clearly a travesty on our whole budget process. The vote on this rule is not simply a procedural vote, but rather a vote on whether we are deadly serious about holding down deficits and upholding the budget process that will make that possible. This is the most blatant attempt to subvert the budget process that I have seen in the past 2 years.

The whole question posed by this rule is whether we are going to turn our backs on the reconciliation provisions of the Budget Act and the most recently passed budget resolution, and let fiscal chaos reign once again in this Congress. There can be no question that the first budget resolution adopted this year calls for a single reconciliation bill to be reported from the Budget Committee and consisting of the instructions of the nine committees under reconciliation. This rule and the bill it makes in order violates that mandate and violates the whole principle of reconciliation as embodied in the Budget Act.

Now, look at the process that is being used here. First of all, there has been a change in the bill since it was reported from the Post Office and Civil Service Committee, as I understand. I do not believe there is a bill available here for the Members to look at. I have not been able to find a bill here today.

What about the schedule that is being used here? This is a closed rule. A majority of the House led by the majority leadership certainly should be capable of passing such a blatantly ridiculous rule if it would keep us from upholding reconciliation, and it is on a fast track. We were told yesterday in the Rules Committee that it would be brought up Thursday. As the minority whip, I have not even had a chance to have a whip check on our side. We were going to have a conference to discuss this issue tomorrow.

But, no, not only do we have a closed rule, not only are we in the minority around here—although we are fixing to see on the vote on this rule—but we do not even have time to notify our Members of the issue. The issue is clearly reconciliation and the procedure that is being used. It is being used in the most blatant way to try to stop an opportunity to enforce the budget cuts that we called for in the budget resolution earlier this year.

Mr. Speaker, I might be willing to give the Democrats some credit for playing a clever partisan game if I did not think the consequences of that game were so vital for this institution and the budget process and the American people. This is the process that we established to try to discipline ourselves.

The choice on this rule is very simple, in my mind. A vote for the rule is a vote to scuttle the budget process and drive up deficits and interest rates. A vote against the rule is a vote to preserve the budget process and exercise fiscal discipline and restraint. This is only the first little cut, the first attempt to bleed us time and time again from now through September, in every instance trying to avoid implementing budget restraints. This bill, if we look at the substance, is only 8.5 percent of what was supposed to be included in it.

Mr. Speaker, I say to the Members, do not let this start now. Let us defeat this rule.

Mr. BEILENSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentlewoman from Colorado (Mrs. SCHROEDER) for purposes of debate only.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, I had originally come to the floor planning to support the rule, but I want to make sure that I understand it.

I serve on the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, and I sat in the Rules Committee yesterday when they were writing it and I thought I understood it, but I think it is being misconstrued on the other side. But let me make sure.

If I might ask the gentleman from California (Mr. BEILENSON) this: As I understand it, the Rules Committee wrote the rule very narrowly so it deals with reconciliation, and there is an amendment allowed by any Member in the House who wants to offer it to put in the COLA cap; is that correct?

Mr. BEILENSON. The gentlewoman is correct.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. No one Member was given that? It is just not one Member who is not here? There was not anything devious about that; is that correct?

Mr. BEILENSON. That is correct. Any Member may propose that amendment. If I may tell the gentlewoman this, if that amendment is adopted, then savings greater than those proposed in the budget resolution will have been attained.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from California (Mr. BEILENSON), because I think that is very important.

The way I understood it yesterday is that this amendment would be prepared. The Rules Committee felt they must go along with the instructions that the other side keeps talking about, and they very narrowly drafted it. But there is no proprietorship. Any Member who votes "no" on this rule should not do that, because they can come down and take the amendment and show great leadership ability and make this bill meet the budget.

Mr. BEILENSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentlewoman again is correct.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I will yield in just a second, but first I want to ask the gentleman from California (Mr. BEILENSON) one other question.

One of the reasons I appeared in front of the Rules Committee was that I wanted to make sure it was very clear there was another option that could be had to meet reconciliation, and that was to deal with the dual pay for military retirees amendment.

Mr. Speaker, as you know, the Post Office and Civil Service Committee was instructed to reduce budget outlays by $3.245 billion over the next 3 years. We gave careful consideration to the reconciliation instructions and the thinking behind them and concluded that we could not, in good faith, recommend the passage of legislation to cut benefits by this amount. So, the committee voted to report two minor, yet wholly justified, changes in retirement law, which save $113 million over 3 years.

The President and the Republicans who drafted the budget obviously thought we should put a 4-percent cap on the cost-of-living adjustment (COLA) provided for those on civil service retirement and other government retirement systems. The fact that they picked on retirees is no longer surprising. In 1980, we were forced, through the reconciliation process, to eliminate proration and the look back for those newly retiring. In 1981, we were directed to eliminate the twice a year cost-of-living adjustment and establish a once a year COLA. Now, we are being told to reduce the real annuity received by retirees by 3 or 4 percent, by shaving their inflation protection. I think we have reduced the benefits of Government retirees enough.

Therefore, I asked the Rules Committee to make in order, as a substitute to the COLA cap amendment, if it is offered, an amendment to achieve the same amount of savings through treating military retirees, who work for the Federal Government, in the same way we treat civil service retirees. This proposal would save substantially more money than the COLA cap in fiscal year 1983 and about the same amount over the 3-year period.

Right now, reemployed civil service annuitants suffer a dollar-for-dollar reduction in their civil service pay for every annuity dollar they receive. This is based on the policy judgment that no individual should receive both retirement pay from a Federal retirement system and salary for active Federal service during the same period. Despite this offset, we have around 2,300 reemployed annuitants in the Federal work force.

For retired military, however, there is no similar offset. A retired officer may receive the first $6,000 or so of his or her military retired pay plus one-half of the remainder. No reduction at all applies to retired reserve officers or retired enlisted personnel working for the Government. Additionally, a maximum cap, now set at $57,500, for combined salary and retired pay was established as part of the Civil Service Reform Act of 1978.

This amendment has two arguments in its favor. It saves the required amount of money and it is equitable and fair. Undoubtedly, it does take actual dollars away from identifiable individuals. Unfortunately, that is true of all cuts in the civil service area. The question is, From which class of people is it less unfair to take benefits? In this situation, the arguments overwhelmingly favor adoption of this dual pay amendment.

Our experience with reconciliation a year ago demonstrates all that is wrong with the process. Making in order an alternative savings proposal will vindicate what I believe is the intent behind the reconciliation process: to let the House work its will on how cuts should be made.

The Rules Committee decided that would be going, I think, too far outside the instructions, so they did not allow that amendment. But I think I heard the gentleman from California say that the minority still had the right to try to recommit the bill, and I assume they could attach the double-dipping amendment on the recommittal and still bring the bill in under the budget figure if they decided they did not want to go with the specific recommendation that they do the COLA; is that correct?

Mr. BEILENSON. The gentlewoman is correct. The minority does have the right to propose a recommittal motion at the end.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. But only the minority could do that?

Mr. BEILENSON. Yes, the minority has priority of recognition.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, could the gentlewoman tell me whether or not this amendment to which she refers would achieve the full savings that were directed for her committee on reconciliation?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Both amendments, as I understand it, would. Both the double-dipping amendment and the COLA amendment would comply with the reconciliation instruction.

Mr. LOTT. Now, the gentlewoman says, "both the double-dipping and the COLA amendments," but as I understand it, the COLA amendment, even if it were added to this bill, would still be about 10 percent short of the reconciliation that was mandated for the committee. Maybe if you add the double-dipping to it also, it would get closer to it, but I think the membership needs to know that this amendment that is being discussed would, in fact, not achieve the full savings that were mandated for this committee.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, my understanding, if I may respond to that, is that either way it would come in closer to the numbers or near the numbers, or what have you—either one of those amendments, not both. Either one or the other would bring it down to the level.

There is one other thing I want to point out, and I see the chairman of our committee here, who has been very good on this issue. I want to point out that the committee has worked very hard on these issues in the past. In 1978 we put the cap on double dipping to limit total pay to executive level V, which is now $57,500. That was known as the Joe Califano-Cook amendment. We have made serious pension changes twice, in 1980 and 1981. There were major changes in the pension.

As we know, there is a cap on the pay in this bill. The committee felt that they did not, as a majority, support the budget that passed this House.

We were being mandated to do it. We had not voted for that mandate, and so the fairest thing was to give the side that voted for the budget the right to come in and put it in.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is very important to set the record straight on that.

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I am delighted to yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the minority whip did not want to intentionally mislead the House when he was throwing numbers around. I hope he was listening to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LATTA), the accepted Republican expert on this budget process in the House, when he explained that the real goal we ought to reach is what the other body did. The adoption of the amendment that is being made in order to this bill would very nearly conform the House numbers with the Senate numbers. In addition, it would deal with four committee jurisdictions on the pension caps and have that issue behind us once and for all in this session.

By following this course we give the gentleman and his party, who are so completely convinced that what they did in adopting Gramm-Latta was correct. There will be no misunderstanding in the American public's mind about which Members have the courage and which of us do not have the courage to stand up when it is time to be counted as to who wishes to balance the budget on the backs of the people who served in our military and our Government and are now retired.

It seems that some Members on the other side of the aisle have lost track of the issue presented by this rule and the amendment to be voted on in their anxiety to find a parliamentary way to weasel out of exercising their duties. I am disappointed in the minority.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentlewoman from Colorado (Mrs. SCHROEDER) has expired.

Mr. LATTA. I yield myself 1 minute, and I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. LOTT).

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that I must respond to some of the comments that were made here. First of all, under the rule, at least with the motion to recommit, the so-called double-dipper amendment would not be in order.

Second, as to what the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. FORD) said about complying with what the other body did, I do not think that this institution or this body should ever be totally guided by what is done in the other body. We have our own guidelines, our own reconciliation process.

Finally, as far as the committee's striving so hard to come up with this bill, it reminds me of a story I heard about the elephant that went into labor and produced a mouse. That is all we have got here, a very small mouse, not the large reconciliation effort that should be coming out of this committee.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, if I may reclaim my time, let me also add that there is nothing in the Budget Act itself that provides for this procedure that is attempted to be used here. The act places responsibility on the committees to come forward with the recommendations mandated by the House and the Senate.

There is no escape hatch. It is their responsibility to come forward, and in this case they do not come forward with those recommendations.

Mr. BEILENSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. PANETTA) for purposes of debate only.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, I do not normally like to overdramatize votes and particularly votes when it comes to rules which I consider largely procedural questions. But from a budget perspective, the vote the Members face is, I think, one of the most important votes they will cast in this session. It will set the stage for whether we can deal with reconciliation on an orderly basis, allowing packages, allowing committees to come to the floor and allowing Members to vote up or down on those issues, or whether we are going to capitulate to the same kind of chaos, the same kind of irresponsibility that this House went through last year when we had an up or down vote on a last-minute, 800-page amendment.

That, frankly, is the choice. Push aside all the rhetoric. That is the choice, whether we are going to give Members the ability to vote up or down on the cuts that they support in a budget resolution or whether we are going to open the door to the kind of budget games that have undermined the budget process in the past. We cannot have it both ways.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PANETTA. I will yield at the end of my remarks.

We cannot have it both ways. Members cannot come here and support a budget resolution that calls for certain cuts and then hide from the ability to vote up or down on those cuts. They cannot go back to the people and say "Gee, I would have liked to have helped you, but it was all packaged in one vote and I could not vote up or down on that particular issue."

Well, this is your chance. If you vote against this rule, make no mistake about it, you are voting to hid from the people and from your legislative responsibilities.

This rule implements the budget resolution. The Committee on Post Office and Civil Service failed to meet its requirements under the instructions on reconciliation. They did not implement the 4-percent cap. This rule—and I ask the Members to read the rule—permits the amendment to implement the 4-percent cap. It provides exactly for what was called for in the budget resolution.

That amendment is contained in the rule, and this House ought to have the opportunity to vote on it. That is the enforcement tool in the budget process. We allow the Members of the House to vote up or down on these issues, and if you vote for this amendment, over 3 years we will achieve $3 billion in savings, which is very close to the total target that was contained in the reconciliation instructions.

Second, this rule does not violate reconciliation.

Yesterday we had a package vote on the veterans' bill. Everybody is jumping up and down now about whether somehow we ought to put this all in one bill. We had a vote yesterday on the veterans' package. I did not hear anybody complain about that. There was not even one vote against that package on the veterans' bill. It passed overwhelmingly. That was a separate package on reconciliation.

We have done the same thing in the past, on the Ways and Means Committee, on the Armed Services Committee, and on the Small Business Committee. When they have adopted separate pieces of legislation, we have then referred to those separate pieces of legislation and incorporated them in reconciliation.

Let me make clear that, we have the power under the Budget Act to implement these procedures. It is contained in section 301(b)(2). If we want a fixed interpretation of the Budget Act, we ought not to even have reconciliation after the first budget resolution. The Budget Act specifically calls for it after the second budget resolution.

So we do have the power to be able to bring it to the floor in packages, as we are.

Lastly, this rule preserves the legislative process. I know that there appears to be a trend to hide Members, to insulate Members from these votes. Very frankly, that is the best way to undermine the budget process, that is, to constantly hide the Members from making the tough votes. Last year we paid a terrible price for that. We ought not to have to pay the same price this year.

So this is a test vote. It is a test vote on the budget process, it is a test vote on the reconciliation process, but, most importantly, it is a test vote on the legislative process.

Mr. Speaker, I ask the Members to support this rule.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 1 minute.

Mr. Speaker, I listened very intently to the gentleman's remarks. He seemed to forget that the Senate has already packaged the instructions in a reconciliation bill.

Now, I see the gentleman is approaching the microphone, and I will be happy to yield to him later.

I ask him, what are you going to do when it comes over here in a package? Are you going to dismantle it and destroy it?

The Senate has already complied with the terms, and the language is crystal clear. I am surprised at the gentleman, who has always supported this process, saying now that we ought to dismantle it.

□ 1115

The other body has gone the proper way as prescribed by law. What is the gentleman going to do when they come over here with this package?

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LATTA. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. PANETTA. If the gentleman is so concerned about it, why did he not raise an objection to the veterans package that was passed on yesterday?

Mr. LATTA. I will be happy to answer that question.

It is because that bill was under suspension of the rules.

Mr. PANETTA. The gentleman could have objected. It was much easier to defeat under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. LATTA. It was under a suspension of the rules and you have to have more than that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MURTHA). The time of the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LATTA) has expired.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKI).

Mr. DERWINSKI. First, Mr. Speaker, I wish to apologize to the House. I sent out a "Dear Colleague" and made mention of the fact that we would be dealing with the Post Office and Civil Service Committee reconciliation bill.

That is not the fact. We are dealing with a Rules Committee bill because it was discovered that there were many technical deficiencies in the bill. So the bill you have before you never came out of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee. It was hastily produced in the Rules Committee.

Then I am a little bit surprised at my dear friend from California and the chairman of the committee. They seem to converge in a critique of Republicans claiming, in the case of the gentleman from California, that by fighting the rule we are hiding from the reality of the budget procedure.

Then my dear chairman used the word "weaseling out." I am a little shocked at that.

But the facts are that that kind of criticism from the leaders of the majority of the majority seems rather innocent at a time when they seem to be hiding from or weaseling out from the tax package.

I cannot help but make that observation.

But what are the facts here? The facts are that we were supposed to produce $376 million in savings. We produced in round figures $32 million. That is 8.5 percent of what the goal should have been.

Then the political cleverness comes when the issue of the COLA is raised. Presumably, it is political brilliance to put the 4-percent COLA cap on the back of the Republicans as if they are, therefore, the enemies of the Federal retiree.

Just the opposite. We are the friends of the Federal retirees because by singling out the Federal retirees for exceptional largesse at a time when we have unemployment figures rising across the country, when unions are negotiating pay cuts for their members, when working Federal employees will settle for 4 percent, is to put a tremendous spotlight of public concern on the Federal retirees.

In my opinion it will jeopardize their entire retirement program in a wave of public reform.

I am not going to be here a year from now. But you will have that hot potato in the next session when your Federal retirees come to you and say, "Save us, save us from merger into Social Security."

The culprits will be those who have put the spotlight of public attention on this unfortunate manipulation of the COLA for short-term political expediency.

I strongly urge that the rule be rejected. I think this bill and this rule are a bad procedure. I think they are bad government. But, more than that, they are bad politics.

The politics that is being played is bad. It is shortsighted and in the long run it is against the best interests of Federal retirees, Federal employees, not to mention the poor beleagured taxpayer who the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LATTA) defends so well.

I would hope that the House would rise above this political ploy and the expediency and reject the rule. That would be the practical position.

We will then go back to the committee, mandated by a vote on the floor of the House, and we will come back with figures meeting the entire budget resolution target.

If we should happen not to convince the Members and we do not defeat the rule, then I will be prepared tomorrow to explain to you in much more detail why political practicality and good government votes will be on the side of capping the COLA and achieving savings rather than manipulating and misusing the Federal retirees for a short-term political gain.

Mr. BEILENSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished chairman of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee, the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. FORD).

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I would say first, as I have said before on this floor, there is no Member for whom I have a higher regard and more respect than the gentleman who has just spoken, the ranking Republican on the committee, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKI). His record of concern for and support for the Federal employee is certainly without question and there is no one in my 18 years on the Post Office and Civil Service Committee who has done more.

I am going to miss him in the next Congress because he has been an extremely valuable person to this House.

I would just call attention of the House to the minority views on H.R. 6785 filed following the committee action on this bill.

Those minority views start out as follows:

> The issue is not cost of living adjustments. The majority of the minority on the committee always has supported the COLA principle.

Then after meandering around they finish the minority views with this statement:

> We are convinced the 4-percent COLA cap will be given a strong vote of support when the issue is resolved on the House floor.

Because of this and my conversations with the gentleman representing the minority, I went to the Rules Committee and asked that the Rules Committee make in order, as it has in this rule, an amendment to permit the minority to test this statement on the floor:

> We are convinced the 4-percent COLA cap will be given a strong vote of support when the issue is resolved on the House floor.

The adoption of this rule makes it possible to resolve the issue of COLA on the floor.

The report signed by a majority of the minority, that this rule is exactly what they were telling me as chairman they wanted to have happen. We should support this rule, and have a clear-cut vote in the House on this issue of capping retired Federal employees COLA.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MICHEL).

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to pick up on the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKI) at the very outset, for I come from a district where at Caterpillar Tractor Co. we have seen workers taking pay reductions, John Deere freezing company pay, and the steelworkers taking $1.65 an hour in cuts, plus fringe benefits that aggregate nearly $4 an hour.

Under those circumstances I find it difficult to just roll over and acquiesce to this proposal to lift the 4-percent cap on Federal, civilian retirees benefits that was imposed in our budget resolution.

Particularly at a time when you have the cost of living index at less than 3 percent for 4 or 5 months running, what better time is there for capping a COLA, not only for Federal retirees but for Federal pay both military and civilianwise.

I would go one step further to say if we could have done it across the board even social security recipients could have lived with a 4-percent increase effective July 1.

It is just too bad that we did not all have the guts around here earlier in the year when that was one of the issues that was supposed to be addressed by the so-called Gang of 17.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is amusing, yet tragic, that we are considering this legislation today without notice, without ample time to prepare, without an opportunity for us to respond.

It is amusing because it so typifies the election year politics which has governed the conduct of this House of months. And it is tragic because it represents a repudiation of the budget process and the neglect of our responsibilities, as so well pointed out by my friend from Ohio (Mr. LATTA).

I suppose I must say it was good of the majority to even allow us to share the time on an equal basis for the debate.

Let me try to lay some groundwork for the vote then, if I might, quickly on the rule itself.

It is important that Members of this House and the American people understand the issues in this debate and the consequences of what we do.

First, the substance of the legislation reported out of committee is irrelevant. The substance of the one amendment contained in the rule is totally irrelevant. It does nothing, it means nothing, it is absolutely nothing.

This House does not have one single opportunity to vote on anything that complies with the reconciliation instructions of the budget or that meet the binding procedures of the Budget Act. Yet we are given two opportunities here to repudiate reconciliation and violate the intent and purpose of the Budget Act.

Second, it should be understood this action we take here today has absolutely nothing to do with the economic recovery but it has everything to do with political recovery.

What we are engaging in here is not fiscal responsibility but political irresponsibility. We are using the floor of the House for the drafting, editing, and approving of campaign news releases. That is really what it is all about.

Compare what we should be doing with what we are doing.

We shoud be considering a reconciliation bill reported out of the Budget Committee under a rule that offers opposing views to be aired and the opportunity then to vote on amendments or substitutes that reflect those opposing views. That is how the process is supposed to work, as I understand it.

What are we doing?

First, we are abandoning the reconciliation process and leaving the Budget Committee completely out in the cold. We are saying in effect that the budget process means nothing if it does not facilitate the majority's political needs.

We are not considering reconciliation in the context of fiscal responsibility. We are being forced to consider individual bills tailored to embarrass and frustrate those in this House who supported the budget resolution in June, and admittedly it was practically a unanimous vote, here, a significant body of votes over here, not the majority, so we understand the politics of what game is being played here.

The very best we could do here today, the only opportunity we have is to meet about 80 percent of the reconciliation instructions. That is it. Some choice. Some democratic process. Some reconciliation.

It is all a sham. The American people are being taken for a long ride down memory lane, back to the days of the tax and spend and tax and spend philosophy.

I would urge my colleagues to vote down this rule, rushed to the floor at first light today in the hopes of catching us still asleep, I suppose.

This rule is an insult to the legislative process. It is an insult to the budget process.

We have an obligation as a legislative body to fulfill the reconciliation instruction of the budget resolution. Those of us who still want to meet our obligations, whatever the political consequences, ought to be given an open and fair chance to do so.

Those Americans who believe that we must reduce the deficit through spending reductions should be allowed representation on this floor. They deserve an up-or-down vote on real, not phony, reconciliation measures.

Reference was made here a little bit earlier to a bill having to do with veterans benefits. But the Veterans' Committee matched the reconciliation instructions in the budget resolution. That is the difference between that vote of yesterday or a few days ago and the vote today.

If the majority leadership wants to wash their hands of responsibility for implementing the budget, that is all right with me. But just give us a chance to implement it, those of us who voted for it and thought we had a good product.

We will face the tough votes if the votes are presented fairly and if they are meaningful economic votes, not just the fraudulent political votes like this one happens to be.

I would urge Members to vote down the rule and hopefully the previous question will not be adopted.

Mr. BEILENSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentlewoman from New York (Ms. FERRARO).

Ms. FERRARO. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I was rather intrigued by the minority leader's comments when he was referring to his constituents at Caterpillar. The point is not whether or not Federal retirees COLA should be capped, and the distinguished minority leader is obviously man enough to be counted as one of those people who feel that retirees COLA should be capped, rather the rule merely allows for those Members who voted for the budget resolution, along with the minority leader, to be counted on the capping of COLA of Federal retirees, and not hide behind the skirts of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee.

□ 1130

As one who voted against the budget resolution I am more than happy to let my constituents see how I vote on each and every item of the budget.

Mr. BEILENSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes for the purpose of debate only to the gentleman from Texas (Mr. WRIGHT), the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, in this debate upon this rule, the spokesmen for the minority remind me of the young man who slew his mother and father and then threw himself on the mercy of the court on the ground that he was an orphan. If any single deed during the period of time in which the budget process has been in effect has placed that process in mortal jeopardy, then that deed was the Gramm-Latta reconciliation bill of last year. If the budget process dies, the hand that held the dagger will be named Gramm-Latta. This is what the leaders of the minority wish to force upon us again—one vote up or down, blind and oblivious to the contents or the effects of one humongous package which they could merchandise by sloganeering.

The question here is whether we get to vote on the merits of individual changes that affect people's lives, out in the sunlight and open air where the public can see exactly what we are for and what we are against, or whether the Republican minority again get to package all of their grand array of proposals into one amorphous whole where the specific afflictions of the public can be hidden and advertise all of it under some nebulous, euphonious title, such as "President Reagan's Program."

The gentlemen who presented the Gramm-Latta reconciliation bill last year and who quite obviously want the opportunity to do the same sort of thing again this year, rather than permitting members to vote on the merits of each proposition, have not the faintest idea how many laws they repealed and amended by that monstrous piece of legislation. It was not even written in the legislative branch. It was written in the executive branch of Government. That is the kind of craven surrender of our legislative resonsibilities that they want us to indulge in again.

So here is the question—not really whether you favor capping retirement benefits, but whether you favor coming out in the open and taking a stand on the subject of capping retirement benefits.

The gentleman from Illinois, my distinguished friend, the minority leader, makes much of the fact that the Caterpillar Co. and other employers in his district so hard hit, smitten by this Reagan recession, have found it necessary to cap and to cut their employees' pay. That is a sad and tragic thing that has been visited upon those people, to some quite considerable extent by the repeal and radical amending of laws that occurred surreptitiously in that one huge package in which nobody among us knew nor could fully identify what it contained.

Because in that one arcane vote we removed from our arsenal almost our entire retinue of antirecession weapons and tools, we now stand virtually powerless to do much about the Reagan recession. And that is what they would do to the country again.

The gentleman from Illinois seems to say, "Oh, what a fine thing it is that private employers have curtailed increases in wages and salaries for their employees, and why do not we in the Government do the same?"

The gentleman full well knows that we have done the same. We put a cap of 4 percent on pay increases for all employees of the Federal Government. That was a bullet to bite. But let me just ask if the gentleman knows of a single private employer anywhere in this land which has been forced by the dire circumstances to curb the retirement benefits which are due to their employees through pension programs. Not one. And I pray to God that it will never happen. That is a sacred commitment that was made to people now retired.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WRIGHT. I yield to my distinguished friend, the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman know of any private employee pension fund that is indexed to the cost of living index?

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes, I would respond to the gentleman, I do believe that in some a clear relationship exists.

Mr. MICHEL. How many of them?

Mr. WRIGHT. I think of a number of them.

Mr. MICHEL. The gentleman would have a hard time naming one of significance.

Mr. WRIGHT. There are a great number of private pension funds that have been negotiated by the labor unions and other employee organizations with their employers that rise and fall by the amount of money that is put into the funds, and the amount of money that is put into those funds has a direct relation to the cost of living and the pay, often tied to the cost of living, that the people receive who contribute to the funds. That is general. And I am not aware of a single one of them that has curbed retirement benefits. But that is not the point.

The point is, if the gentleman thinks that is a good idea, he is going to have an opportunity to vote to do it. This rule is not a gag rule. It gives him that privilege. The thing that obviously offends the minority is the fact that it does not give them the privilege of surreptitiously hiding repealers of laws, whole laws, as they did last year in this Gramm-Latta package which they foisted upon us to accept blindly.

The gentleman from Ohio speaks of courage. I should think it takes more courage to face the consequences of your votes issue by issue and to come out in the open and say that you are voting for or against a given proposition, than to hide the consequences of our actions in some nebulous package. It may take courage, in some distorted sense of that term, to vote blindly and without any knowledge of the consequences. But it certainly is not that kind of courage which is needed.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WRIGHT. No; not at this point, unless the gentleman wants to make a guess. How many laws do you suppose were repealed or amended by the Gramm-Latta reconciliation bill last year? Could the gentleman make a guess?

Mr. DERWINSKI. No; but I will accept any statement the gentleman makes.

Mr. WRIGHT. Well, the gentleman voted for it. But, of course, I do not blame the gentleman for not knowing all the laws it repealed. I did not know how many. I do not think there is a Member of the House who knew. I have a list of them. By this one single vote last year, those who voted for Gramm-Latta II voted to repeal or amend some 436 laws. Here in my hand is a list of them. These are the laws that you voted to amend or repeal by packaging everything in one package and letting the executive branch of Government, the Office of Management and Budget, write our laws, repeal our laws, amend our laws, at their whim while demanding that Congress serve merely as a passive ratifying agent of the Executive will.

And that is the kind of thing that you would have us do again? Is that courage? It takes a kind of blind courage, I suppose, to do it. But it is not wisdom. It is not legislation. Instead we offer you the opportunity to vote issue by issue, to take your stand in the open and to face the consequences of that stand.

Mr. Speaker, I urge an "aye" vote on this rule.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 seconds to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKI).

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I cannot help but just ask, after the great performance—I stress "performance"—of the majority leader, why this charge of hiding from a tough vote cannot be applied to the majority position on the Ways and Means Committee. But at some point, I guess that will be explained to us. However, I want to again commend the majority leader for a wonderful, wonderful performance.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. BAILEY).

Mr. BAILEY of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, regardless of previous speakers, there is an expression that is appropriate here, and the expression is that the time to kill a snake is the first time you see it.

Now, we have gone through this charade before of passing bills that are meaningless. Our retired people deserve better than this. Our retired people all across America deserve better than to be used as a political pundit to be passed back and forth between the bodies of this House, to be made a show of on the floor of the House.

We were very proud when we passed out a bill on both sides of the aisle that claimed that we were only going to pass a budget that had $100 billion of deficits and that was going to do great things for the economy in America. We cannot have it. As the gentleman from California accurately said, but inaccurately portrayed, we cannot have it both ways. We should not make this political football of older Americans. Retired people simply deserve better.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WRIGHT). The gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LATTA) has 1½ minutes remaining.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 1½ minutes.

Let me say that I join the gentleman from Illinois in commending our majority leader on his performance. I have seen it many, many times before. Let me say, he leaves out many, many things, naturally.

One thing that he fails to tell the American people is that the piece of paper that he hung up there reduced spending by $35 billion, and you would have had $35 billion more in spending had we not passed it.

Now, it takes real courage to pass that deficit onto your kids, but it takes real courage to vote against spending it. That is what we are attacking here today, the courage.

I have been around this place long enough to know that there is not enough courage around here individually on these bills to vote them up or down. You have to package them to get a little courage in this place. You have to do something about it. Let me say that if you bring them back one at a time, the courage is going to be lacking.

The gentleman who was in the well condemning the process that we followed last year providing $35 billion in less spending to the American people happens to have the votes to reduce that spending, but where are they? They are lacking, but you go around the country saying, "Oh, look at the Republicans; they are responsible for this increased spending." Ridiculous, who controls the legislation that passes this House? The gentleman who was in the well.

Let me say also that the Senate has complied. They packaged it. It is already done. They are going to take it up next Wednesday.

Now, are we going to hear the same speech for the umpteenth time when that Senate bill comes over here? I think we will not. We have heard it many times before.

So let us act a little responsibly and say we are going to do something about reducing expenditures, which is long overdue. The American people are waiting for some action by this House.

Mr. BEILENSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, let me say just a couple of words in conclusion, if I may.

The gentleman from Ohio expressed some concerns on a couple of occasions about the ability and the courage of the House to cut the budget. The Member from California shares those concerns. But apparently the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service was unable to agree on cutting the amounts which were requested or provided for in the budget resolution. They apparently looked at the vote of the whole House, back on May 27 of this year, just a month or so ago, where, by a vote of 327 to 94 the full House refused to cap the COLA's and the committee itself followed the lead of the House and refused to do so. But at the same time, the committee, to its credit, in my opinion, came to the Committee on Rules yesterday and, in doing so, was supported by the chairman of the Budget Committee and by the chairman of the Budget Committee's Task Force on Reconciliation, to ask for this rule, to ask specifically for a rule that provided for the consideration of an amendment to cap the COLA's that would in fact, if adopted, cut spending by approximately the amount that was provided for in the budget resolution.

The gentleman from Ohio made the point earlier that the bill was not physically sent to the Budget Committee, as the first budget resolution provides for. That in fact is true. That in fact also, in the opinion of this Member, is not terribly important. The Budget Committee has only a ministerial duty to take those bills and to pass them on to the House. In fact, if the bill had physically gone to the Budget Committee, it then simply would have gone to the Rules Committee thereafter and back to the House, as in fact it has. Or if the Budget Committee had in fact taken this and other reconciliation bills and packaged all of the reconciliation bills into a single bill, as the gentleman from Ohio suggested that it could do or should do, we still would have been short on the savings. We would still at that time, when the final reconciliation, the packaged reconciliation bill came to the floor, would had to have made in order an amendment to cap the COLA, as in fact we have provided for today.

So the net result, in the opinion of the Member from California, is exactly the same. We have to face up to this vote at one time or another, so let us face up to it now when it is before us. We are going to have to decide whether or not to cap the COLA either today or tomorrow or a month from now. Let us bite the bullet and do it right now.

Mr. LATTA. Mr Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEILENSON. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the gentleman for yielding.

In the gentleman's explanation of the law, he left out one thing—and I am sure he did it intentionally.

As far as the Budget Committee is concerned, it is supposed to package these bills and send them to the floor in a resolution. Now, that is the purpose of it, and that is being forgotten in this process the Democratic leadership now wants to follow. That is contrary to the law itself.

Mr. BEILENSON. The gentleman from Ohio should not need to be reminded that there is nothing whatsoever in the law, the underlying, basic organic law (the Budget Act) that provides for reconciliation in any way subsequent to the first budget resolution. So that it is perfectly proper and not in contravention of any law that the bill comes now in this particular form, subsequent to the consideration and to the passage of the first budget resolution.

This Member alluded to the argument made by the gentleman from Ohio with respect to packaging the bills and made the point, I think a valid point, that we would have to face up to this particular amendment, this particular problem, nonetheless, whether it had been packaged or not.

The Member from California again suggests that we face up to it now. I urge the adoption of the rule.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

□ 1145

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 240, nays 170, not voting 24, as follows:

Mr. CLAUSEN changed his vote from "yea" to "nay."

Messrs. CARNEY, MITCHELL of New York, KRAMER, McGRATH, COURTER, and ROBERT W. DANIEL, JR., changed their votes from "nay" to "yea."

So the resolution was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

REPORT ON RESOLUTION PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 521, CALLING FOR MUTUAL NUCLEAR WEAPONS FREEZE AND APPROVAL OF SALT II AGREEMENT

Mr. BEILENSON, from the Committee on Rules, submitted a privileged report (Rept. No. 97-674) on the resolution (H. Res. 538) providing for consideration of the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 521) calling for a mutual and verifiable freeze on and reductions in nuclear weapons and for approval of the SALT II agreement, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

REPORT ON RESOLUTION PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 6100, NATIONAL DEVELOPMENT INVESTMENT ACT

Mr. BEILENSON, from the Committee on Rules, submitted a privileged report (Rept. No. 97-675) on the resolution (H. Res. 539) providing for consideration of the bill (H.R. 6100) to amend the Public Works and Economic Development Act of 1965 and the Appalachian Regional Development Act of 1965, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

REPORT ON RESOLUTION PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 6324, ATMOSPHERIC, CLIMATIC, AND OCEAN POLLUTION ACT OF 1982

Mr. BEILENSON, from the Committee on Rules, submitted a privileged report (Rept. No. 97-676) on the resolution (H. Res. 540) providing for consideration of the bill (H.R. 6324) to authorize appropriations for atmospheric, climatic, and ocean pollution activities of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration for the fiscal years 1983 and 1984, and for other purposes, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

PROPOSAL TO RESCIND $83.5 MILLION IN BUDGET AUTHORITY—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 97—)

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, together with the accompanying papers, without objection, referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed:

(For message, see proceedings of the Senate of today, Wednesday, July 28, 1982.)

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE AUTHORIZATION ACT, 1983

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 6030) to authorize appropriations for fiscal year 1983 for the Armed Forces for procurement, for research, development, test, and evaluation, and for operation and maintenance, to prescribe personnel strengths for such fiscal year for the Armed Forces and for civilian employees of the Department of Defense, to authorize appropriations for such fiscal year for civil defense, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. PRICE).

The motion was agreed to.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of Union for the further consideration of the bill, H.R. 6030, with Mr. AUCOIN (Chairman pro tempore) in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. When the Committee of the Whole rose on Tuesday, July 27, 1982, pending was an amendment offered by the gentlewoman from Colorado (Mrs. SCHROEDER).

The Chair recognizes the gentlewoman for 5 minutes in support of her amendment.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman. Today I am offering an amendment on behalf of myself, Representative KENT HANCE, and Representative BILL WHITEHURST to provide greater protection to former spouses of uniformed services personnel.

The primary purpose of the bill is to remove the effect of the U.S. Supreme Court decision in McCarty against McCarty which prohibited State courts from considering military retired pay as marital property according to their own domestic relations law.

This amendment does not dictate that military retired pay be divided in a divorce proceeding. The amendment simply returns to State courts the authority to treat military retired pay as it does other public and private pensions.

Before the June 26, 1981, McCarty ruling, all of the 8 community property States and a number of the 39 equitable distribution States permitted military retired pay to be considered a marital asset, subject to division. The three remaining separate "title" States—Mississippi, Virginia, and West Virginia—consider pensions to be the sole property of those who earn them. In at least six other States military retired pay may not be considered joint marital property subject to division. Nothing in this amendment would force States to change the way they normally treat pensions under their State domestic relations law.

Our amendment is modeled after S. 1814, the Uniformed Services Former Spouses' Protection Act, which was introduced by Senator ROGER JEPSEN, chair of the Senate Subcommittee on Manpower and Personnel, and unanimously reported by the Senate Armed Services Committee on July 14.

The problem addressed by this amendment is not new. For at least 4 years there have been Schroeder, Hance and Whitehurst former spouse bills pending before the Armed Services Committee. Although hearings were held on the former spouse issue in 1977, 1980, and 1981, no bill has yet been reported to the floor by the committee.

The McCarty decision of a year ago made a bad situation worse. Recently I received the attached letter from the American Bar Association which endorses this amendment. The ABA stated that in the McCarty decision:

> The Court has materially and adversely affected the practice of family law in the United States. More specifically, this decision has cast a shadow over untold thousands of final divorce decrees in this country.

Because of the failure of the Armed Services Committee to act and the confusion it has created in the States, and State courts are holding up action on divorce cases until Congress resolves this conflict. Since there is a need to speedily resolve this confusion between State and Federal law, we think it is essential to act quickly and are convinced that there is no better vehicle for consideration of this legislation than the defense authorization bill that is before us today.

This amendment does not break new ground, nor does it put former military spouses in a more advantaged position than other divorced spouses in the public and private sectors. This amendment is an attempt to play catch up ball for the military.

In 1978, the Congress enacted Public Law 95-366, which created a direct pay mechanism by which the Office of Personnel Management would honor valid court orders that divide Federal civil service pensions according to State law. In 1980 and 1982, much stronger provisions were enacted for divorced spouses of Foreign Service and CIA personnel which entitled them to a pro rata share of the retirement and survivors benefits subject to court review. Section 820 of the Foreign Service Act specifies that nothing in the act would prevent State courts from dividing the pension in the case of spouses married less than 10 years.

The amendment we offer today creates an orderly procedure for the submission of court orders to the Department of Defense. It establishes criteria court orders must meet before direct payment can be made to former spouses.

Furthermore, the amendment protects the rights of service members by limiting the total amount of disposable retired pay that can be given to one or more former spouses to 50 percent. In the case of multiple spouses, the legislation establishes the principle of first come, first served. The amendment also prohibits a State court from directing a service member to retire at a particular time in order to provide retirement pay to a former spouse. Finally, the amendment specifies that a former spouse cannot transfer, dispose of by will or inheritance, or sell her portion of retired pay.

Another provision of this legislation provides greater flexibility to the military member or retiree by permitting them to voluntarily elect survivors benefits for a former spouse. Currently, a military member is prevented from doing this by current statutes dealing with the survivors benefits plan (SBP).

Finally, this amendment addresses the problem of long-term military spouses who suffer from serious health conditions like cancer or multiple sclerosis who are cut out of military health care following a divorce. Most of us are familiar with the horror stories of these women who are unable to purchase private health insurance because of preexisting conditions and have their treatment stopped when a divorce occurs. This amendment provides 180 days of continued health coverage for divorced military spouses and permits continued military health treatment for unremarried former spouses married at least 20 years during active duty service who are receiving treatment for a preexisting health condition.

The health care provisions in this legislation are essential to protect the long-term spouse with preexisting health problems. Military spouses are more disadvantaged than are civil service divorced spouses, since dependents of civil servants are given 30 days following a divorce to convert to an individual health insurance policy under the Federal employees health benefits program, without taking a physical and regardless of any preexisting health problems.

Military organizations have opposed passage of this legislation, arguing that it could adversely affect future military recruiting and retention. The Senate Armed Services Committee requested the Department of Defense to furnish objective data which indicated that prior to the McCarty decision, in States that considered military retired pay as marital property, that military personnel management needs were adversely affected by the application of State property laws. The Department of Defense has not submitted any satisfactory empirical evidence to show that during the period prior to the McCarty decision, recruiting, retention, and personnel assignments were adversely affected by the application of State domestic relations law. The Senate Armed Services Committee concluded that this legislation would not be detrimental to military manpower management.

Other evidence that passage of this legislation would not hurt military recruitment and retention has been the experience with the Foreign Service Act of 1980, which provided much broader coverage to foreign service spouses than is proposed by this amendment. Since the passage of the Foreign Service Act its effects on moral in the foreign service community has been positive. There has been no increase in resignations; in fact, the attrition rate is currently running 20 percent below the anticipated projections.

Today we have an opportunity to vote greater protection for military spouses who have served alongside the service member as the backbone of the military family. We are a society which places value on home and family, encouraging women to stay home and take care of children. Yet, one of our most severe forms of economic discrimination is that we fail to attach an economic value to the contribution of the homemaker and fail to protect her economically after the end of a long marriage.

The older divorced homemaker is extremely vulnerable in our society. They frequently find it difficult to get a job because of high unemployment, lack of recent work experience, and the hesitation of employers to hire older workers. The later years frequently bring additional monetary burdens because of declining health. Because of a greater average lifespan, women far outnumber men among the Nation's elderly. According to census figures, there are over 5 million women over the age of 65 who live alone, and half of that number are living their last years below the official poverty line.

I urge my colleagues to vote in favor of this amendment and the protections it provides for military spouses.

AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION,
Washington, D.C., July 20, 1982.

Hon. PATRICIA SCHROEDER,
Committee on Armed Services,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSWOMAN SCHROEDER: We understand that during consideration by the House of H.R. 6030, Department of Defense authorization legislation, you may offer an amendment to H.R. 6030 to give the states, through their courts, the power to distribute community or equitable interests in military retirement or retainer pay. The American Bar Association applauds your efforts to give the states this power.

As you know, until June 26, 1981, many states recognized and awarded spousal interests in military retirement pay as community property and/or marital property of the parties. On June 26, the Supreme Court handed down a ruling in McCarty v. McCarty that took from the state courts their power in divorce actions to determine property rights in pension benefits where those benefits are derived from military service. The Court decided that such pension benefits are solely the property of the military member, notwithstanding any state court decree to the contrary. In so doing, the Court has materially and adversely affected the practice of family law in the United States. More specifically, this decision has cast a shadow over untold thousands of final divorce decrees in this country.

Recognizing this situation, in January, 1982, the House of Delegates of the American Bar Association adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the American Bar Association calls upon Congress to enact legislation making all deferred compensation derived from federal employment, such as pensions, retired pay and other income of that nature, subject to state property law, except as specifically exempted by explicit federal legislation."

Prior to that resolution and McCarty, in August, 1979, the House of Delegates of the American Bar Association adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, that the American Bar Association supports the enactment of legislation which basically requires the Secretaries of the Armed Forces to recognize state court decrees of divorce, annulment or legal separation which recognize spousal interest and divide retired or retainer pay."

Based on these two resolutions, the American Bar Association has actively supported enactment of legislation such as S. 1814, the "Uniformed Services Former Spouses' Protection Act," recently ordered reported by the Senate Armed Services Committee. We would strongly support an effort to include such legislative provisions as an amendment to H.R. 6030.

Sincerely,

ROBERT D. EVANS,
Director.

I must say that the amendment I offer today is absolutely a bare minimum. It is not the bill that I have pushed in the past. I do not think it goes nearly far enough. But the reason I am here today pushing this—and I wish I could push more—is because this is a mirror image of the bill that came out of the Senate, out of Senator JEPSEN's committee, and I think that we will probably make some progress if we go along with that. At least we will begin.

If I had my way, we would give the military spouses at least the same rights.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentlewoman from Colorado (Mrs. SCHROEDER) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mrs. SCHROEDER was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I think we should give military wives at least equal rights with Foreign Service spouses and CIA spouses. That is what is in my bill and I wish I could bring to the floor. Unfortunately, because the session is running out, because of the time crunch, I think it is very important that we at least give military spouses the same rights that we have given civil service spouses, and that is in essence what the Jepsen provision does. So that is what my amendment does today.

Mr. HANCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HANCE. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to associate myself with the remarks of the gentlewoman from Colorado. I think this is an amendment long past due.

If we look at the background and the history of what has happened to the military spouses, they have followed their husbands from base to base and from place to place and have not been able to establish a career of their own. If they are divorced at a later date, then as far as getting any type of the retired military pay—which is rightfully half theirs—they have to go to court and go from jurisdiction to jurisdiction. That makes it almost impossible for them to receive any of the benefits that they helped accumulate. It was a partnership during the marriage and the retirement benefits should be split equally.

Mr. Chairman, I think this addresses the problem. I commend the gentlewoman from Colorado.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I thank the gentleman from Texas. Mr. Chairman, I also want to thank him for helping in this effort. We did get hearings on our bills. For a long, long time we have never been able to get it out of committee. I thank the gentleman for his assistance in that regard.

Mr. FROST. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman from Colorado yield?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I would be delighted to yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. FROST. Mr. Chairman, I would like to join in strongly supporting the gentlewoman's amendment and I would like to further add that in my private law practice, prior to becoming a Member of Congress, I had the opportunity to represent women who were in this exact situation.

The law is not fair. The amendment is definitely needed for the courts in the State of Texas as well as others to be able to enforce this right and it cannot occur without the amendment offered by the gentlewoman from Colorado.

I would strongly urge that it be adopted.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment offered by my distinguished colleagues, Congresswoman PATRICIA SCHROEDER, and Congressmen KENT HANCE and WILLIAM WHITEHURST.

I am very happy to add my voice in support of legislation to protect retirement and health benefits for former military spouses. The legislation is sorely needed and long overdue. Especially so, given the Supreme Court decision in McCarty against McCarty which held that, in the absence of a Federal statute to the contrary, a State court may not order a division of military retirement pay. The State courts in Texas already consider such pay in divorce settlements; however, there is no garnishment or enforcement provision to insure the due award to a former spouse on the basis of a qualified court order. Thus, these benefits are lost to those individuals whose marriages end in divorce.

For the most part, the victims are women, at least 50 years of age, who have devoted themselves almost entirely to furthering their husband's military career and who, therefore, have had to uproot their children to move with their husbands to various military bases across the country and in other parts of the world. Because these women have generally been unable to pursue a career which could afford them any means of economic security and, again, because of their great contribution to their husand's career and, indeed, our national defense, some sort of legislative remedy is extremely important. I believe that the proposed amendment is the appropriate remedy. It does not divide military retirement pay but, rather, it authorizes the States to consider these benefits in divorce settlements. Second, it permits military personnel to designate a former spouse to receive survivors' benefits. And finally, it permits the continuation of health benefits for certain former spouses.

This amendment represents a moderate approach to the problem of former military spouses. And it is critical that it be approved without any further delay. For the sake of affected women and families in Texas and in your own States, I urge that you join me in supporting the amendment.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I thank the gentleman from Texas for his comments. I think that is probably why the American Bar Association is also endorsing this, because they have had a lot of experience in this area.

Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I would be delighted to yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. PICKLE. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding to me.

Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, this amendment does not dictate that military retirement will be divided in a divorce proceeding but, rather, it defers to the State courts and it simply says that you follow the State court proceedings, if they have acted, and that the Pentagon would then abide by that, if a State decision has been reached.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. That is correct. The gentleman from Texas is correct.

Mr. PICKLE. If the gentlewoman will yield further, this is fairness; this is equity for the various parties concerned. We all know there are problems between the wives of a first marriage and the second marriage. But there ought to be procedure where there can be a division if the State court orders it. I think it is a good amendment. I think it should be supported.

Mrs. BOUQUARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield to me?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I would be delighted to yield to the gentlewoman from Tennessee.

Mrs. BOUQUARD. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding to me.

Mr. Chairman, I certainly want to commend the gentlewoman from Colorado for this amendment. It is long overdue. As the gentlewoman knows, I am a cosponsor of her legislation to correct this inequity.

I think it should be pointed out that not only is a military spouse hindered from making a living in her own right because she is responsible for the children while the father is away, but there are so many instances, for instance in my district, where the wife indeed was kept at home taking care of her children because the children had a deficiency—mental retardation problems in this case—so she was unable to work. Then the children reached the age of 18, there was a divorce proceeding, and she was left completely without any sort of income.

Mr. Chairman, I do want to commend the gentlewoman for her amendment.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I thank the gentlewoman from Tennessee for her comments and her help.

Mr. SAM B. HALL, JR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, I would be happy to yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SAM B. HALL, JR. Mr. Chairman, I would also like to commend the gentlewoman from Colorado (Mrs. SCHROEDER) and the gentleman from Texas (Mr. HANCE) and the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. WHITEHURST) for their introduction of this measure. I wholeheartedly support it.

There is one question I would like to ask for clarification.

I am looking at a letter I received from Mr. WHITEHURST dated July 21 which states that the act will become effective 120 days after enactment. There are no provisions for retroactive payment of previously court-awarded retirement benefits. The following quoted part of the letter is the portion I have some question about:

> And the Act applies only to those previous court orders that meet the langauage of the law.

My question is this: In all cases that have been disposed of prior to the enactment of this legislation, is there any language in this bill that will go back and cause a court to have the power and authority to reopen previously concluded final judgments?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. No, courts would not have to reopen any prior divorce settlements. This is molded on Senate bill S. 1814. Mr. WHITEHURST is correct.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentlewoman from Colorado (Mrs. SCHROEDER) has again expired.

(At the request of Mr. SAM B. HALL, JR., and by unanimous consent, Mrs. SCHROEDER was allowed to proceed for an additional 3 minutes.)

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, what I would like to say is that Mr. WHITEHURST's representation is correct. No, there is nothing in the bill that deals with that.

Mr. SAM B. HALL, JR. There would be nothing that would allow a court, then, to reopen a previously adjudicated case?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Not in the bill. This is prospective.

Mr. SAM B. HALL, JR. Nothing after the enactment of this act?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. There is nothing in the bill. State law may allow reopening for changed circumstances. But there is nothing in the bill to require it.

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield to me?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I yield to the chairman of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. FORD of Michigan. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to compliment the gentlewoman for her persistent pursuit of this issue and point out that in years past I have very strongly disagreed with some versions of amendments of this kind that have been offered by the gentlewoman from Colorado and others, and I want to compliment her on a very reasonable and rational approach to this problem that meets the genuine concerns that people have expressed with regard to pension benefits and annuities to our committee over the years, without jeopardizing the integrity of the military pension system.

Mr. Chairman, I think it is far superior, for example, to what we ended up doing with the Foreign Service officers, and I am proud to support the gentlewoman's amendment today and I compliment her on the very practical way in which she has accommodated all of our concerns.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the gentleman from Michigan. His endorsement means a lot.

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield to me?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. DONNELLY. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding to me.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to add my voice to the chorus supporting this amendment. It deserves to pass, and it deserves to pass unanimously.

The spouses of our military personnel are asked to sacrifice a great deal for their country, including the stability, security, and personal safety that the rest of their fellow citizens expect and enjoy. It is unconsionable that we should ask them to give up their legal rights in divorce court as well.

This amendment allows State courts to apply their own State laws to military retired pay in the same manner it is applied to all other private and civil service pensions. It provides a method for direct payment in compliance with court orders. It allows service members voluntarily to assign survivors benefits to a former spouse, while it prevents the courts from making such an assignment mandatory.

Among the other protections for the service member, this amendment prevents more than 50 percent of the disposable pay from being awarded in the property settlement. It also prohibits any court from ordering a member of the armed services to retire at a certain time in order to begin pension payments.

This amendment clarifies the intent of Congress concerning military pensions as urged by the Supreme Court's 1981 decision in McCarty against McCarty.

This is a step long overdue to provide equitable protection to the former spouses of our military personnel.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I thank the gentleman for his comments. What he is saying is so important. It would be a crime to have this Congress adjourn and not have dealt with this issue.

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield to me?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. FAZIO. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I want to add my congratulations to the chorus that she has already heard today, in appreciation of the ongoing effort she has made to try to bring to this one last area of Federal law the equity she has already brought to people in Federal service, in Foreign Service, and other forms of public employment.

It is a tragedy that women who spend so many years of their lives working in tandem with their husbands in most cases—partners in the case where we are talking of women in the military, themselves—people who have dedicated their lives to the advancement of our country and our mutual interests must suffer when divorce ensues and they are far too often left with little or nothing.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentlewoman has again expired.

(On request of Mr. FAZIO and by unanimous consent, Mrs. SCHROEDER was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Chairman, these people are then treated arbitrarily, unlike all others in similar circumstances and other forms of Federal employment and, in effect, put in the position of being potential welfare recipients, something that is totally unfair and, of course, in our society something that some people see as degradation.

This amendment that concerns itself not only with retirement benefits but health benefits and with the need to enforce judgments of the courts is long overdue and is a comprehensive way of dealing with a social problem that for too long has been swept under the rug.

Mr. Chairman, I think women and men together, understanding the needs in this modern life where divorce is too often an occurrence that affects children as well as both partners, must come to the conclusion that this amendment, the way it is drafted, without any amendments that might somehow limit its application to only long-term marriages, for example, deserves the kind of support that the gentlewoman has been able to generate.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I thank the gentleman for his comments. He is correct. This is the classic displaced homemaker case and the benefits of this legislation really go to the children. I think that is what is so important.

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. HOYER. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I congratulate the gentlewoman for her leadership on this issue, and also the gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Virginia, along with other individuals who have been involved with this.

On a State level in Maryland, I worked on legislation for reform of the domestic relations law in our State, which was overwhelmingly adopted by the State of Maryland; it has worked very well and specifically incorporates exactly the same concept that the gentlewoman has in her amendment.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentlewoman from Colorado (Mrs. SCHROEDER) has again expired.

(On request of Mr. HOYER and by unanimous consent, Mrs. SCHROEDER was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. HOYER. If the gentlewoman will yield further, Mr. Chairman, I think the substance of the gentlewoman's amendment certainly reflects the overwhelming majority view in this country as to the issue of equity and fairness in the marital relationship and I congratulate her and enthusiastically endorse and support her effort.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I thank the gentleman from Maryland for his comments.

Mrs. BYRON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield to me?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I am happy to yield to the gentlewoman from Maryland.

Mrs. BYRON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to add my support to this approval. It is one that I think most of us who are female members of the Committee on Armed Services have probably heard more often than our male colleagues.

I think many of the divorced spouses will identify with the female membership and have spent a great deal of time in my office discussing this issue with me on a 1-to-1 basis, as I know they have with my colleague from Colorado.

Mr. Chairman, I want to commend my colleague and voice my support for an amendment that I think is long overdue.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I thank the gentlewoman from Maryland for her remarks.

Mr. JOHN L. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield to me at this time?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. JOHN L. BURTON. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding to me.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this amendment. It is something that is overdue. Those of us who represent constituencies with spouses who have been separated realize the inequities and unfairness they suffer as a result of the present circumstances.

So I again commend the gentlewoman and ask for strong support for this amendment.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I thank the gentleman from California for his kind remarks.

Ms. FERRARO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman from Colorado yield to me at this time?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I would be happy to yield to my colleague from New York.

Ms. FERRARO. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding to me.

Mr. Chairman, I think we were all extremely disappointed when the Supreme Court handed down the McCarty decision because I believe we felt at that point military wives were being treated very, very unfairly.

But what they did in that decision, and they did not discuss the merits of whether or not military wives are entitled to participation in the retired pay of their husband but, rather, the Supreme Court ruled that without a specific Federal statute addressing the issue a State court could not order a division of military retired pay between military annuitants and their divorced spouses. Federal law already allows State courts to make such a division concerning civil service and Foreign Service annuities. However, that same determination based on the merits of each individual case may not now be made concerning military pensions.

I believe that the amendment offered by the gentlewoman from Colorado rectifies that problem. The gentlewoman is dealing with the inequities of the situation and I certainly commend the gentlewoman from Colorado for her amendment and urge my colleagues to join me in supporting it.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I think the gentlewoman makes an excellent point. What we are talking about is removing the second-class status that the Supreme Court gave to military spouses by that decision, and it is incredible that they do not have the rights that any other spouse in America does and yet they do more for the country than anyone else.

So it is just an absolute reversal of what should transpire. This is finally our chance to get it turned around.

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield to me at this time?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentlewoman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment offered by the gentlewoman of Colorado and the gentlemen of Texas and Virginia. The need for this amendment has been well demonstrated by the unanimous support that it received in the Senate Armed Services Committee and the cosponsorships that it received from over 100 Members of this body.

I am sure that there is not a Member on the floor of the House today who does not recognize the significant contributions of military spouses, nor the difficult, transient life that the military asks them to lead. It does not take a great deal of imagination or insight for us to recognize that frequent military moves often preclude spouses from pursuing their own careers and establishing economic independence. As a result, military spouses are frequently unable to vest in their own retirement plans or obtain health insurance coverage from a private employer. Military spouses who become divorced often lose all access to retirement and health benefits—despite a "career" devoted to the military.

Unfortunately, the Supreme Court worsened the plight of military spouses in the McCarty against McCarty decision by denying State courts the right to treat a military member's retired pay as property in a divorce settlement in the absence of a Federal statute. The responsibility for providing protection for former military spouses thus lies solely with the Congress, and we must recognize that retired pay and benefits are usually the only assets accrued by a military couple. Further, civil service pensions, and those of Foreign Service and CIA personnel, are subject to State law and may be considered marital property. Perhaps the greatest injustice of all is that, under current law, a military spouse who is fortunate enough to have a pension of her own may have to share that pension upon divorce, while her uniformed husband would not be required to do the same.

In a laudable effort to rectify this injustice, this amendment returns to the States the right to consider military retired pay as marital property at divorce. Further, in an effort to guarantee some protection for the military spouse who loses all health insurance coverage through divorce, the amendment provides for the continuation of military health benefits for an unremarried former spouse who was married to the service member for at least 20 years and undergoing treatment for a preexisting health condition.

It is certainly time for this Congress to admit to the reality of the sacrifices made by military spouses—sacrifices which too often backfire upon divorce. Military spouses are certainly owed the same security provided for their civilian counterparts. Therefore, I urge your support for this amendment.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, I just take this time simply to indicate my support for the gentlewoman's amendment and to commend her for the diligence and perseverence which she has displayed on bringing this issue not only on this bill, but on other bills that the House has already acted on with respect to other agencies of the Government.

The principle is sound, and I would trust that my colleagues would join in supporting this amendment. It does not go as far as what was done with respect to other agencies, but at least it is a step in the right direction.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FASCELL. I yield to the gentlewoman.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the gentleman because he helped so much with the Foreign Service spouses, and he is right, we were able to do more. I am very saddened that we cannot come and give military spouses at least equal rights with the Foreign Service and the CIA, but to not do anything would be a tragedy and really put them in the worst of all possible positions.

So, I thank the gentleman for his leadership and his help in moving the other matters. I think that is part of the reason why we are on the floor today. Had we not made those advances in other areas I am not sure we would have had the votes today.

Mr. WHITEHURST. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I have a statement here that I will submit, but I just want to make a few comments about this amendment.

This is not something that I think came to many of us as a burst of inspiration. I have been in this body for going on 14 years. I represent a district that is heavily impacted by the military. Fifty percent of the economy in my district rests on the Navy, so it is not surprising that I have thousands of not only active-duty personnel, but many thousands of retirees.

In the last 12 or 13 years, when I have had office hours in my district on Saturday morning, on a regular basis divorced spouses have come to see me to plead with me for help of some kind or another. I am sure the other people who are sponsors of this legislation or supporters of it could all cite the same kinds of horror stories I have listened to.

I remember one particular one that was the straw that broke the camel's back. A lady came in to see me. She was about 50 years old. She had been married for about 30 years. Her husband had been in the Navy a comparable length of time. He was getting out and, in leaving the Navy, he decided to make for himself a whole new life, and she was not included in it. So, he dropped her. He married a woman half his age. He bought himself a convertible, she said, with a flame down the side, and he dyed his hair.

I said, "I think he has a case of male menopause."

She said, "Well, what happens to me, because when I married him I wanted to go to school and improve my education." He said, "No, you stay home and take care of the children," so I have not been trained to do anything. I have no work experience, and here I am at the age of 50 and my health is not good. I cannot use the naval hospital in this district. I cannot use the commissary. I cannot use any of the facilities and I get no support from him. For 30 years I was married to this man and I took all the sacrifices of separation and trauma that go with being a Navy wife. Is this fair?"

I said, "It is absolutely not fair, and I am going to try to do something about it."

A few years back I introduced a modest piece of legislation to give the wives who had been married for 20 years and divorced at least medical care. We had hearings. The gentleman from California (Mr. JOHN BURTON) was there that day. I recall that he was instrumental in getting those hearings.

One of my colleagues was on that subcommittee and said, "The Defense Department tells us that the cost is going to be $30 million if we grant this medical care to these ex-wives. Can we afford it?"

I said, "That is less than the cost of two F-14's."

I submit to the Members that we have an opportunity this afternoon to set something right, not only in terms of medical benefits but also in terms of what I think the wives have earned. All we are doing is leaving it to the proper province, the State courts, to make a decision when there is a divorce settlement as to whether or not the wife is entitled to up to not more than 50 percent of that pension. I do not think that is unfair.

The only group in this country getting a Federal pension—and that includes us—that so far has been immune on this has been the military services, and it just seems to me that the Navy wives, and in fact all of the service wives, are entitled to something more than a certificate from the admiral in charge of the naval district or the captain of a ship telling them what great supporters they are of the Navy, or putting a logo on a grocery bag out of the commissary saying, "We are counting on you."

That is all they get for their sacrifices. We could not send ships to sea if we did not have the wives who are willing to stay back and be supportive of those men and raise those children.

So I say, the time is now. Let us pass this amendment and let us get on with doing something that we should have done a long, long time ago.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the amendment offered by the gentlewoman from Colorado. The Uniformed Services Former Spouses Protection Act is legislation that is long overdue. While the Supreme Court decision in McCarty against McCarty in June 1981, served as the catalyst for this particular bill, many of you had already joined me and other colleagues in cosponsoring similar legislation aimed at correcting the inequities in the current system which unfairly penalize the long-term military spouse. My own bill covering health care benefits for spouses married for a minimum of 20 years was first introduced in 1976.

Since the McCarty decision, which held that in the absence of a Federal statute permitting such action, a State court may not order a division of military retired pay as part of a distribution of community property incident to a divorce proceeding, cases all over the country have been taken back into court. Several State supreme courts are holding back on issuing decisions on the cases pending congressional action. People on both sides of this issue are being affected, and it is incumbent upon us to move on this matter as soon as possible.

In recent years, this body and the Senate enacted legislation protecting civil service spouses, Foreign Service spouses and CIA spouses, and I agree with the gentlewoman from Colorado that it is time that our long-term military spouses be recognized for their contributions and sacrifices. The amendment before us does not award a former spouse entitlement or rights to military retired pay, nor does it even sanction the division of retired pay; it simply does not prohibit it.

The primary purpose of this bill is to remove the effect of the U.S. Supreme Court decision in McCarty against McCarty, and thereby permit the Federal, State, and certain other courts, consistent with the appropriate laws, to consider military retired pay when fixing the property rights between the parties to a divorce, dissolution, or legal separation.

The service member is also protected by several clauses in this legislation. The award of retirement benefits as a division of personal property is limited to 50 percent of the total amount of disposable retirement or retainer pay of the service member. The former spouse cannot transfer, dispose of by will or inheritance, or sell her portion of retired pay, and the courts cannot direct that a service member retire at a particular time in order to effectuate any payment out of retired pay to the former spouse.

Other provisions in the amendment provide former spouses, who were married for a minimum of 20 years, with 180 days of health care immediately following the date of final decree, dissolution or annulment, provided that the former spouse remains unremarried. For spouses with preexisting conditions, health care can be extended by the service Secretary concerned if treatment for that condition was previously provided by the uniformed services.

Also, this legislation will permit the service member to designate his former spouse as annuitant for SBP benefits and provides that if the wife is so designated as part of a spousal agreement filed as part of a divorce decree, then the service member cannot change the commitment without first obtaining appropriate court or other approval.

The Uniformed Services Former Spouses Protection Act was passed by the Senate Armed Services Committee by a unanimous vote last week after a number of hearings, during which testimony was provided orally or in writing by several Senators and Congressmen, the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Manpower, Reserve Affairs and Logistics, the Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense of Military Personnel and Force Management, three of the services' personnel chiefs, one Assistant Deputy Chief of Staff for Personnel, as well as service organizations representing active and retired military personnel and the active and divorced military spouses. The American Bar Association Section of Family Law and a number of other organizations were also provided an opportunity to have their views considered.

This is not a women's lib issue. It is an issue that strikes at the very heart of the traditional family concept, offering recognition and protection to those women willing to make the required sacrifices in support of a husband's military career. I need not stand here and extol the many contributions and sacrifices required by our military spouses. We are all well aware that if we did not have the dedication and support of these women in maintaining their homes through long separations, often giving up their own careers in order to follow their military husbands from pillar to post, and frequently enduring the stress of facing the real possibility of serious injury or loss of their loved ones in the name of defense, we would be hard pressed to retain the dedicated individuals so vitally needed to meet our defense requirements.

I believe that the legislation before us is the first step in establishing the recognition the military spouse earns. It offers the former spouse an effective collection mechanism for payment of lawful court orders and recognizes the unique status of military spouses, while protecting the service member. The time has come for us to back up those certificates of appreciation, recruiting advertisements, grocery bag logos, and laurels on a husband's efficiency report with meaningful legislation that offers personal security to long-term military spouses. I urge you to vote for this amendment.

● Mr. FITHIAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment offered by the gentlewoman from Colorado which will provide economic protection to former spouses of uniformed services personnel.

It is long past time to require the Federal Government to recognize valid court orders which divide military retired pay between service members and their former spouses. Spouses of armed services personnel often make considerable contributions to the readiness and effectiveness of our military forces. Their voluntary efforts and support services have proven beneficial to the maintenance of our fighting forces. In addition, many such individuals make personal and professional sacrifices in order to fulfill their responsibilities as military spouses. They must accept hardships and burdens while stationed overseas which require personal fortitude and which frequently prevent them from establishing their own continuous employment record with its attendant retirement benefits.

Like similar legislation governing property settlements involving civil service, Foreign Service, and CIA pension benefits, Congresswoman SCHROEDER's amendment will permit courts to consider military retired pay in the same way they apply State law to other pension plans. While offering the possibility of equitable property settlements to the divorced spouses of military personnel, this amendment also provides protections to the military service member involved. The amendment permits State courts to determine whether or not to divide retirement benefits in cases of divorce, just as they retain authority to establish settlement agreements involving other property and income. This amendment also permits the service member to choose whether or not to assign survivors benefits to a former spouse. Most importantly, this amendment protects the military member by limiting to 50 percent the disposable income available for distribution in a settlement agreement.

Enforcement of divorce agreements which provide a fair settlement to former spouses of military personnel is overdue. This amendment will give courts that authority. I support the amendment and urge my colleagues to lend their support to the effort to bring the military retirement system in line with other Federal and private pension plans.●

● Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, I support the gentlelady from Colorado's amendment to the Department of Defense authorization bill, H.R. 6030. The amendment would allow the same equitable treatment of former spouses of military personnel as is afforded to former spouses of civil service personnel.

Specifically, Congresswoman SCHROEDER's amendment would permit the State courts to consider the military retired pay when fixing the property rights between the parties to a divorce. The amendment does not dictate that military retirement must be divided in a divorce proceeding. It simply defers to the State courts to make that decision on the basis of their own domestic relations law.

I support this amendment for two reasons: First, as chair of the Subcommittee on Compensation and Employee Benefits, I object to the inconsistent treatment of persons serving this country, whether in the military or in civilian service. During the 95th Congress, we enacted legislation requiring the Federal Government to honor

State court property settlements and court orders relating to civil service retirement system pensions. It is only fair that we extend those same provisions to the military retirement system. The Schroeder amendment would correct this inequity against an individual group: Military personnel and their spouses.

Second, I support this amendment because our failure to act favorably on the issue will, in many cases, prolong the agony of divorce. This is simply a cruel and unjust thing to do. Even Congress cannot be that callous.

The Supreme Court has ruled that in the absence of a Federal statute to the contrary, a State court may not order a division of military retired pay. In lieu of this, many State supreme courts are delaying action on divorce cases awaiting some kind of action by Congress. Divorce proceedings are traumatic enough without the needless delay caused by congressional inaction.

After nearly 5 years of discussion, and inaction on several pieces of legislation, I think it is time for Congress to exercise its responsibility. The time for debate is passed. The time for action is now. I urge my colleagues to support Congresswoman SCHROEDER's amendment.●

● Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to express my support for the spouse protection amendment to H.R. 6030, the defense authorization bill.

The career of a military, intelligence, or foreign service officer is indeed most difficult and demanding. These dedicated public servants deserve our praise and support; however, it is essential that we do not forget the unsung heroes—their spouses. Spouses of uniformed services personnel must also bear considerable burdens, the least of which is the requirement of continually having to leave one home and then establishing a new one. This instability prevents many of these giving people from developing a solid career of their own and often leaves them financially dependent upon their spouses.

Under current law, should a uniformed service officer and his or her spouse divorce, the spouse does not have the ability to receive any of officer's retired pay. The unfortunate 1981 Supreme Court decision in the case of McCarty against McCarty prevents State courts from dividing military retired pay in a divorce settlement, effectively leaving the former spouses of uniformed services personnel out in the cold.

The amendment offered by my distinguished colleagues would allow States to consider military retired pay when dividing property rights in a divorce settlement. My colleagues have spent a great deal of time and effort in explaining the details of their amendment, and I am convinced that their thoughtful amendment protects the rights of both service members and former spouses. I applaud my colleagues, Congresswoman SCHROEDER, Congressman HANCE, and Congressman WHITEHURST, for proposing this overdue and worthwhile amendment and urge all Members to join me in supporting it.●

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. WHITE AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MRS. SCHROEDER

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment as a substitute for the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WHITE as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mrs. SCHROEDER: Page 25, after line 25, insert the following new title (and redesignate the succeeding title and section accordingly):

TITLE IX—FORMER SPOUSES' PROTECTION PAYMENT OF RETIRED AND RETAINER PAY IN COMPLIANCE WITH COURT ORDERS

SEC. 901. (a)(1) Chapter 71 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"§ 1407. Payment of retired and retainer pay in compliance with court orders

"(a)(1) Payment of retired pay or retainer pay that would otherwise be made to a member or former member of an armed force shall be paid (in whole or in part) by the Secretary concerned to another person if and to the extent expressly provided for in the terms of any court decree of divorce, annulment, or legal separation or the terms of any court-approved property settlement agreement incident to any court decree of divorce, annulment, or legal separation.

"(2) Any payment under paragraph (1) to a person bars recovery by any other person.

"(b) Subsection (a) shall apply only to payments of retired pay and retainer pay made by the Secretary concerned after the date of receipt by the Secretary concerned of written notice of such decree, order, or agreement, and such additional information and documentation as the Secretary concerned may prescribe.

"(c) In this section, 'court' means any court of any State, the District of Columbia, or the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico.".

(2) The table of sections at the beginning of such chapter is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new item:

"1407. Payment of retired and retainer pay in compliance with court orders.".

(b) The amendments made by subsection (a) shall apply only to payments of retired pay and retainer pay for months beginning after the date of the enactment of this Act.

Mr. WHITE (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, as the Members know, I have a slight case of laryngitis, but I cannot be silent when the House might produce what I regard as defective legislation. We are legislators, and I feel we should have a choice, an alternative in accordance with the principles of law in this Nation and in the States.

Now, of the two, the amendment of Mrs. SCHROEDER and the amendment of Mr. NICHOLS, I prefer Mr. NICHOLS' amendment. Chairman NICHOLS' amendment and mine were inspired by a decision of the Supreme Court in McCarty against McCarty which, as Mrs. SCHROEDER said, struck down disposition of retired pay as a property right because the Court said that Congress did not give authority to the State courts to dispose of retired pay. How many Members have read either of the two amendments, Mrs. SCHROEDER's or Mr. NICHOLS'? Mrs. SCHROEDER's amendment is 17 pages of very closely written language, and Mr. NICHOLS' amendment is over 21 pages long. Both create more loopholes than they seek to cure. In effect, they create new programs to administer when we are trying to cut down on programs.

My substitute amendment, taken from Congressman HANCE's bill, which many Members cosponsored, does a simple thing in two pages. It allows each State to adjudicate retired annuity as a property right in accordance with State law. It merely restores the procedures and rights of each State according to each State's as it was before the McCarty decision. It is a principle of law.

It does not talk about commissary or medical care, which have widespread implications which would be imposed at a time when our resources are already taxed. These commissary and medical privileges would establish a new principle of law, and would give a special privilege to a special class of people.

In one sense it could even be called socialized medicine, and in another sense it would extend Government medical care to a different class of people who are not considered married dependents, and they would have use of the commissary under the same privileges.

This is a departure, and I think we cannot take it lightly. Nothing in these bills refers to who brings the divorce or who is the culpable party. One of the amendments, I might point out, by careful reading neglects to give jurisdiction to the wife in certain circumstances because the jurisdiction would refer only to the man, that is, to the military personnel and not to the spouse who is bringing the suit. So, there is a huge loophole that any lawyer could take advantage of.

So I say, let us do the simple thing. Let us do what the courts insisted on and put back the power to the States to adjudicate under the laws of each State.

Mr. WHITEHURST. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. WHITEHURST. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that the gentleman is operating under a handicap, and I do not want to prolong the use of his voice, but he raised an important issue here.

In the Schroeder-Hance-Whitehurst amendment we have a provision that permits continued medical health treatment for an unremarried former spouse who was married to a service member during 20 years of active duty service if suffering from a preexisting medical problem that would prevent buying private health insurance.

Do I understand the gentleman's amendment would void this?

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, my amendment does not address that because all I am doing is to return to the States the power to adjudicate. Now, the court can adjudicate to the retiree or his spouse whatever medical care there is on the purchase of a health policy or whatever under the law. Each State can do it under the final judgment of the court, according to State law. In this instance what we are doing is creating a special class.

Mr. WHITEHURST. There is no doubt about it, but it is a special class that has been created already by the circumstances of being a service wife.

I do not want to repeat the remarks I made in the well a few minutes ago, but I think that there is a certain earned benefit, although it may not be spelled out.

If a woman has been married to a man for 20 years and he has comparable miitary service and she has a physical condition—let us say she even has a terminal disease, which can be very expensive—to say, "Well, the courts will handle this," or "we can put it in somebody else's hands to make a decision," I think, puts her in jeopardy, and my own judgment is that what is stated in this amendment is not so significant that it is going to burden the Government too greatly.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas (Mr. WHITE) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. WHITE was allowed to proceed for 4 additional minutes.)

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, let me respond to the gentleman.

Can the gentleman name me another class of people in this country who have that same advantage, another such class?

Mr. WHITEHURST. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, no, I cannot name him another. That is what makes it significant. For this reason, it is not going to be an undue financial burden.

Mr. Chairman, I would have to object to the gentleman's amendment on that basis.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, we must remember there were no markup on this amendment. There is an opportunity for the House to pass a separate type of program, if that is what needs to be done, with good deliberation, if we want to organize such a thing, but right here we are doing it on the floor, creating a special class.

All I want to do is to go back and put the law where it was before the Supreme Court ordered that State courts could not adjudicate this problem, in the absence of authority from Congress.

Mr. BADHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. BADHAM. Mr. Chairman, I think that both the gentleman from Texas (Mr. WHITE) and the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. WHITEHURST) have hit on a problem that exists in this proposal. That is as far as I know, in any divorce proceedings the spouse who is not the breadwinner is divorcing and has a preexistent medical condition that may be terminal, as the gentleman suggests, and the employment over 20 years has been private employment and the nonbreadwinner is uninsurable that is just too bad.

The gentleman from Texas (Mr. WHITE) is suggesting is that that should not be at issue. I am inclined to agree with the gentleman from Texas on that. I do not know how we would make it otherwise without making a provision for every nonbreadwinner who is divorcing in the United States of America and who has a preexistent condition that is uninsurable.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BADHAM. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is still yielding to me, I believe.

I think the gentleman from Texas (Mr. WHITE) has a correct concept, because the amendment offered by the gentlewoman from Colorado (Mrs. SCHROEDER) allows all things that are related to income or potential income to be laid on the bargaining table in the divorce court. I think the gentleman from Texas makes his point simply, that each State has its own laws and therefore allows a heretofore federally preexempted item to be laid before the State courts

I would be inclined to support the gentleman's substitute for the simple reason that it makes an item negotiable and should be negotiable as it is in any other type of employment.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE. I yield to the gentlewoman from Colorado.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, I think one of the things we are missing is that there were a lot of hearings on this in the House and in the Senate, and what is so unique about this is that in the private sector, if you have that kind of a marriage and if, say, the breadmaker had been covered under a private insurance by the breadwinner and there is a preexisting condition, it usually is taken into account in the court and they can order continued coverage by the private carrier because the person was already covered.

The problem here is that they are covered under the military health plan and they are not carrying private insurance. There is no way that you can then shift and buy private insurance on the outside. So it is a unique case, I submit.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas (Mr. WHITE) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. WHITE was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, the court can insist that the party to the lawsuit, the breadwinner, provide for the medical care. That can be done in the divorce proceedings. That is taken into consideration.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. But, if the gentleman will yield, the former spouse cannot purchase that insurance. That court order does not mean anything if an insurance company will not sell you that insurance. They are usually locked in to cover someone who has been insured a long time in the private sector. But this is a person coming out of military medicine and suddenly being thrown into the private sector, and there are not any insurers that I know of that will insure someone in that situation.

Mr. WHITE. But the court can insist on compliance with the court's rules or the order, which would include payment of medical bills.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. But, if the gentleman will yield further, the medical bills may be catastrophic and the gentleman may not be able to pay them, or the gentlewoman, whoever it happens to be. So I think the Senate was very wise. I know the gentleman does not like all the pages, but what they said was, No. 1, because it is a 20-year marriage, which is a long time, it is a preexisting medical condition, so you could not buy the insurance in the private sector.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas (Mr. WHITE) has again expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. WHITE was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, let me answer the gentlewoman from Colorado (Mrs. SCHROEDER) on that before the time expires again.

If the gentlewoman is talking about a principle of law, then why not provide that all spouses who are in the same boat in this country would still have an opportunity for medical care at public hospitals or something of this nature? That is the point I am making.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, for all spouses in the private sector who are under some kind of medical care, there is an option by the court to cover that kind of thing. That is feasible.

Mr. WHITE. No, I am not talking about that. I am talking about the despondent condition she mentioned.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. In the military?

Mr. WHITE. No. Where there is nothing, then why not, if we are going to say the military spouses' health will be covered, allow all spouses in a divorce action the opportunity to go to a Government hospital? Why have the change?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I do not think he is understanding what I am saying. I am saying that it came about because of the hardship involved, and you could do something about the spouses in the private sector but you could not do something about the spouses in a military sector with a preexisting condition if you are the court and you feel an equity should be done.

Mr. WHITE. All right. The gentlewoman wants the taxpayers to support the people ad infinitum. But we have already overburdened facilities, and I do not think we can go into this thing with this type of program when the courts have the ability to adjudicate in a divorce action in their jurisdictions to take care of such things.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, the DOD has said the maximum amount this would cost is maybe $400,000. We are not talking about the taxpayers picking up all of this. We are only talking about a very specific case—20 years of marriage, a preexisting medical condition, and they cannot buy insurance on the outside.

The other spouse may want to help but cannot, if you have a catastrophic medical care.

This is being considered in the name of equity. If you serve your Government that long, that is a very unique situation. So it is very specific and very limited.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, instead of going to a new program, I say that here is our option for the basic restoration of rights to the courts.

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number or words.

Mr. Chairman, on June 26, 1981, the Supreme Court ruled in McCarty against McCarty that military retirement pay could no longer be considered a marital asset subject to division in divorce proceedings because of the lack of a Federal statute permitting such action. The Court upheld the right of States to determine matters of family law in all cases except those involving military retirement pay.

I am here today to support a measure which I believe would remedy such an inequity, the Schroeder-Hance-Whitehurst amendment. If we are to assume that marriage is a shared enterprise, then we must insure that any and all wealth earned and accumulated, including pensions, should at least be divided equitably. The Congress has responded to the needs of former spouses of Government employees and set a precedent by enacting Public Law 95-366 in 1978, the Foreign Service Act in 1980, and the CIA Spouses Equity Act of 1982. We now should carry this concept one step further by including military retirement pay as marital property.

Ex-Partners of Servicemen for Equality (EXPOSE) is a group established in 1980 to alleviate the plight of the divorced military wife. With a membership of 3,500, its membership statistics show that on the average, their age is 52, they have been married 25 years, and have devoted 20 years to the military.

The National Military Wives Association's data show that many military wives now work outside the home, generally by necessity. However, because of frequent moves, these women are unlikely to stay at one job long enough to earn the right to their own pensions. In addition, their average yearly earnings are considerably smaller and their unemployment rate considerably higher than their civilian counterparts. In most cases, the exwives have custody of the children. Nationwide, 98 percent of divorce settlements give women custody, and yet only 4 percent of divorced women receive alimony and just 22 percent receive child support.

Health insurance is an additional concern. Almost all employers have health insurance plans that guarantee a conversion option to a spouse upon divorce—except the uniformed services. The divorced military spouse does not have the opportunity of converting her CHAMPUS coverage to an individual plan, and many cannot obtain medical coverage because they have a preexisting health problem. For those women who are either too old, too ill, or too poor to obtain private health insurance coverage, their only prospect for decent medical care is through welfare.

I feel it is important to note that this widely supported bipartisan amendment would not entitle a former military spouse to retirement pay nor would it require states to divide military pensions. It simply would allow States to treat military pensions and civilian pensions similarly in a divorce settlement.

In conclusion, I rise today in support of the Schroeder-Hance-Whitehurst amendment to allow State courts the right to treat a military member's retired pay as property in a divorce settlement. Our sense if equity requires that we recognize the contribution of spouses and former spouses as an important economic right.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. NICHOLS TO THE AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MRS. SCHROEDER

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. NICHOLS to the amendment offered by Mrs. SCHROEDER: Strike out everything after section 901 in the matter proposed to be inserted by the amendment and insert in lieu thereof the following:

PAYMENTS OF RETIRED AND RETAINER PAY

SEC. 902. (a) Chapter 71 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"§ 1408. Payment of retired or retainer pay in compliance with court orders

"(a) In this section:

"(1) 'Court' means—

"(A) any court of competent jurisdiction of any State, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, Guam, American Samoa, the Virgin Islands, the Northern Mariana Islands, and the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands;

"(B) any court of the United States (as defined in section 451 of title 28) having competent jurisdiction; and

"(C) any court of competent jurisdiction of any foreign country with which the United States has an agreement requiring the United States to honor any court order of such country.

"(2) 'Court order' means a court's final decree of divorce, dissolution, annulment, or legal separation, or a court ordered, ratified, or approved property settlement incident to such a decree (including a final decree modifying the terms of a previously issued decree of divorce, dissolution, annulment, or legal separation, or a court ordered, ratified, or approved property settlement incident to such previously issued decree), which—

"(A) is issued in accordance with the laws of the jurisdiction of that court;

"(B) provides for—

"(i) payment of child support (as defined in section 462(b) of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 662(b)));

"(ii) payment of alimony (as defined in section 462(c) of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 662(c))); or

"(iii) division of property (including a division of community property); and

"(C) specifically provides for the payment of an amount, expressed in dollars or as a percentage of disposable retired or retainer pay, from the disposable retired or retainer pay of a member to the spouse of former spouse of that member.

For purposes of this definition, 'final decree' means a decree from which no appeal may be taken or from which no appeal has been taken within the time allowed for taking such appeals under the laws applicable to such appeals, or a decree from which timely appeal has been taken and such appeal has been finally decided under the laws applicable to such appeals.

"(3) 'Disposable retired or retainer pay' means the total monthly retired or retainer pay to which a member is entitled under the provisions of this title (other than chapter 61 of this title), title 14, section 3(a) of the Act of August 10, 1956 (70A Stat. 619; 33 U.S.C. 857a(a)), or section 221(a) of the Public Health Service Act (42 U.S.C. 213a(a)) less amounts which—

"(A) are owed by such member to the United States;

"(B) are required by law to be, and are deducted from the retired or retainer pay of such member, including fines and forfeitures ordered by courts-martial, Federal employment taxes, and amounts waived in order to receive compensation under title 5 or title 38;

"(C) are properly withheld for Federal, State, or local income taxes purposes, if the withholding of such amounts is authorized or required by law and to the extent such amounts withheld are not greater than would be authorized if such member claimed all dependents to which he was entitled;

"(D) are withheld under section 3402(i) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (26 U.S.C. 3402(i)) if such member presents evidence of a tax obligation which supports such withholding;

"(E) are deducted as Government life insurance premiums (not including amounts deducted for supplemental coverage); or

"(F) are deducted because of an election under chapter 73 of this title to provide an annuity to a spouse or former spouse to whom payment of a portion of such member's retired or retainer pay is being made pursuant to a court order under this section.

"(4) 'Member' means a person who is or was appointed or enlisted in, or conscripted into, any of the uniformed services, and includes a former member.

"(5) 'Secretary concerned' has the meaning given that term by section 101(5) of title 37.

"(6) 'Spouse or former spouse' means the husband or wife, or former husband or wife, respectively, of a member who, on or before the date of a court order, was married to that member.

"(7) 'Uniformed services' has the meaning given to that term by section 101(3) of title 37.

"(b) For the purposes of this section—

"(1) service of a court order is effective if—

"(A) an appropriate agent of the Secretary concerned designated for receipt of service of court orders under regulations prescribed pursuant to subsection (h) or, if no agent has been so designated, the Secretary concerned, is personally served or is served by certified or registered mail, return receipt requested;

"(B) the court order is regular on its face;

"(C) the court order or other documents served with the court order identify the member concerned and include the social security number of such member; and

"(D) the court order or other documents served with the court order certify that the rights of the member under the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940 were observed; and

"(2) a court order is regular on its face when the order—

"(A) is from a court of competent jurisdiction;

"(B) is legal in form; and

"(C) includes nothing on its face that provides reasonable notice that it is issued without authority of law.

"(c)(1) Subject to the limitations of this section, a court may treat disposable retired or retainer pay payable to a member for pay periods beginning on or after June 26, 1981, either as property solely of the member of as property of the member and his spouse in accordance with the law of the jurisdiction of such court if the spouse was married to the member for a period of not less than 10 years during which the member performed at least 10 years during which the member performed at least 10 years of service which is creditable in determining the member's eligibility for retired or retainer pay, or equivalent pay, as a result of his service in any of the uniformed services.

"(2) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, this section does not create any right, title, or interest which can be sold, assigned, transferred, or otherwise disposed of (including by inheritance) by a spouse or former spouse.

"(3) This section does not authorize any court to order a member to apply for retirement or retire from the uniformed services at a particular time in order to effectuate any payment under this section.

"(4) A court may not treat the disposable retired or retainer pay of a member in the manner described in paragraph (1) unless the court has jurisdiction over the member by reason of (A) his residence, other than because of military assignment, in the territorial jurisdiction of the court, (B) his domicile in the territorial jurisdiction of the court, or (C) his consent to the jurisdiction of the court or unless the marriage was performed in the territorial jurisdiction of the court.

"(d)(1) Not later than 90 days after the effective service of a court order with respect to a member who is entitled to receive retired or retainer pay, or, in the case of a member who, on the date of the effective service of a court order with respect to such member, is not entitled to receive retired or retainer pay, not later than 90 days after such member first becomes entitled to receive retired or retainer pay, the Secretary concerned shall, subject to the limitations of this section, pay to the spouse or former spouse of the member the amount of disposable retired or retainer pay specifically provided for in the court order.

"(2) Payments under this section shall not be made more frequently than once each month, and the Secretary concerned shall not be required to vary normal pay and disbursement cycles for retired or retainer pay in order to comply with any court order.

"(3) Payments from the disposable retired or retainer pay of any member pursuant to this section shall terminate in accordance with the terms of the applicable court order, but not later than the date of the death of the member or the date of the death of the spouse or former spouse to whom payments are being made, whichever occurs first, and in the case of a former spouse, shall terminate with respect to alimony or a division of property (including a division of community property) upon the remarriage of the former spouse before the age of 60.

"(4) If a court order described in paragraph (1) provides for a division of property (including a division of community property) in addition to an amount of disposable retired or retainer pay, the Secretary concerned shall, subject to the limitations of this section, pay to the spouse or former spouse of the member, from the disposable retired or retainer pay of the member, any part of the amount payable to the spouse or former spouse under the division of property upon effective service of a final court order of garnishment of such amount from such retired or retainer pay.

"(e)(1) The total amount of the disposable retired or retainer pay of a member payable under subsection (d) shall not exceed 50 percent of such disposable retired or retainer pay.

"(2) In the event of effective service of more than one court order which provide for payment to a spouse and one or more former spouses or to more than one former spouse from the disposable retired or retainer pay of one member, such pay shall be used to satisfy, subject to the limitations of paragraph (1), such court orders on a first-come, first-served basis. Such court orders shall be satisfied (subject to the limitations of paragraph (1)) out of that amount of disposable retired or retainer pay which remains after the satisfaction of all court orders which have been previously served.

"(3)(A) In the event of effective service of conflicting court orders under this section which assert to direct that different amounts be paid during a month to the same spouse or former spouse from the disposable retired or retainer pay of the same member, the Secretary concerned shall—

"(i) pay to that spouse the least amount of disposable retired or retainer pay directed to be paid during that month by any such conflicting court order, but not more than the amount of disposable retired or retainer pay which remains available for payment of such court orders based on when such court orders were effectively served and the limitations of paragraph (1) and subparagraph (B) of paragraph (4);

"(ii) retain an amount of disposable retired or retainer pay that is equal to the lesser of—

"(I) the difference between the largest amount of retired or retainer pay required by any conflicting court order to be paid to the spouse of former spouse and the amount payable to the spouse or former spouse under clause (i); and

"(II) the amount of disposable retired or retainer pay which remains available for payment of any conflicting court order based on when such court order was effectively served and the limitations of paragraph (1) and subparagraph (B) of paragraph (4); and

"(iii) pay to that member the amount which is equal to the amount of that member's disposable retired or retainer pay (less any amounts paid during such month pursuant to legal process served under section 459 of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 659) and any amounts paid during such month pursuant to court orders effectively served under this section, other than such conflicting court orders) minus—

"(I) the amount of disposable retired or retainer pay paid under clause (i); and

"(II) the amount of disposable retired or retainer pay retained under clause (ii).

"(B) The Secretary concerned shall hold the amount retained under clause (ii) of subparagraph (A) until such time as that Secretary is provided with a court order which has been certified by the member and the spouse or former spouse to be valid and applicable to the retained amount. Upon being provided with such an order, the Secretary shall pay the retained amount in accordance with the order.

"(4)(A) In the event of effective service of a court order under this section and the service of legal process pursuant to section 459 of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 659), both of which provide for payments during a month from the retired or retainer pay of the same member, such court orders and legal process shall be satisfied on a first-come, first-served basis. Such court orders and legal process shall be satisfied out of moneys which are subject to such orders and legal process and which remain available in accordance with the limitations of paragraph (1) and subparagraph (B) of this paragraph during such month after the satisfaction of all court orders or legal process which have been previously served.

"(B) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the total amount of the disposable retired or retainer pay of a member payable by the Secretary concerned under all court orders pursuant to this section and all legal processes pursuant to section 459 of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 659) with respect to any member may not exceed 65 percent of the disposable retired or retainer pay payable to such member.

"(5) A court order which itself or because of previously served court orders provides for the payment of an amount of disposable retired or retainer pay which exceeds the amount of such pay available for payment because of the limit set forth in paragraph (1), or which, because of previously served court orders or legal process previously served under section 459 of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 659), provides for payment of an amount of disposable retired or retainer pay which exceeds that amount available for payment in accordance with the limits of paragraph (1) and subparagraph (B) of paragraph (4), shall not be deemed to be irregular on its face solely for that reason. However, such order shall be deemed to be fully satisfied for purposes of this section by the payment to the spouse or former spouse of the amount of disposable retired or retainer pay available for such payment in accordance with the limits of paragraph (1) and subparagraph (B) of paragraph (4).

"(f)(1) The United States and any officer or employee thereof shall not be liable with respect to any payment made from retired or retainer pay to any member, spouse, or former spouse pursuant to a court order that is regular on its face if such payment is made in accordance with this section and the regulations prescribed pursuant to subsection (h).

"(2) No officer or employee of the United States who, under regulations prescribed pursuant to subsection (h), has the duty to respond to interrogatories shall be subject under any law to any disciplinary action or civil or criminal liability or penalty for, or because of, any disclosure of information made by him in carrying out any of his duties which directly or indirectly pertain to answering such interrogatories.

"(g) Any person receiving effective service of any court order under this section shall, as soon as possible, but not later than 30 days after the date on which effective service is made, send a written notice of such court order (together with a copy thereof) to the member affected by such court order at his last known address.

"(h) The Secretaries concerned shall prescribe uniform regulations to administer this section within the uniformed services.".

(b) The table of sections at the beginning of such chapter is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new item:

"1408. Payment of retired or retainer pay in compliance with court orders.".

SURVIVOR ANNUITIES

SEC. 903. (a) Section 1447 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraphs:

"(6) 'Former spouse' means the surviving former husband or wife of a person who is eligible to participate in the Plan.

"(7) 'Court' has the meaning given that term by section 1408(a)(1) of this title.

"(8) 'Court order' means a court's final decree of divorce, dissolution, annulment, or legal separation, or a court ordered, ratified, or approved property settlement incident to such a decree (including a final decree modifying the terms of a previously issued decree of divorce, dissolution, annulment, or legal separation, or of a court ordered, ratified, or approved property settlement agreement incident to such previously issued decree).

"(9) 'Final decree' means a decree from which no appeal may be taken or from which no appeal has been taken within the time allowed for the taking of such appeals under the laws applicable to such appeals, or a decree from which timely appeal has been taken and such appeal has been finally decided under the laws applicable to such appeals.

"(10) 'Regular on its face' has the meaning given to that term by section 1408(b)(2) of this title.".

(b)(1) Section 1448(a) of such title is amended—

(A) in paragraph (3)(A) by inserting "or elects to provide an annuity under subsection (b)(2) of this section," after "for his spouse,"; and

(B) in paragraph (3)(B) by inserting "or elects to provide an annuity under subsection (b)(2) of this section," after "for his spouse,".

(2) Section 1448(b) of such title is amended to read as follows:

"(b)(1) A person who is not married and does not have a dependent child when he becomes eligible to participate in the Plan may elect to provide an annuity to a natural person with an insurable interest in that person or to provide an annuity to a former spouse.

"(2) A person who is married or has a dependent child may elect to provide an annuity to a former spouse instead of providing an annuity to a spouse or dependent child if the election is made in order to carry out the terms of a voluntary written agreement entered into with a former spouse (without regard to whether such agreement is included in or approved by a court order).

"(3) In the case of a person electing to provide an annuity under paragraph (1) or (2) of this subsection by virtue of eligibility under subsection (a)(1)(B), the election shall include a designation under subsection (e).

"(4) Any person who elects under paragraph (1) or (2) to provide an annuity to a former spouse shall, at the time of making such election, provide the Secretary concerned with a written statement, in a form to be prescribed by that Secretary, signed by such person and the former spouse setting forth whether such election is being made pursuant to a voluntary written agreement previously entered into by such person as a part of or incident to a proceeding of divorce, dissolution, annulment, or legal separation, and if so, whether such voluntary written agreement has been incorporated in or ratified or approved by a court order.".

(c) Section 1450(a)(4) of such title is amended—

(1) by inserting "former spouse or other" before "natural person"; and

(2) by striking out "if there is no eligible beneficiary under clause (1) or clause (2)" and inserting in lieu thereof "unless the election to provide an annuity to the former spouse or other natural person has been changed as provided in subsection (f)".

(d) Section 1450(f) of such title is amended to read as follows:

"(f)(1) A person who elects to provide an annuity to a person designated by him under section 1448(b) of this title may, subject to paragraph (2) of this subsection, change that election and provide an annuity to his spouse or dependent child. The Secretry of Defense shall notify the former spouse or other natural person previously designated under section 1448(b) of this title of any change of election under the first sentence of this paragraph. Any such change of election is subject to the same rules with respect to execution, revocation, and effectiveness set forth in section 1448(a)(5) of this title.

"(2) Any person who, incident to a proceeding of divorce, dissolution, annulment, or legal separation, enters into voluntary written agreement to elect under section 1448(b) of this title to provide an annuity to a former spouse and who makes an election pursuant to such agreement may not change such election under paragraph (1) unless—

"(A) in any case in which such agreement has been incorporated in or ratified or approved by a court order, the person—

"(i) furnishes to the Secretary concerned a certified copy of a court order which is regular on its face and modifies the provisions of all previous court orders relating to the agreement to make such election so as to permit the person to change the election; and

"(ii) certifies to the Secretary concerned that the court order is valid and in effect; or

"(B) in any case in which such agreement has not been incorporated in or ratified or approved by a court order, the person—

"(i) furnishes to the Secretary concerned a statement, in such form as the Secretary concerned may prescribe, signed by the former spouse and evidencing the former spouse's agreement to a change in the election under paragraph (1); and

"(ii) certifies to the Secretary concerned that the statement is current and in effect.

"(3) Nothing in this chapter authorizes any court to order any person to elect under section 1448(b) of this title to provide an annuity to a former spouse unless such person has voluntarily agreed in writing to make such election.".

MEDICAL BENEFITS

SEC. 904. (a) Section 1072(2) of title 10, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by striking out "and" at the end of subparagraph (D);

(2) by striking out the period at the end of subparagraph (E) and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon and "and"; and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following new subparagraph:

"(F) the unremarried former spouse of a member or former member if, on the date of the final decree of divorce, dissolution, or annulment, that former spouse had been married to the member or former member for a period of at least 20 years during which period the member or former member performed at least 20 years of service which is creditable in determining that member's or former member's eligibility for retired or retainer pay, or equivalent pay, as a result of his service in any of the uniformed services and if that former spouse does not have medical coverage under an employer-sponsored health plan.".

(b) Section 1076(b) of such title is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following: "A dependent described in section 1072(2)(F) of this title may be given medical and dental care pursuant to clause (2) without regard to subclause (B) of such clause.".

(c) Section 1086 (c) of such title is amended by inserting after clause (2) the following new clause:

"(3) A dependent covered by section 1072(2)(F) of this title.".

COMMISSARY AND EXCHANGE PRIVILEGES

SEC. 905. The Secretary of Defense shall prescribe such regulations as may be necessary to provide that any unremarried former spouse described in subparagraph (F) of section 1072(2) of title 10, United States Code (as added by section 904), is entitled to commissary and post exchange privileges to the same extent and on the same basis as the surviving spouse of a retired member of the uniformed services.

EFFECTIVE DATE AND TRANSITION

SEC. 906. (a) The amendments made by this title shall take effect on the first day of the first month which begins more than 120 days after the date of enactment.

(b) Subsection (d) of section 1408 of title 10, United States Code, as added by section 902(a), shall apply only with respect to payments of retired or retainer pay for periods beginning on or after the effective date of such amendments, but without regard to the date of any court order. However, in the case of a court order that became final before June 26, 1981, payments under such subsection may only be made in accordance with such order as in effect on such date and without regard to any subsequent modifications.

(c) The amendments made by section 903 of this title shall apply to persons who become eligible to participate in the Survivor Benefit Plan before, on, or after the effective date of such amendments.

(d) The amendments made by section 904 of this title and the provisions of section 905 of this title shall apply in the case of any former spouse of a member or former member of the uniformed services only if the final decree of divorce, dissolution, or annulment of the marriage of the former spouse and such member or former member is dated on or after the effective date of such amendments.

(e) For the purposes of this section—

(1) the term "court order" has the same meaning as provided in section 1408(a)(2) of title 10, United States Code (as added by section 902 of this title);

(2) the term "former spouse" has the same meaning as provided in section 1408(a)(6) of such title (as added by section 902 of this title); and

(3) the term "uniformed services" has the same meaning as provided in section 1408(a)(7) of such title (as added by section 902 of this title).

Mr. NICHOLS (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, I am in a rather uncomfortable situation here this morning from two standpoints. In the first place, I am not an attorney and I am beset on both sides from people who are learned in the law, and I appreciate their expertise in divorce matters.

Second, I am in an uncomfortable situation because I am asking my colleagues to support an amendment that I would really rather not be offering. I would rather not be offering the amendment, not because I do not believe it is a good amendment—for it is, and I believe it is absolutely necessary—but I would rather have been able to consider this rather complex and far-reaching issue within the committee in order to insure that the full impact of these changes could be evaluated in detail.

In my judgment, consideration of a bill or an issue that is as sensitive as this matter, affecting so many individuals in such varied circumstances without benefit of a deliberative process, is not in the best interests of any of the affected parties. It is an attempt to circumvent the system, and it is at the potential expense of the very individuals that it is designed to benefit and to protect.

Be that as it may, I am forced to come to you today to offer you an amendment, together with the gentleman from New York (Mr. MITCHELL), the distinguished ranking Republican on our subcommittee, that makes a last-ditch effort to provide the minimum prudent safeguards needed to preclude the pendulum from swinging too far. I take no issue with the objective of the amendment offered by the gentlewoman from Colorado (Mrs. SCHROEDER). In fact, contrary to the conventional wisdom that seems to have been at the root of the current effort to bypass the committees, I am supportive of the efforts to rectify the problems being experienced by a former spouse of a service member.

Let me say to the gentleman from Virginia that I have heard before our committee many, many of these pathetic cases, and I am in total agreement with him that something needs to be done about it. But in the same vein, let me call to the attention of the gentleman the fact that this is not a one-sided sort of a situation.

I will read to him the case of Col. Robert Stirm, U.S. Air Force, who arrived at Clark Air Force Base in the Philippines. After 5½ months of captivity in a North Vietnamese prison camp, he was greeted when he got there with a "Dear John" letter from his wife of 18 years. While recuperating from his internment in an Air Force hospital in California, he was formally served with papers 2 weeks later.

In the divorce proceedings it was revealed that his wife had begun dating and subsequently having affairs with other men a year after his captivity. Under California's no-fault law this made no difference in the settlement.

The former spouse was awarded 42.7 percent of Colonel Stirm's retired pay, the house, the car, and an entitlement to his accrued leave and moneys paid to him under the War Claims Act for inhumane treatment while in prison.

During the divorce trial, which lasted 13 months, the colonel was forced to live at his brother's home because he had insufficient income after payment of court-ordered child and spousal support.

Currently the former spouse and her husband, her boyfriend since 1970, reside in the house financed by Colonel Stirm's Korean war GI bill to which he became entitled before their marriage in 1955.

The new husband makes in excess of $70,000 as an attorney, according to the former Mrs. Stirm, and she continues to receive 42.7 percent of the colonel's retired pay.

I do not believe that it is necessarily better to rush to solve one set of obvious problems only to create new and unforeseen ones and perhaps even more severe ones.

I am gravely concerned that the Department of Defense has estimated a loss of 40,000 careerists over the next 5 years should the amendment of the gentlewoman from Colorado (Mrs. SCHROEDER) pass in its current form.

No Member to whom I have talked, however, has indicated that there is a desire to do anything but the right thing. Where we differ is on what we consider to be the right action.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. NICHOLS) has expired.

(By unanimous consent Mr. NICHOLS was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. NICHOLS. I have some very significant reservations concerning the implications of the amendment of the gentlewoman from Colorado.

First, I am concerned that in her haste to find a vehicle with which to accomplish the basic objective we share, she has accepted an approach that falls short of accomplishing the full measure of action that appears to be justified based on the evidence that we have gathered to date.

Medical care for the former spouse is a pressing need, and in testimony our committee has heard witness after witness who testified to the high priority that was placed on this aspect of the issue.

The amendment we offer would expand the medical coverage to authorize, without cost, care in medical facilities or under CHAMPUS for unremarried former spouses who had been married at least 20 years while the member was in the military.

The care would be provided on the same basis as the care is now provided for retirees, for dependents of retirees, and survivors.

Because this benefit is designed to recognize the difficulty experienced by a former spouse when attempting to obtain health coverage following a divorce, the benefits would only be available if the former spouse were not covered by another health benefit plan as a result of his or her employment.

Commissary and exchange benefits would also be provided to this class of former spouses under our amendment.

Under the amendment of the gentlewoman from Colorado, while retired pay could be paid directly to the former spouse based on a court award of child support, alimony, or a division of retired pay, the gentlewoman's amendment would not assist the former spouse in obtaining a payment for property other than military retired pay that had not been divided under the court order.

Should the member fail to comply with a division of property no recourse would be available to the former spouse.

Our amendment would authorize the payment of retired pay to satisfy a court order garnisheeing for nonpayment of such amounts but would restrict the total amount paid to the former spouse to the maximum specified in the original amendment.

Second, I am seriously concerned with the lack of critical safeguards included to protect the service member, recognizing that military service is in many ways unique and at times the needs of the service could place the service member in a disadvantaged situation over which he has no control.

The primary characteristic of military service that I believe has been overlooked by the gentlewoman's approach is the frequency of moves required of military members.

The gentlewoman's amendment would subject a military member to the jurisdiction of a court solely because the member was residing in the State as a result of military orders.

Our amendment would limit the applicability of the provisions to States in which the member is domiciled, the States in which the member was married, to States where he resides other than because of military orders, or in States which he consents to the jurisdiction of the court.

Our amendment would also require that to be honored, a court order would need to certify that the provisions of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act had been complied with.

The Civil Relief Act provides certain minimal procedural protection for a service member such as certification that an individual is not in military service if a default judgment is to be levied and that if the member is in the military service that the court at least appoint an attorney to represent the member's interest before a default judgment is entered.

We have received some evidence in the committee that the requirements are not followed in all instances. Although the member has appellate rights that could result in the court decision being changed or delayed this is expensive and oftentimes unworkable.

Third, the recent change in the Foreign Service personnel system and the changes proposed in the CIA personnel system, currently in conference, have been used to argue the need for change in the military.

Both of these systems restrict payments of portions of retired pay to situations in which the marriage lasted 10 years, during which time the member was an employee of the system.

In addition, payments of retired pay to former spouses terminate upon remarriage of a former spouse before age 60.

A similar restriction is only fair for the military member as well, who, to a large extent, is similarly situated.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. NICHOLS) has again expired.

(By unanimous consent Mr. NICHOLS was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. NICHOLS. Our amendment contains these modifications.

Finally, our amendment clarifies the application of the amendment to court orders issued at various times. Court orders finalized before the date of the McCarty decision would be considered in the form in which they existed on the day before the McCarty decision.

This would preserve judgments that were arrived at before the McCarty decision disrupted the situation.

Court orders finalized after the McCarty decision would be considered as they were issued or modified. This would provide an opportunity to redress the uncertainty that has existed since the date of the McCarty decision.

Mr. Chairman, with these amendments, I believe the approach suggested by the gentlewoman from Colorado could be implemented in a fair and equitable manner.

I would like to do more because there remain uncertainties, ambiguities, and potential problems.

However, this forum does not permit this requisite deliberation.

Mr. Chairman, the public interest is served best when the provisions of a change such as this one are balanced fairly. This is what our amendment does and I urge the Members to support our amendment to the amendment of the gentlewoman from Colorado.

Mr. HANCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. NICHOLS. Certainly, I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HANCE. I commend the chairman on his amendment and I agree with most of it. But I have some problems with two or three parts and I would like to ask a question concerning the provisions.

First of all, on page 6 it says that a spouse has to be married for a period of not less than 10 years to receive any benefits. I think that is a very bad provision. It seems to me that we cannot go out and tell a woman you have to be married 10 years before you have full rights. If she has rights under a pension bill or a retirement bill, those rights should vest from the first day. Financially they would be very small. They would be one three hundred and sixty-fifth of whatever his retirement was times the years.

But I really believe the 10 years is a bad provision. If it passes and goes to conference, I would hope the chairman would look at that provision very closely.

Another thing that I would point out is that the divorced spouse should only get the proportional percentage of the retirement for the time that she lived with him. If she lived with him one day she should not get one-half of his retirement. But I think the right should vest before a period of 10 years.

Another question I have is on page 7 where you say the consent of the jurisdiction of the court is one of the ways that the jurisdiction over the individual might be attained. This causes me some concern.

I think as far as a legal question it needs to be that the individual is not put in a position where he could say, "I do not consent to the jurisdiction," and just keep moving from jurisdiction to jurisdiction so that you never can get process of service over him.

I think that probably can be worked out, however, without any problems.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. NICHOLS) has again expired.

(At the request of Mr. HANCE and by unanimous consent Mr. NICHOLS was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. NICHOLS. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HANCE. The last thing that causes me concern is where the bill states that the rights on the retirement benefits would terminate if there were a remarriage before the former spouse is age 60.

The purpose in a divorce case is to get things settled so that they can go their different ways and not be bothering each other. They split property. If a couple worked together in a community property State like Texas and they bought a farm or a ranch or a small business, then when the divorce is finalized they split that property.

The provision in the amendment says if a spouse remarries she would have to give all property back. You cannot do that under State provisions. Under State law you cannot say if a person remarries they have to give their part of the business back or they will have to give their part of the farm back.

This really concerns me because the fact that she remarries or not should not have anything to do with the rights that she had vested in her at the time that she was working and living with her husband who was in the military.

These are the three concerns I have.

Other than that, I think the gentleman has a very good amendment and I would hope he would give some type of commitment that he would look into those concerns.

Mr. NICHOLS. Let me say in response to the gentleman from Texas that I appreciate the leadership he has shown over the years in behalf of this subject. I value his knowledge on the subject very highly.

I believe the 10-year provision is the same as is currently in the Foreign Service and CIA provisions.

But I assure the gentleman that certainly I will be glad to consider them as we go to conference.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NICHOLS. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. DICKINSON. Let me say I planned to speak in support of the gentleman's amendment. But I think what the gentleman is bringing out and making amply clear here is that this is a mishmash of many things that really need to be thought out and explored.

I think it goes back to the point the gentleman in the well made initially. This really should be a subject of extensive hearings so that all parties interested can have their day in court, so to speak, and to develop the problems that will arise from this so that everybody will be represented and we know what we are doing. I do not think that we are going about this in a very prudent manner to really appreciate everything that is involved.

I do not object to what the gentlewoman from Colorado is trying to do, I think. But I think that we should go about it in the more normal way of having hearings and developing things.

I would support the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. NICHOLS. I thank the gentleman. I would much prefer that it had been done in a different forum than on the floor of the House.

A bill like this just does not need to be written on the floor of the House.

But the gentlewoman from Colorado and I have discussed that and she is concerned about some timeframe elements and I understand her concern.

Mr. MITCHELL of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I want to join in the long list of colleagues who have commended the gentlewoman from Colorado, the gentleman from Texas, and the gentleman from Virginia on their long-standing support of this concept.

They have been real champions for the rights of divorced spouses.

I would also like to commend the officers and members of the National Military Wives Association for the excellent job they have done in presenting their case. It is truly a worthy cause and I have deep sympathy for divorced spouses.

We heard in the hearings we did hold many sad stories and I am a sponsor of the bill that the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. WHITEHURST) drafted.

There are a lot of arguments in support for divorced spouses. Some have been mentioned and some have not.

□ 1315

They have frequently played a significant role in their husbands' careers. They have had to endure frequent moves. I checked with the military, to find out how frequent that was, and it is as many as 10 to 12 moves in a 20-year career. They have had little opportunity to further their education. They have little opportunity to hold jobs or to even get good jobs because of the transient nature of their lives. Then too, they have often accepted low-paying jobs because of that. They could not provide continuity in their employment, and often suffered poor career advancement for that reason. But in addition to the poor work environment, they spend many hours of deep concern about the welfare of their husbands, especially husbands who are involved in combat. They very frequently suffer poorer living conditions than spouses who are not married to military members. They have had to pay higher rents, they have had forced sales of furniture, long periods of family separation and, very frequently, Mr. Chairman, they have had to act as both parents when their husbands were away—had to be both father and mother to the children as they were growing up.

So I conclude that they deserve far better treatment than they have been receiving. And I want to certainly help them receive more equitable treatment. Equity, I feel, is the theme of this bill, but not just equity for divorced spouses. Even though the scales have been balanced unfairly on one side for many, many years, I do not feel we should unbalance them on the other side in an attempt to remedy this situation. I think we must also provide equity for the members of the service. What we want, Mr. Chairman, is the best, most equitable bill for both parties.

I agree with the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. NICHOLS) the chairman of our subcommittee, that we probably are acting prematurely. As the chairman has stated, we have not held as many hearings as we would like, although we have had an opportunity, perhaps, through the years to do so. We have not received sufficient testimony. I would hate to pass a bill that the Congress will attempt to amend 29 times next year because we acted prematurely this year.

But I also appreciate the realities of the legislative situation. It is late in the session. The train is leaving the station. The votes are here for this concept, and there is no opportunity to postpone or to hold further hearings to improve the legislation.

So, as Chairman NICHOLS stated, he and I have done what we think is the next best thing, tried to incorporate as many of the improvements that we feel would have been addressed had we had more opportunity to put the bill in final form.

Our amendment to the Schroeder amendment, as the chairman has stated, would limit jurisdictions for divorce, it would limit provisions of the bill to marriages of 10 years or more, permit garnishment of nonpayment of property settlements, terminate payments if spouse remarries before age 60. It also honors court orders prior to the McCarty decision. It provides improved health care for spouses, and finally it provides commissary and exchange provisions to divorced spouses.

I think these are good amendments. We feel, Mr. Chairman, that this makes a good program that Mrs. SCHROEDER has offered even better, a more equitable program, not only for the spouse, but also for the service members, and I would urge my colleagues' support.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to simply say that I have attended some of the hearings involving the dissolution problems, that have been brought up by recent court decisions, particularly the McCarty decision, and I am in favor of the Nichols-Mitchell amendment for several reasons.

I think that we do have a problem with forum shopping under the proposal of the gentlewoman from Colorado. I am also concerned about the extension of medical benefits. I understand—and perhaps the gentleman from New York could inform me on this—that under the Nichols-Mitchell amendment, the 180-day limitation on some medical problems is in fact removed, and this would cover non-preexisting unjuries without a 180-day limitation. Is that the case?

Mr. MITCHELL of New York. If the gentleman will yield, yes, it is the case.

Mr. HUNTER. I think that that is the most important part of this package in the amendment that is put forth by Nichols-Mitchell, and for that reason I would support it, and I would urge all Members to support it.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to speak in favor of and go on record in favor of the amendment offered by the chairman of the subcommittee.

This is a sticky problem that should be addressed. I think, as I have said earlier, probably we would come up with a better bill and a better solution if the subcommittee itself had gone into it in more depth and had had more testimony from all sides. Recognizing, however, that we are at the moment now where we have to make a decision, I would urge my colleagues to support the committee amendment.

We have built in now, by the Nichols amendment, a requirement that the marriage must endure for a 10-year period. One of my colleagues said, "Well, why 10 years? Why should not the rights vest after 1 day or 1 month?"

Well, I think we are building equity into the situation. I think when you look at the rights of the parties, if a person has put in 10 years with a spouse, that person has given up a substantial portion of his life. They have earned certain considerations, as opposed to someone who has been married a month, or whatever. I think that is reasonable.

In addition, the chairman would give to a divorced spouse the right for commissary privileges, the right to purchase CHAMPUS medical benefits, which they now do not have, which is not covered by the amendment offered by the principal proponent of the first amendment.

I think equity is best served by the Nichols amendment. And what we are trying to do is protect the interests of the divorced spouse. I think we have come more nearly to working a perfect equity in the proposed amendment offered by the chairman of the committee. If it is not perfect, it is because we have not had time to perfect it by adequate hearings. I think that this is the best effort that can be put forth at this time. For this reason I would support the chairman's substitute amendment. I think this comes more closely to effecting equity for all parties concerned.

We just heard a very horrendous example of how badly it can work against a serviceman who was a POW in Vietnam. So what we are trying to do, in an imperfect way, is to set a standard of equity for all parties. I think this is the best we can come up with at this time, and I certainly urge support for it.

Mr. HANCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HANCE. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentleman's support, and I certainly agree with the gentleman and appreciate his work on this. But there is one place that I beg to disagree with the gentleman, and that is on the 10-year provision. I think if there were a bill pending before this House that said a man in case of a divorce would not be allowed to visit his children or to have child custody rights unless he had lived with his wife for 10 years, we would be outraged.

Mr. DICKINSON. That is not in this bill.

Mr. HANCE. Well, I know it is not in this bill, but it is very comparable.

Mr. DICKINSON. You cannot obfuscate the thing by saying that we are talking about custodial rights to 10 years. That has got nothing to do with it.

Mr. HANCE. It does have. It has a lot to do with it.

Mr. DICKINSON. It has nothing to do with it.

Mr. HANCE. What you are saying is that she has to live with a man for 10 years, a spouse has to live with a person for 10 years before they have any rights.

Mr. DICKINSON. That is not true either.

Mr. HANCE. I think in this day and time, if you are talking about unjust and unreasonable provisions, that would be a very unjust and unreasonable provision—that you would have to live together 10 years before you would have any rights.

Mr. DICKINSON. No. What we are talking about, if I might reclaim my time, are the rights that we are building into this, over and above what they presently have. We are not taking away any rights from any spouse. Whatever rights they have now, they will continue to have by State law, within the State courts. We are not taking anything away from what they presently have. What we are deciding is how much more we are adding to their existing rights. So what we are saying is that, whatever State law appertains now, they have got it; but what we are saying is, what we are building in is something in addition to what they presently have. And if you want to cloud the issue by trying to make it appear that we are talking about custodial rights or visitation rights, that has nothing to do with what we are talking about here. This is an appeal to the emotions and it can confuse some people, but that is not a part of what is in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama, nor is it a part of what was offered by the gentlewoman from Colorado.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. DICKINSON) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. DICKINSON was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. DICKINSON. What we are saying is how much more than they presently have are we willing to give them. What I am saying is, I think it is not a perfect world. We cannot effect perfect equity here. I think that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama more nearly approaches what we would like to see for all parties than by adding to what the gentlewoman from Colorado offers. I have a personal friend who was married for 20 years, and then she was divorced. She has a terminal illness, and she cannot get medical insurance and she cannot do all of these things because in the State where she was, they did not award adequate compensation to her. Well, we cannot say that every State law has to be the same. That is a local thing.

I think what is offered here by the chairman of the committee and the ranking minority member of the committee to what is being offered by the gentlewoman from Colorado more nearly approximates justice for all, and it is not to take away anything that they have got now. Anybody who has a right now, they still retain it. This is in addition thereto. And to try to obfuscate things by saying, "Well, now, we are talking about custodial rights, or custody of children, and so forth," this is not the case.

Mr. HANCE. I did not say that.

Mr. MITCHELL of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MITCHELL of New York. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to say that the 10-year provision limitation in the Nichols amendment is the same provision that is in the CIA amendment and in the Foreign Service amendment. It is the same amendment that was present in the original Schroeder bill and in the original Whitehurst bill. We should also take into account that there is no vesting in the military pensions. If you are there 20 years, you get it. If you are there 19 years, you do not.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield to the gentlewoman from Colorado.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, Members keep talking about how this is only fair because this is like the CIA and the Foreign Service.

Let me tell the Members the very strong difference between this and the CIA and the Foreign Service, and I hope they will move in the direction, because I think it should be the same. But the CIA and the Foreign Service bill says that after 10 years of marriage there is a presumption that the pension will be divided. We are saying here it is only that they can divide it, it is strictly a matter for decision by the State court.

Now, I think we should go with the presumption. That was the amendment I originally offered. This is not the one that is on the floor today. My amendment only allows State courts to determine the equities.

So we are not coming anywhere close to as strong a coverage as we have for the CIA and the Foreign Service. I think that is a terribly important thing to say. Below 10 years in the CIA and Foreign Service, we go along with whatever the State laws say. But we are in a terrible pickle today because the Supreme Court has said, "For the military, we do not care what the State courts say."

All we are saying is, return it to State law. The cases that we have heard about, of how terrible they were, I remind the Members that this amendment has not passed when those happened. So we are dealing with State law, let State law do it. I think the pro rata share is fair. But I am not bringing it to the floor because I do not think we can pass it. But I hope the committee would at some point.

Mr. DICKINSON. If I might reclaim my time, I would just like to say that I think the gentlewoman has helped make the case I made earlier. We should not be writing this legislation on the floor. It should have been done through the full committee or the subcommittee. I wish that this had been the case but, unfortunately, it is not the case.

Mr. HANCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HANCE. I certainly agree with the gentleman on some of the things he said. My question, though, did not have to do with the side benefits. I think what the gentleman said about the side benefits, the commissary, those types of benefits, was exactly right. Under present law, they really have no enforcement methods, after the McCarty against McCarty decision. My question: If a State court makes a decision, if they have been married for a year, she gets a certain percentage. And it would be a very limited percentage. Then I think she should have the right to enforce that percentage. That is what I would like for the gentleman and the chairman to explore in the conference committee. If she is entitled to 10 years, fine; if she is entitled to 1, fine.

□ 1330

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Nichols amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I will not take my full 5 minutes.

I do serve on the Personnel Subcommittee that the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. NICHOLS) chairs. We have had extensive hearings on this situation.

I rise in support of the Nichols amendment. It is a compromise, and it seems to make a lot of sense.

As I understand the Nichols amendment, it will change from the Schroeder amendment—would require 10 years of marriage before the spouse would be eligible for part of the benefits of a service personnel.

One point should be made very strongly, that the Nichols amendment is in effect better for the spouse as far as health care is concerned; that the Nichols amendment would help the spouse after 20 years of marriage, that she would be eligible for medical care benefits from the military.

As I understand it, the Schroeder amendment does not have this provision.

So it seems like the Nichols amendment is an excellent compromise. As I understand it, the vote will come on the Nichols amendment first. I ask the House to vote "aye," and then vote "no" on the White substitute and "yes" on the Schroeder amendment if the Nichols amendment is adopted.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, several things have been said here. I think we should really clarify where we are. In his statement Mr. NICHOLS argues that the recent changes to the Foreign Service and proposed CIA personnel system—currently in conference—restrict payment to circumstances when the marriage lasted at least 10 years and he says "a similar retriction is only fair for the military member as well."

If Mr. NICHOLS is arguing for a mandatory entitlement system like we have in the Foreign Service, I am all with him. But that is not what his amendment does.

I would like to engage the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. NICHOLS), in a colloquy at this time on his amendment.

Mr. Chairman, as I read the Nichols substitute, it contains eight major changes from the Schroeder-Hance-Whitehurst amendment. I would like to go through each of these changes and ask the author of the substitute some questions on each.

First, the Nichols substitute says that, to be effective, a court order or other documents served with the court order must certify that the rights of the military member under the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940 were observed. This law was passed to insure that creditors of a soldier or sailor did not take unfair advantage of his or her absense from the State, while being on military duty, to win a court judgment. I fully support the law. I am concerned that the Nichols substitute is placing one more regulatory burden on those wishing to make use of this law. What if the parties or the court overlook this section? What if the service member waives his rights? What I would like is some direction, by means of legislative history, to the Pentagon that if it receives a court order deficient in that it does not make the requisite certification under the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act, that the Pentagon will not reject the order, but rather will instruct the parties on how to correct the defect.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. NICHOLS. Let me respond to the gentlewoman form Colorado in this manner by saying, yes, I agree that the Pentagon should inform those who bring in orders which are deficit on how to correct the deficiencies. Further, I would urge the Pentagon to publish a booklet explaining how this law works so that the problem does not arise. Finally, in the situation where the service member waives his or her rights under the Civil Relief Act, it seems clear that the court has complied with the act.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Obviously, you do not mean to require such a certification under the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act for court orders that were entered prior to the effective date of your amendment.

Mr. NICHOLS. Obviously not.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I appreciate the comments of the gentleman from Alabama. Now, the second change creates a 10-year marriage requirement before any direct payment of pensions can be made. I think this provision directly conflicts with the basic philosophy of this provision, which is that we should return to State courts the power to make decisions arising out of the breakup of marriages. State courts should be looked to to determine the equities in each situation. As a general rule, I think pensions should not be divided after short marriages. However, there are always exceptional cases. There are situations where the wife is left with three of four children after the husband walks off with another woman 9 years into the marriage. I think it is bad policy to legislate a 10-year requirement. In the Foreign Service Act, such a minimum requirement was legislated because we were entitling former spouses to a pro rata share of the annuity. Moreover, section 820 of the act specifies that nothing in the act would restrict States from awarding a portion of the pension to those married less than 10 years. This amendment contains no entitlement; it merely returns power to State courts. I think your amendment would be preferable if it contained some mechanism by which a State court could waive the 10-year requirement in egregious cases.

Mr. NICHOLS. I understand what the gentlewoman from Colorado is saying. Obviously, we do not want pensions split after short marriages. That would just be unfair. Still, I would be glad to work with the gentlewoman to see if there is some way in which we can take care of the extreme case, such as she mentions.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. On this 10-year marriage requirement, I am concerned that the way the amendment is drafted does not overrule the McCarthy decision. What you have done here is to cut off court jurisdiction to consider the pension as part of marital property. Is not what you intend merely to prohibit direct payment in the case of marriages of less than 10 years?

Mr. NICHOLS. The way the amendment is drafted, retired pay could not be considered property, if the 10-year requirement were not met. Perhaps we could talk further on this point but our intent at this time is as stated in the amendment.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I find that unfortunate. I will work to change that in conference. Now, third, court orders are only effective if they are issued by one of four courts: One where the service number resides, other than because of his or her military assignment, one where the service member's domicile is, one where the service member consents, and one where the marriage was performed. Although this is a long list, I am concerned that, in some cases, there may be no court within the United States where the action could be brought. While this amendment recognizes foreign court orders, I think we ought to insure that there exists a suitable domestic forum. Let me ask a few questions about each of these jurisdictions. What is a member's domicile?

Mr. NICHOLS. Ordinarily, the place where the service member enlisted in the service is his or her domicile. The service member can, by an affirmative action, change his or her domicile with the military finance center.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Would you agree that the Pentagon would tell a spouse what the current domicile of his or her spouse is so that he or she could bring an action in the appropriate court?

Mr. NICHOLS. Oh, yes, I think that suggestion makes sense.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Also, would you agree that any divorce proceeding which was contested by the military member would be one in which he has consented to the jurisdiction of the court?

Mr. NICHOLS. I would say if he contested on other than jurisdictional grounds, that might be a possibility but I would really have to think further on that.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Now the fourth change you made is the most unacceptable to me. It says that any direct payment of retired pay to a former spouse cuts off if the former spouse remarries before age 60. This is true whether the payment of retired pay is characterized as alimony or as division of property and is true in both community property and noncommunity property States. The view in community property States is that all marital property becomes community property and after a separation, each party gets a share. Without a doubt, in a community property State, the pension of one spouse is, in part, the property of the other as well. To cut off this right, deprives the former spouse of property to which he or she is entitled under State law and overturns State law. Again, this provision flies in the face of the general policy of the amendment, to permit States to treat military retired according to State law. Since the bill developed by the other body does not contain this State law override, I hope you will work out something in conference to protect State court prerogatives. I can see no overwhelming Federal interest that dictates preemption of State law, particularly in the family law area.

Mr. NICHOLS. I agree with the gentlewoman that we should reverse the McCarty decision and return to State courts their authority. However, we must also insure that the purpose of the Government annuity is preserved. I will be happy to work with the gentlewoman to see if additional balance between these goals can be achieved.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. The fifth change adds a new section concerning the garnishment of a service member's retired pay to satisfy a division of property. This is drafted in an ambiguous way. Let us take the situation in which a State court rules that the wife should receive $100 a month in alimony, $100 a month in child support, and $100 a month in recognition of her property in the marriage. Does this new garnishment section mean that she can receive direct payment of $200 for alimony and child support, but has to wait until he falls behind in his payments and get a writ of garnishment before she can seek direct payment of the $100 division of property? Or does this mean that the Pentagon will pay her $300 a month directly and that she can use this added garnishment authority if she is supposed to get half the proceeds from the sale of the house and he refuses to pay it over?

Mr. NICHOLS. I think clearly the latter is the case. The social security amendments in 1974 provided garnishment for child support and alimony. We are expanding that to include division of property. This is an add-on, drafted in response to the testimony we received from former spouses. Clearly, if the court order says the former spouse gets $300 a month in alimony, child support and division of property, the Pentagon should pay over $300 a month as a direct payment.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Sixth, your amendment expands the availability of medical coverage to all unremarried 20-year former spouses who do not have an employer sponsored health plan. I think this is a valuable addition. If the spouse has an employer sponsored health plan at the time of the divorce, but subsequently leaves that job, can that spouse then take advantage of military health benefits?

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentlewoman from Colorado (Mrs. SCHROEDER) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mrs. SCHROEDER was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentlewoman would continue to yield, the answer is "yes." The way the amendment is drafted, if, at any time, such a former spouse does not have employer sponsored health coverage, the former spouse can use CHAMPUS.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Your seventh change provides commissary and PX privileges to the same group of unremarried 20-year spouses. Again, this is a good change. Yet, the language of section 905 refers back to the health benefits language to describe the class of beneficiaries. Obviously, the requirement for no employer sponsored health plan does not apply to qualify for commissary and PX privileges.

Mr. NICHOLS. Obviously not.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Finally, you have changed the effective date to say that the Pentagon should honor all pre-McCarty court orders, but not accept modifications, and should honor post-McCarty court orders and their modifications. Is this correct?

Mr. NICHOLS. The gentlewoman is correct.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. While I object to the 10-year marriage requirement and to the termination on remarriage provision, I think the Nichols amendment is an acceptable proposal.

I really want to compliment the gentleman on the additions that he has made. I want to compliment him on the hearings he has had on this. I think his assurances have convinced me that I should accept this amendment, and I do accept the amendment.

I want to respond to what many of the people here have said about not having hearings. The gentleman from Alabama has had lots of hearings on this. The House has had lots of hearings on this, on the CIA, on Foreign Service, on civil service. We have considered it as a full body, it is not something new. I really compliment the gentleman for helping us move this, because time is of the essence, and I want to thank him.

Mr. CLAUSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. CLAUSEN. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding.

I want to genuinely compliment the gentlewoman from Colorado and the gentleman from Alabama for what I perceive to be one of the more constructive colloquies and dialogs in clarifying a very sensitive issue.

I think what they have done has contributed substantially to the credibility of the legislative process as a result of this very constructive exercise.

Mr. CLAUSEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to compliment the gentlelady from Colorado, PAT SCHROEDER, and the gentleman from Alabama, BILL NICHOLS, for the constructive colloquy on a very sensitive issue. It is obvious that indepth research has been conducted on correcting this situation and I would like to compliment both of these Members for the clarification of the intent and purpose of the amendment. I would also like to state how very strongly I feel about this issue and would like to submit an example of a constituent of mine with a legitimate grievance which this amendment is designed to correct.

My constituent, a resident of Napa, Calif., was married for 31 years to an individual who was career Army. During those 31 years, she devoted her life to her husband's career and the raising of their two children, who are now grown and reside in States other than California. She considered this her life's work, and faithfully committed her time and energies to her family, looking, in time, to the day when she and her husband would be able to settle down in retirement, with his military pension as a means of support.

However, her faithfulness and devotion to family were not matched by her husband, who, in the 30th year of their marriage, began seeing another woman and started down the road toward alcoholism. Given these unhappy circumstances, she was forced to divorce him.

Believing that her considerable contribution of time and energy to her husband's career, as well as the sacrifice she made in foregoing a career of her own entitled her to a share of her partner's military pension, she attempted to make such a provision in the divorce settlement. Unsuccessful in her attempt, she appealed to her elected representatives for assistance, only to discover that there was no statute in existence that would give her a right to any amount of her husband's pension, should he die or retire.

As California is a community property State, the settlement required that all of the couple's assets, excluding his pension, be divided equally between them. As their sole asset consisted of their home, they were forced to sell it and divide the proceeds from the sale.

Left only with these funds, my constituent had to shift for herself. She filed for supplemental security income (SSI) but was denied, informed that her assets had not fallen to the required level. Reaching retirement age, she has no social security benefits on which to rely, only a small amount of public assistance once her assets had dwindled.

Mr. Chairman, I know each of us must know at least one individual, like my constituent, who has thus been denied the fruits of her labor. We have now before us a means to rectify the inequities inherent in the present law, an amendment to correct a legitimate grievance. On behalf of my constituent and those in similar situations, I rise in support of this amendment.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. NICHOLS) to the amendment offered by the gentlewoman from Colorado (Mrs. SCHROEDER).

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. HANCE TO THE AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MRS. SCHROEDER, AS AMENDED

Mr. HANCE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HANCE to the amendment offered by Mrs. SCHROEDER, as amended. At the end of the amendment, insert the following new section:

"SEC. 907. Nothing in this title shall overrule or require the modification of any state law or state court decision in any state which treats marital property as community property."

Mr. HANCE. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is very simple. It would allow the State courts to make the final decision. I think the thing that it really speaks to is if they want to decide that the couple have to live together 1 year, they can make that decision, but they can decide 20 years, or they can decide 25. If there was a remarriage the State court could make that decision that the spouse would not be entitled to any rights or they could make the decision she was still entitled to certain rights.

□ 1345

I think the main thrust of this amendment is just making sure that the State courts will still have the jurisdiction and the power to make the final decision. Most of the people I have worked with on this bill, support that position.

I would hope that the committee as a whole would adopt this.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words. I rise in opposition to the amendment.

I have said previously that I respect the ability and knowledge of the gentleman from Texas on this subject; but regrettably, I do not respect it enough to support his amendment. In fact, I am adamantly opposed to the amendment. This, in effect, undoes one of the important provisions that is included in the amendment of the gentleman from New York (Mr. MITCHELL) and our amendment.

I would call attention of the House to the fact that the Department of Defense in testimony on the Senate side when the Jepsen amendment was discussed over there indicated that should this provision, this 10-year provision not be included in the bill, that we would probably be faced with an exodus of some 40,000 career noncommissioned officers in the military.

I hope we vote this amendment down. I object to it very strongly.

Mr. MITCHELL of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words. I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I think it sounds innocuous enough, simple enough on its face: to just let the courts make the final decision. But it could wipe out the limitations that we have just adopted in the Schroeder amendment by amending it with the Nichols and Mitchell amendments.

It certainly makes the 10-year marriage limitation questionable, and I just wonder if it could possibly eleminate other provisions that we have put in the bill to make it more palatable to divorced spouses; so because it is vague and because it affects the 10 year limitation, I urge my colleagues to vote against the amendment.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, let me cite two examples that I was just discussing with my colleague here.

I practiced law for a number of years. For 6 years I was a circuit judge exercising jurisdiction over divorce matters; for 4 additional years I was judge of a juvenile court. I do have some background and some feeling for the problems that exist here.

I know of a divorce decree that specified that the alimony should be paid to the wife until she marries or until she attempts to remarry.

Well, now, you say, what in the world did that mean, attempts to remarry?

Well, this grew out of a factual situation where a divorced spouse did go through a marriage ceremony and lived with a second husband for 1 year and then they got unhappy with each other and they had the marriage annulled. They were not divorced. It was annulled. Then she went back to the first husband and said, "Hey, I want to get alimony for the last 12 months, because it was never a legal marriage and you owe me all this money."

So the first husband thought he was home free, but it turned out that was not exactly the case, because it was not a legal marriage. He had to go back for 12 months and pay her back alimony.

Then there was another case that I know of where a fellow made a pretty good settlement with his divorced wife until she remarried. Well, then, she smiles and she starts living with this guy and she tells her first husband, "There ain't no way I am every going to remarry. You are going to continue to pay, because I am going to live with whomever I want to whenever."

I guess that is our new morality; but the point I am trying to make is that we cannot here by legislation cover all of the nuances, all the problems that arise in domestic difficulties. These have to be left to the local courts, to the divorce courts. We cannot presume to anticipate all these problems and I think in the agreement between the chairman of the committee and the gentlewoman from Colorado (Mrs. SCHROEDER), we have done the best that we can. To put additional burdens on us by accepting this I think would be a mistake.

I do rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. KAZEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. I would be very pleased to yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. KAZEN. The gentleman has brought up certain points that generally would apply to the entire country; but let me tell the gentleman about my State.

Mr. DICKINSON. This is Texas, right?

Mr. KAZEN. Yes, sir. The great State of Texas does not have a garnishment law. We cannot go after anybody's salary or anybody's pension or anything else. A pension then would become a property right.

Now, the courts will have to look at individual cases, in my opinion, and they do.

Mr. DICKINSON. And should.

Mr. KAZEN. And each case is different.

Mr. DICKINSON. And should be.

Mr. KAZEN. It could be possible that a court would not give the spouse a dime of this pension, because the court might have given her other property that exists, or the court might take all of it away from the retiree and give it to her, because the court has awarded him certain other properties.

So what I am saying is that you cannot dictate to the States what their law should be. We either follow the State law, what the courts have done, and give recognition to that decree, or we do not.

Now, if we try to adopt a law to apply to every single one of the 50 States, we are going to be in trouble.

Mr. DICKINSON. Well, I think we are singing off the same page here. I agree with the gentleman, if I understand him correctly. We cannot anticipate all the problems here in the House.

Mr. KAZEN. But does not the amendment of my colleague from Texas do exactly what the gentleman from Alabama and I want done, leave it up to the States, whatever the State law is, the court will decree, and the secretaries should comply therewith.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

(At the request of Mr. HANCE and by unanimous consent, Mr. DICKINSON was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. KAZEN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, then the court will follow the law in that State and render judgment. Then that judgment or that decree will have to be given status by the different secretaries. It is that simple as far as I am concerned.

Now, does the gentleman see anything wrong in that?

Mr. DICKINSON. If I understand the import and the impact of the proposed amendment, it is putting additional restrictions and burdens on the military than would appertain within the State courts. Perhaps I am misreading it.

I am not that familiar with community property law, because my State never recognized it. I did not practice in a community property State.

What my feeling is, and perhaps this is what the gentleman from Texas is trying to achieve, is that by what we are doing here we will not interfere with a States rights between the parties. Perhaps that is what the gentleman is trying to do.

The way I read it, though, it would put another burden on the military to say that you cannot do what they normally would do. Perhaps I am wrong.

Mr. KAZEN. Let me tell my colleague that my purpose in rising and asking these questions is to clarify this issue in my mind. Exactly what are we doing to State laws? Are we superseding them by a law that we are here passing or are we simply saying to the States, "You decide what the division of property should be between inhabitants of your State according to your law and whatever you say is the result, the secretaries of the services will have to abide by."

Mr. DICKINSON. That is what I feel it should be.

Let me yield to the chairman of the subcommittee to explain this and then I will be glad to yield to the gentlewoman from Colorado.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, the difference is, and I am a great States rights man, as the gentleman knows; but we are dealing with a Federal annuity. That makes it a little different in my mind. We are talking about putting a restriction in the Federal law that says this marriage needs to have existed for 10 years. That is protection to the serviceman. It is included in the provisions in the foreign service and the CIA. It ought to be in there and I hope we will vote the amendment down.

Mrs. BOGGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield to the gentlewoman from Louisiana.

Mrs. BOGGS. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I would like to say to the gentleman that as a citizen, a resident of a community property State, I feel that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas is simply protecting our State courts and our State laws, along with the other States of the Union in this bill.

I would hope very much that the amendment of the gentleman from Texas will prevail so that we will be given equal protection under this law, as all the other States courts will be.

Mr. DICKINSON. Is it the understanding of the gentlewoman and the understanding of the gentleman from Texas (Mr. HANCE) who offered the amendment, that this preserves existing States rights and State law rather than adding an additional burden to the Federal interpretation of what is State law? Is that the gentleman's understanding and the gentleman's intent?

Mr. HANCE. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, that is the purpose of the amendment and that is the intent and the clear intent.

Mr. DICKINSON. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I simply want to reiterate the support that I have already indicated for the legislation authored by the gentleman from Texas and the gentlewoman from Colorado and the gentleman for Virginia, but indicate also my strong support for this amendment for the reasons the gentlewoman from Louisiana just outlined.

I wanted to also point out the States that would be affected. Community property States are essentially in the west and they are in addition to California, my State, Arizona, Idaho, Nevada, New Mexico, Texas, and Washington. Those seven, along with Louisiana, would be directly impacted if this legislation were to be enacted without the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas. I am in strong support and hope the Members of the body from those States will be supportive of it as well.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from California yield before he yields back his time?

Mr. FAZIO. I would be happy to yield.

Mr. DICKINSON. In talking to the staff and also to one of the coauthors of the amendment just adopted, do I understand that if the gentleman's amendment is accepted that we are taking away the 10-year limitation that we have just put in place? Does this have an effect on the 10-year limitation?

Mr. FAZIO. We would leave it up to the courts. They might decide 1 year. They might decide 20 years. They would look at each individual case, as they should.

Mr. DICKINSON. Then the answer is in the affirmative, it does obliterate the 10-year requirement?

Mr. FAZIO. Yes, it could.

Mr. DICKINSON. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. HANCE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Without objection, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. HANCE) is recognized for 5 additional minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. HANCE. Mr. Chairman, just very quickly, I think the thing I want to get across on this amendment is that we should allow the State domestic courts to make all divorce decisions. If we do not adopt this amendment, we are in effect taking the position that the Federal Government is going to make final determinations on what type of judgments come out of divorce courts. I will tell you, that is going to open up a lot of problems and it will be a can of worms.

This amendment allows the States to make the final decision. This is what most of the people that have been involved in this debate have long stood for.

I would hope that we would have the adoption of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas (Mr. HANCE) to the amendment offered by the gentlewoman from Colorado (Mrs. SCHROEDER), as amended.

The question was taken; and the Chairman pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 332, noes 74, not voting 28, as follows:

Messrs. ANDREWS, ADDABBO, DANIEL B. CRANE, HERTEL, CHAPPIE, SMITH of Oregon, HOLLENBECK, ROSE, BROOKS, WRIGHT, THOMAS, BENEDICT, FOUNTAIN, and WHITLEY, Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska, and Messrs. EDWARDS of Alabama, WALKER, and HAMMERSCHMIDT changed their votes from "no" to "aye."

Messrs. BEVILL, DANIEL B. CRANE, JEFFRIES, and SMITH of Alabama changed their votes from "aye" to "no."

So the amendment to the amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, in view of the Hance amendment being agreed to, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentlewoman from Colorado (Mrs. SCHROEDER), as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Clerk will designate title X.

Title X reads as follows:

TITLE X—GENERAL PROVISIONS

TRANSFER AUTHORITY

SEC. 901. (a)(1) Upon determination by the Secretary of Defense that such action is necessary in the national interest, the Secretary may transfer amounts of authorizations made available to the Department of Defense in this Act between any such authorizations (or any subdivisions thereof). Amounts of authorizations so transferred shall be merged with and be available for the same purposes as the authorization to which transferred.

(2) The total amount of authorizations that the Secretary of Defense may transfer under the authority of this section may not exceed $1,500,000,000.

(b) The authority provided by this section to transfer authorizations—

(1) may only be used to provide authority for higher priority items than the items from which authority is transferred; and

(2) may not be used to provide authority for an item that has been denied authorization by Congress.

(c) The Secretary of Defense shall promptly notify Congress of transfers made under the authority of this section.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. STRATTON

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STRATTON: On page 26 after line 22, insert

SEC. 902. (a) The Secretary of Defense should conduct a test program during fiscal year 1983 in accordance with this subsection to test the effect of exempting certain contracts of the Department of Defense from the provisions of section 2892 of title 10, United States Code and paying a price differential under such contracts for the purpose of relieving economic dislocations. Under such test program, the Secretary of Defense may exempt from the provisions of such section any contract (other than a contract for the purchase of fuel) made by the Defense Logistics Agency during fiscal year 1983 if the contract is to be awarded to an individual or firm located in a Labor Surplus Area, as defined and identified by the Department of Labor, and if the Secretary determines—

(1) that the awarding of such contract will not adversely affect the national security of the United States;

(2) that there is a reasonable expectation that bids will be received from a sufficient number of responsible bidders so that the award of such contract will be made at reasonable cost to the United States;

(3) that the price differential to be paid under such contract will not exceed 3 percent; and

(4) the value of such contract, when added to the cumulative value of all other contracts awarded under the test program, will not exceed $5,000,000,000.

(b) Not later than April 15, 1983, the President shall submit a report to Congress on the implementation and results to that date of the test program authorized by subsection (a). The report shall include as assessment of the costs and benefits of the test program.

Mr. STRATTON (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to offer an amendment to the Defense authorization bill that I believe will help to strengthen our national defense, while at the same time promoting national economic recovery. My amendment would continue a modest test program that has been conducted by the Defense Logistics Agency for the past 2 years that has targeted procurement contracts to areas of high unemployment.

As long ago as 1952, in the middle of the Korean war, the Federal Government recognized that large numbers of idle factories and unemployed workers, which we have today, of course, pose an obstacle to rapid industrial mobilization in the event of war or national emergency. For that reason, President Truman back in 1952 issued Defense Manpower Policy No. 4, which required that certain agencies should give preference in the awarding of procurement contracts to firms located in areas of high unemployment so as to insure that the Nation's industrial capacity was maintained on as broad as basis as possible.

In 1953, however, the Congress passed a provision which has since come to be known as the Maybank amendment, that prohibited the Defense Department from paying any cost differential to target contracts to private companies in labor-surplus areas. The amendment subsequently was added routinely to every defense spending bill on every year until 1980, when Congress approved a new test program to be conducted by the Defense Logistics Agency.

In the first year, DLA was authorized to purchase up to $3.4 billion in nonstrategic goods and services from businesses located in labor-surplus areas, and to give such firms a price advantage of up to 5 percent when bidding against firms from economically healthful areas.

Last year, the Reagan administration recognized the worthiness of this approach to the problems of the distressed areas, and both President Reagan and Budget Director Stockman lent their support, and have already lent it for this coming year, to the continuation of the program. As a result, the DLA program was extended through fiscal year 1982, with this limit increased to $5 billion.

Mr. Chairman, very few Government programs work the way that they were intended, but here is one that apparently has worked as it was intended. Although the test period has been very, very short, preliminary data indicate that the program is doing precisely what it was supposed to do, and equally important, at very little cost. Through September 1981, the first period for which results were available, DLA had paid a cost differential on only 248 of the 1,881 contracts that were awarded to firms in labor-surplus areas, a surprisingly low 13 percent. While the value of the 248 contracts came to almost $30 million, the cost differential amounted to only $555,912, so that the actual cost differential involved in targeting high unemployment areas turned out to be only 1.9 percent instead of the 5 percent which was permitted, considerably less than the amount allowed.

Mr. Chairman, this tells us that, given the opportunity to compete for Government contracts, firms in economically distressed areas can participate successfully in supplying the nonstrategic goods. We are not talking about Pershing II's or B-1's or anything of that kind needed by our Armed Forces. The DLA report also shows that as a result of the bidding on contracts, the differential on these 248 contracts, 1,732 jobs were created or maintained, so that the cost per job under the program, even after DLA's administrative expenses have been added, is only $425.65. That is considerably less than any other Federal job program.

In addition, the real cost to the Government may have been even less because those workers, if left unemployed, might well be collecting income and maintenance payments or other Government benefits. The amendment I have submitted today would simply extend the test program through fiscal year 1983 at the same level, with one important distinction, that is, that the amendment would reduce, on the basis of our proven record, would reduce the price differential. It would reduce the price differential from 5 to 3 percent in the light of DLA data indicating that the average price differential was only 1.9 percent.

Mr. Chairman, this year we have a $177 billion defense budget, and over the next several years we will be seeing further significant increases in Government defense spending. We cannot ignore the impact of these expenditures on the Nation's economy nor the importance of guaranteeing that distressed as well as prospering areas have the opportunity to participate in the defense production.

I would also note that although this program allows payment of a small price differential, it may actually keep costs of nonstrategic goods down by guaranteeing that there is abundant competition for these contracts.

Mr. Chairman, I think all my colleagues are aware that I support a strong national defense. If they are not, they have not been listening in the last couple of weeks. But we can never have a truly strong defense if significant areas of the country are afflicted with idle workers and machinery, which is certainly true in the great Northeast section of our country. Such a situation would leave us unprepared to respond to a national emergency and unable to adequately supply the common goods our troops rely on.

Continuation of the DLA test program will strengthen the national economy by putting people and machinery back to work and enhance our national security by helping to maintain a broad industrial base.

Mr. Chairman, I just want to bring to the attention of my colleagues the fact that this program, as I indicated, is supported by the President of the United States. He has indicated that this is a program that has succeeded. Let me just read his remarks because they are always very persuasive.

The President said this:

> It was difficult to determine the impact of the set-aside on unemployment levels or on the general economies of these areas. Since in many instances, labor surplus firms were able to compete effectively for defense contracts without the benefit of premiums, the cost of the test proved small.
> Given these initial inconclusive test results, I recommend that the Congress not repeal the longstanding Maybank Amendment. However, to ensure that the test is given a full and fair evaluation, I would support its continuation through fiscal year 1983, as recently passed by the Senate.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRATTON. I am pleased to yield to my friend, the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I just want to make sure I understand what we are doing here.

As I understand it, for a number of years the Maybank amendment has been in place which would not allow DOD to give preference to areas of the country that have had high unemployment. I got a letter from the gentleman saying that his amendment would be very beneficial to my State because we do have a very high unemployment there.

But it seems on the face of it that this is sort of a bailout for the Northeast-Midwest coalition that is going to give them preferential treatment in acquiring contracts, and I was just wondering if the gentleman could help me and the Members of the House in understanding the rationale as to why the Defense Department once again is going to be used as a social catalyst, so to speak, to bail out the economy and used in conducting a social experiment.

Why do they not just bid on a 1-to-1 basis and whoever makes the lowest bid gets the award? Why do we have to give preferential treatment here?

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that the 5-percent figure which he cites is not in my amendment. We would continue this test for another year simply because, although we have a 5-percent——

Mr. DICKINSON. Do we have that 5-percent figure?

Mr. STRATTON. Let me just finish my statement.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York (Mr. STRATTON) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. STRATTON was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, we previously had the 5 percent in there, but it turned out that the actual differential over the 2 years that this test has been running was only 1.9. My amendment set a 3-percent differential. So this is a very minor differential, and as the gentleman has pointed out, these labor surplus areas are not confined simply to the Northeast. The gentleman's State of Alabama has a 13.2-percent unemployment rate, the highest in the Nation, and the State of Alabama has 48 labor surplus areas, the sixth highest in the Nation.

Let me also point out that we are not asking the Defense Department as a whole to go into this experiment. It is only the Defense Logistics Agency, which buys nuts and bolts and clothing and that sort of thing. And as I pointed out in my previous remarks, the benefits of this have been substantial in terms of the number of jobs created and the benefits to the areas that did receive the contracts.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, as the gentleman has pointed out, in my State we do have a very high unemployment rate. So if I should oppose this amendment, it is certainly not with a parochial interest; it is against the interests of many people in my State.

But my question to the gentleman is this: Why is this necessary? Why should not everybody compete on an equal basis? Why should there be preferential treatment given to the Department of Defense to in turn pass on to areas of high unemployment?

The gentleman says it will create jobs, but for every job it creates there, it disestablishes a job someplace else, I assume, because the work is going to be done. Why do we want the Defense Department getting into this social program?

Mr. STRATTON. We are not taking jobs away from any other place. We are creating jobs.

Mr. DICKINSON. Where are they coming from? You take them from one place and put them in another place.

Mr. STRATTON. Some 600 jobs were created in the State of Alabama as a result of this program. If these 600 people were to be without jobs, the Government would then have to pay them unemployment insurance and welfare and all the rest. So we are enhancing the economy of the country. We are not degrading the operations of the Defense Department as a result of this program.

Mr. MITCHELL of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRATTON. I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MITCHELL of New York. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The gentleman's explanation is excellent in terms of really saving funds by keeping people at work who want to work. There is another reason why I think it is very important, too, and that is that it will further serve to help diversify our defense industrial base.

That is very important in a wartime situation, or preparation for war. Not only are we keeping people working, but we are also having our industrial wartime base diversified broadly across the country.

If the gentleman will yield further, I would like to say to my colleague, the gentleman from Alabama, that 54 percent of the labor surplus areas are not in the Northeast and Midwest, so it is not a regional approach. It is a national approach. Unemployment is at the highest levels reached since the Great Depression. There are many people unemployed.

So, Mr. Chairman, for that reason, too, I support the amendment, and I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRATTON. I am glad to yield to my colleague, the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

In answer to the question of the gentleman form Alabama (Mr. DICKINSON), who asked, "Do we take these jobs and move them from one place to another?" We do not, because the Defense Department, under 95-507, is supposed to create jobs by taking large contracts and taking small portions of those contracts and putting them out to small business. That is where the jobs are created. They are not taken from one place and moved to another. So, therefore, we have great diversification, which is most important.

I think the gentleman from Alabama fully agrees with me that in order to get prices down and get cost-effective buying, we need competition. It is through this experiment over these last several years that we have had that competition and have brought prices down and have obtained more cost-effective buying for the Defense Department.

Mr. Chairman, I am happy to lend my support to the amendment offered by the distinguished chairman of the Armed Services Subcommittee on Procurement and Military Nuclear Systems. Two years ago I sponsored the original measure that modified the Maybank amendment and resulted in establishment of the Defense Logistics Agency test program.

The House voted for this change because it believed that military procurement, if targeted correctly, held the potential for significantly increasing employment in economically distressed areas. The preliminary data show that this belief was well founded.

In a time of record unemployment, when the Nation is losing much of the industrial capacity of its older communities, the importance of using scarce Federal resources wisely cannot be exaggerated. Our constituents have told us time and time again that they want to see the Government spend its money efficiently and effectively. What more efficient and effective way could we devise to purchase needed military supplies than to channel these contracts to the Nation's most economically troubled communities?

The Department of Defense accounts for between two-thirds and three-quarters of all Federal Government procurement. Given this fact, and that military spending is scheduled to increase significantly in the next few years, we bear a special responsibility to insure that these funds are spent in such a way that inflation is not stimulated and areas of high unemployment receive special consideration in the assignment of contracts.

Mr. Chairman, this is a program that works. In its initial months it created or maintained almost 1,800 jobs at an additional cost of only $421.65 apiece—a remarkable figure when we look at other programs that cost thousands of dollars to create a job.

One of the best features of this program is that it is not creating jobs in specialized military production fields that expand or shrink with changes in the defense budget or fashions in military technology. Rather, it is building capacity for production of goods that also can be sold to consumers—frequently goods that otherwise might be produced overseas. And as military procurement of these goods helps to build this capacity, it also provides a financial base that will help make these companies more competitive in the domestic economy, enabling them to keep down the prices charged to both the military and the private consumer.

Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues once again to support this amendment and continue a program that is building domestic employment and industrial capacity as well as a strong national defense.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRATTON. I am very happy to yield to my colleague, the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. Chairman, it would appear to me, if this line of reasoning is to be continued, since the gentleman has pointed out how many jobs this has created, that we should increase the differential to perhaps 10 percent and up the amount to $50 billion or $100 billion in defense procurement and we would put everybody in the country to work, if that is valid economic logic.

It would appear to me that this is nothing more than another example of subsidizing inefficient producers and price and resource allocation by the Government through the Defense Department, which we are ordering to operate efficiently. But handicapping by bills such as this.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York (Mr. STRATTON) has again expired.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Objection is heard.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong opposition to the Stratton amendment, and I would like to point out to my colleagues that this is not a committee amendment. I was rather surprised that the gentleman from New York (Mr. STRATTON) offered this amendment. He certainly did not offer it in committee, and we did not know anything about it until he brought it forward a few minutes ago.

No matter what we say, it is really putting a State against a State or a region against a region. We do not need that in this House.

Quite frankly, we have got enough unemployment in this country now without having to worry about shifting jobs around to other parts of the country. And the test program really has not done anything at all.

I would just like to quote what has happened in 11 months of this test program that the gentleman from New York, Mr. SAM STRATTON, wants to extend for another year. It has cost the taxpayers $1.5 million. What it has done is added 2,300 jobs in one part of the country and we lose 2,368 jobs in another part of the country, a net loss of 68 jobs. We pay $1.5 million to lose 68 jobs.

This is a great test program. The gentleman from New York, Mr. SAM STRATTON, wants to extend it for another year. It does not make any sense. In my own State of Mississippi we added 52 jobs and we lost 52 jobs. It cost the taxpayers $1.5 million.

Quite frankly, the big people who build the big aircraft and the tanks and the guns are not affected. This is the Defense Logistics Agency. The little jobs, the little contractors, will be affected. The "biggies" will not be affected in New York York and other parts of the country, but the little businesses will be hurt, and it is just not a good amendment. It is a bad precedent to interfere with the awarding of small contracts by bringing in unemployment.

Mr. Chairman, the amendment does not make any sense. It costs the taxpayers money, and it has not worked.

Mr. MITCHELL of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to support this amendment. It would provide for continuation of a program that we authorized in Congress back in 1980 that has proven to be a viable program and an effective program.

As the gentleman from New York (Mr. STRATTON) stated, it targets a very small portion of the defense budget to labor surplus areas, and labor surplus areas are defined as communities where the unemployment is 20 percent higher than the national average.

In 1980 Congress modified the Maybank amendment, which all but prohibited targeting of defense procurement dollars. Another distinguished gentleman from New York (Mr. ADDABBO) led the debate, and because it was strongly supported by the Northeast-Midwest coalition, it was billed as a regional effort. It was not then, Mr. Chairman, and it is even less so now.

Today the unemployment issue is nationwide. We have the greatest level of unemployment since the Depression. It is certainly a severe national problem. Many areas of the United States are in trouble.

When we look at the regional aspects of this amendment I would like to point out that 54 percent of the labor surplus areas (LSA) are located outside the Northeastern-Midwestern States. For example, all 16 counties in Florida are designated labor surplus areas; 60 percent of the counties in California are designated that way; 61 percent of Oregon, 64 percent of Washington, and 67 percent of Alabama's counties are classified as labor surplus; 70 percent of Tennessee and 70 percent of West Virginia is categorized as labor surplus.

□ 1445

By comparison, only one-third or 33 percent of the counties in my State of New York are so designated.

So it is important to the Northeast and the Midwest, obviously, but it is also important to the whole country.

We have 1,000 economically distressed communities in our country—1,000 economically distressed communities. That is a very big number and I think it is time this Congress do something to alleviate some of that suffering.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MITCHELL of New York. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

MR. STRATTON. In connection with the 1,000, I might point out that 24 of those are in North Carolina and 32 of them are in Mississippi.

Mr. MITCHELL of New York. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

It is argued sometimes, Mr. Chairman, that somehow this will hurt the defense effort, and this is utter nonsense. It positively will not hurt it. If it did I would be the last to do that. I do not think anyone has a better voting record in support of a strong defense than I do in this House.

In its first year of operation it provided a 5-percent price differential for contracts between areas that were labor surplus and areas that were not. But the targeted contracts awarded produced a price differential of less than 1.9 percent, so it did not cost much at all and it created or saved nearly 2,000 jobs.

I do not know where my colleague got his statistics that 60-some jobs were lost. I do not have anything like that in my notes. We think it created 2,000 jobs.

The Pentagon this year will purchase about $15 billions worth of goods that are unrelated to nation security and have nothing to do with the strategic effort in this country. These items range from paper clips to rubber bands to heavy duty trucks.

If the Stratton amendment is adopted Defense will be permitted to offer up about one-third or 5 billion dollars' worth of contracts for labor surplus areas.

To further insure a better bang for the buck the Congressman from New York (Mr. STRATTON) has lowered the contract differential from 5 percent way down to 3 percent, so it is not much of a difference at all.

So it becomes even more cost effective than last year's provision.

There are two other advantages, Mr. Chairman. It will further serve to help diversify the industrial base in this country by not drying up certain areas that are in severe trouble economically. It will help save far more than it costs by eliminating the necessity for job protection programs, for unemployment insurance, for welfare expenditures, for medicaid costs.

It is not a big amount of money for those purposes, Mr. Chairman. It is a good program. It is private sector oriented. It is a strong measure to help insure the defense effort in this country.

This program will save dollars in the long run and I would urge my colleagues to support the Stratton amendment.

Mr. COUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MITCHELL of New York. I yield to my colleague from Pennsylvania.

Mr. COUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Stratton amendment to the Defense Department authorization bill.

This amendment will be very helpful to areas of the country like Pennsylvania with very high unemployment. The jobless rate in Pennsylvania is now approximately 10 percent of the work force.

The Stratton amendment will extend a program which directs the Defense Logistics Agency to purchase a portion of nonstrategic goods and services from businesses located in high unemployment areas and allows these firms a slight price advantage over competitors located in less economically troubled parts of the country. The amendment provides for $5 billion in purchases by the Defense Logistics Agency and a 3-percent price differential during fiscal year 1983 under this test program.

Since this program has been in operation, the results have been excellent. Jobs are being created or maintained in areas where they are needed most while the price advantage has cost the Government very little, around $400 per job.

The need to continue this program is even more urgent than it was several years ago when it was begun. I urge my colleagues to support the Stratton amendment.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York (Mr. MITCHELL) has again expired.

(At the request of Mr. HUNTER and by unanimous consent Mr. MITCHELL of New York was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MITCHELL of New York. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HUNTER. I have a couple of questions that I think should be brought up.

It has been implied by some, and repudiated by others, that there would be jobs created by this amendment and that the taxpayers would not be paying more money.

I would simply ask the gentleman if I am a contractor from one State and I offered to sell a number of bolts, let us say, for $1 a piece, as I understand it, under this amendment you could bid $1.03 on the same bolts, the same order, and you would win the contract over myself because of my geographic location as opposed to yours; is that correct?

Mr. MITCHELL of New York. That is true. It is not geographic location but economic predicament.

Mr. HUNTER. The thing that I think is wrong with this amendment is simply that we have made a tremendous effort in the Armed Services Committee and in this Congress to inject more competition into the system, and yet, in this amendment we are backsliding on our effort to economize.

I think we should look at this amendment from the individual's point of view. If you survey this situation from the perspective of the small businessman, who has put everything he has into his effort to make a successful negotiation of a certain contract, you will realize how unfair this amendment is.

I think to put us in a situation where one individual may come in with a lower bid but is not going to win the contract, is discouraging this move toward competition that we have tried to inject into the defense procurement area.

I think it is a bad amendment for that reason.

Mr. MITCHELL of New York. I would respond to my colleague that I am not sure what the procurement budget is this year. The whole defense budget is almost $300 billion. This represents about less than $5 billion. It is not a big number relatively speaking.

It keeps these industries going so that we can diversify our defense effort and we do not have everything located in a few States, which could represent a very severe strategic problem.

Mr. HUNTER. If I can ask the gentleman to yield further, I appreciate the gentleman's statement that we are not talking about a lot of money. But I think for that small business man's point of view—the one who went out and bid that $1 per bolt for that lot of bolts—is beaten out by the guy that bids $1.03, the amendment is very unfair. For that small businessman it is a very desperate situation and it is not right to put him in a position where he is the low bidder and yet loses the contract.

Mr. PURSELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MITCHELL of New York. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. PURSELL. I would like to say this differential is really offset by the high cost of somebody on unemployment. When you look at welfare and AFDC and unemployment compensation and those high costs to the taxpayer, both at the Federal and State level, it seems to me if you look at the tradeoff in those dollars this is a benefit and a break for the taxpayer to help somebody on unemployment in an industrial base rather than being unemployed.

They could help supplement any industry by doing some defense procurement work.

So from a dollar standpoint, I think this program in terms of equity helps the whole country, not just a particular region.

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MITCHELL of New York. I yield to my friend from Pennsylvania.

Mr. EDGAR. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I would like to respond to the gentleman's comment earlier when he was worried about his particular area. There are a couple of things you have to remember.

First, it is a test program;

Second, it reduces the test from 5-percent to 3-percent price differential; and

Third, the early indications of the test are that it is working, that targeting some nonstrategic defense buying to areas of economic distress is working.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York (Mr. MITCHELL) has again expired.

(At the request of Mr. EDGAR and by unanimous consent Mr. MITCHELL of New York was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. EDGAR. Targeting a small percentage of the nonstrategic defense buying to areas of economic distress saves a lot of money and in a lot of ways it helps prevent the development of Federal programs to lay up on top of the economic problems of those regions because of high unemployment.

Much of the earlier data indicates that the program does help to give areas throughout the country, North, East, South, and West, some economic help in stimulating jobs in areas where there is very high unemployment.

I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MITCHELL of New York. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DUNN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I would like to address my colleague from California. His main concern seems to be competition. There are many factors that go together to make up the economy of this country or the economy of a region. If you take one of the largest purchasers in the world, that being the Defense Department, and the concentration of those defense dollars in certain parts of our country, you can make the point that they are artificially stimulating those economies.

So if the gentleman is concerned about competition and you have very high unemployment in other sections of the country and you want to create this competition, which the gentleman said he did, then a good way to do that is to take that very large purchaser, the world's largest purchaser, and give them an opportunity to go into those areas and buy.

You do not decrease competition in small business particularly; you increase competition in the country.

I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. MITCHELL of New York. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MITCHELL of New York. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. WOLPE. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I want to associate myself with the remarks of the gentleman from New York and rise in very strong support of the Stratton amendment, an amendment of particular importance to my own State of Michigan, which leads the country in economic distress and unemployment. Passage of this amendment to continue the targeting of a small portion of the Federal Government's vast purchasing power to companies in distressed areas will have a number of important effects.

First, the amendment will create and preserve jobs in economically distressed areas without increasing the Federal budget or establishing a new Government bureaucracy.

Second, the amendment will reduce Federal spending by easing demands for income maintenance programs. Many new jobs created under the DLA program will take people off the unemployment and welfare rolls, thus reducing the burden on a variety of benefit programs.

Third, the amendment will preserve competition in defense contracts. These contracts can be set aside for labor surplus areas only if enough bids are submitted to assure adequate competition and a reasonable price.

Fourth, the amendment will strengthen the national defense. The Nation cannot tool up rapidly for defense production when thousands of factories are idle and millions of workers are jobless. By reserving some Federal contracts for areas of high unemployment, the DLA program is designed to diversify and expand the industrial base needed for rapid mobilization in the event of war or national emergency.

Mr. Chairman, it is important that this program be continued. The preliminary results indicate it is working exactly as intended: Jobs are being created in our Nation's most economically distressed communities at little or no cost to the government and with no additional bureaucracy. I urge my colleagues to join me in support of the Stratton amendment.

Mr. MITCHELL of New York. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

It is argued sometimes that this amendment would somehow hurt the defense effort. Nonsense. I would be the last one to want to do that. I yield to no one in my support of a strong defense.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York (Mr. MITCHELL) has again expired.

Mr. MITCHELL of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Objection is heard.

Mr. NELLIGAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of this amendment.

Modification of the Maybank amendment to allow channeling of defense contracts to areas of high unemployment is essential.

There are 43 areas in the State of Pennsylvania that have been classified as labor surplus areas by the Department of Labor. Modification of the Maybank amendment will allow businesses in these areas to receive a price advantage when bidding against firms in healthy economic areas for certain defense contracts.

Figures I have examined indicate that while taxpayers in the Northeast and Midwest contribute over half of the revenues collected by the Federal Government—they only receive about one-third of the economic benefit of defense spending.

The pending amendment would help correct this situation. The amendment will continue a test program supported by the administration last year.

This program allowed up to $5 billion of defense spending to be directed to labor surplus areas through the price advantage system.

At the same time, the program provided the Federal Government with an effective means of stimulating economic activity in these areas.

I believe this program must continue. We must insure that the current program to improve our military posture produces an equitable sharing of the benefits of military spending. More defense contracts must go to the Northeast and Midwest, which has unused industrial capacity and many skilled workers who are seeking employment.

We would not damage national defense, but enhance national defense through approval of this amendment. We would garner that support we are losing in the Northeast and Midwest for a strong defense if Americans from these regions of the country thought they were getting their fair share of the defense expenditures.

Effective defense is dependent on a vibrant and strong economy. This amendment would help relieve current economic dislocation in the Northeast and Midwest, and help the Defense Department develop a broadened industrial base for its procurement activities.

I therefore want to indicate my thorough approval of the amendment, and urge my colleagues to vote in favor of this amendment.

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words and rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, this is a boondoggle. It is nothing other than that, purely and simply.

I am sorry that I do not belong to a coalition and do not have someone to write me long speeches that I have to read here on the floor. But I know a boondoggle when I see it.

I happened to get some of the canned letters of the gentleman from New York (Mr. STRATTON). He wrote to me. We are right next door to each other in the hall there. He wrote me and he said, "You know, you have 22 employment surplus areas in your State and you ought to be for my amendment."

But what he did not know is that I have a little old plant in my district that has been making pieces of uniforms for a few years for the armed services. If you go in that plant they have a collection of sewing machines and a collection of blacks and of women and they work like the dickens. If you go in there now, those sewing machines are sitting vacant and sitting idle because of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. STRATTON) this boondoggle that has dragged those jobs off into one of those 22 surplus areas somewhere else in Florida.

I do not come from a big defense area. You can go explore around my district and if you can find a defense contractor other than this little old supplier of parts of uniforms I will be happy for you to find him because I have not been able to find him.

This is not going to spread America's industrial base. This just trades unemployment around.

Mr friend, the gentleman from New York (Mr. STRATTON) has a great reputation of being strong on defense and I always thought he was and I followed him.

But, Sam, you know, this is just too much. This is just too much. This is playing off one section of the country against another and that is not fair. We are all Americans and we all pay the same bills. I would like for all of us to pay the same taxes.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, may I respond since the gentleman mentioned my name?

Mr. GIBBONS. In a minute. You had 15 minutes and I had to finally cut you off, Sam, and I only want my 5.

But let me tell you, this does not create one new job in America. It costs America more money and it does not do anything but take people who have been working hard at a job, trying to live up to the laws of contracting and employment in this country, and treat them as second-class citizens.

You ought to be ashamed of this amendment.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIBBONS. Now I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. STRATTON. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me. I appreciate his warm sentiments.

Mr. GIBBONS. They are warm, yes, sir.

Mr. STRATTON. And we share offices on the same corridor.

Mr. GIBBONS. It is a good corridor.

Mr. STRATTON. And the gentleman has indeed, as he said, been a strong supporter of defense and in fact he has been a strong supporter of the present administration. In fact, he supports it not only in defense but in its economic approach.

The gentleman perhaps was not listening when I read the letter from the President of the United States. The gentleman may instead have been planning how to take me off my feet. But what the President said was that this is only a test program and that this test has been working very well.

Mr. GIBBONS. Let me take my time back. I am not going to yield any further. I want to take my time back.

□ 1500

The President never saw this program. He does not know what is going on. The gentleman knows better than that. The gentleman has been in this Congress for 20 years.

Mr. STRATTON. I do not know better than that.

Mr. GIBBONS. This is just a boondoggle that somebody slipped past him down there.

Mr. MAVROULES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment offered by my fellow member of the Armed Services Committee and colleague from New York. His amendment offers a cost-effective means to guarantee that procurement of nonstrategic goods by the military plays a part in relieving the economic distress now plaguing the Nation.

For 27 years the Department of Defense was exempted by the Maybank amendment from complying with Defense Manpower Policy No. 4 in the purchase of nonstrategic goods. DMP-4 serves the national defense and the Nation's economy by encouraging Government agencies to target their purchases to private businesses in cities and counties designated by the Department of Labor as labor surplus areas.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to emphasize the nonstrategic nature of the goods that are purchased under the Defense Logistics Agency (DLA) test program. Mr. STRATTON's amendment has been carefully crafted to insure that the armed services are not hindered in securing the best weapons systems or other goods related directly to national security. No tanks or guns or planes or ships would come under the language of the amendment. Rather, it would cover the purchase of things like paper clips, shoelaces, hats, and envelopes—the type of common goods on which the Defense Department spends between $10 and $15 billion every year.

Experience with the test program so far indicates that targeting of contracts to high unemployment areas has been a reasonable requirement that the Defense Department has been able to carry out intelligently and effectively. The program offers adequate flexibility in the award of contracts, the great majority of which have involved no added cost to the military.

Mr. Chairman, the Stratton amendment will strengthen the Nation's security by strengthening and broadening its industrial base. I urge my colleagues to join me in support.

Mr. HERTEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAVROULES. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HERTEL. I thank the gentleman for yielding, and I commend my colleague, the gentleman from Massachusetts, who has been in the forefront of this issue, and especially the chairman of our Procurement Subcommittee, for his past work on this issue and his work in bringing it to the attention of the House this year.

Twenty-seven percent of the Federal budget is defense spending. That is the largest single outlay of this Nation as far as materials and manpower, et cetera, that is visible and tangible. Unfortunately, as has been pointed out by my colleague, the gentleman from New York, we are talking about less than $5 billion of $300 billion. I wish this portion was more.

In Michigan, we have a 16-percent unemployment rate. Sixteen percent. We have a depression in Michigan. There are other States in the country which also have high unemployment rates. They need the opportunity this provision provides.

Let me say this: You say it is one region's fault, or it only affects these States. Any part of this Nation that is weak pulls down the rest. I say to my colleagues from the South that the rest of this Nation, for years, especially earlier in this century, helped to build up the South and helped build it up recently largely through defense contracts. I think that is fine. To improve any area of the country strengthens the entire Nation. As I said, if one area has so much unemployment, it is a drag on the national economy. That is what is happening in this country right now, with pockets of unemployment in Michigan, Alabama, Ohio, Indiana, States like that. It is very harmful.

Michigan only gets 65 cents back on the dollar that our taxpayers send to the Federal Government. We are last, if you take us in proportion to what we pay in.

So we in Michigan have a chance, under this amendment, to get some more contracts. I call this amendment offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. STRATTON) an amendment for fairness, a small amount of fairness, but fairness for other regions of the country. Unfortunately, very often we see regional fights throughout the Congress, especially in the area of defense but also spending in other areas. That is unfortunate, but it is true.

I think that we are going to see a change in this Congress if we are not going to spread defense spending around this country. In Detroit and in all of Michigan, they have the experience, they have the know-how. In the Second World War all the Members know that Detroit was called the arsenal of democracy. If we allow the automotive industries and related industries, whether they be metal, rubber, and countless other industries, to go under, never to have the chance to come back again, to go bankrupt, we are not only hurting families and causing high unemployment and giving people no hope, not only for the near future but for the long-range future, but we are dividing this country, and we are going to weaken this country industrially. If we do that, therefore, we have weakened this country militarily. There is no doubt about it.

I know that many of the Members who have talked in opposition to this amendment today do have a good deal of military spending in their districts. What I am saying is, let us allow some more to be spread around the country in this experimental program that has worked—as the chairman has pointed out—that has worked very well for the short period we have had it.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. MAVROULES) has expired.

(On request of Ms. MIKULSKI and by unanimous consent, Mr. MAVROULES was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAVROULES. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BUTLER. I appreciate the gentleman yielding.

Insofar as I can determine, this provision will have no impact directly or indirectly upon the people that I represent. But tell me, explain to me just exactly how this works. Of course, in order to take a bid from the place where it costs a little bit more, there has to be a price differential in some amount. The gentleman has talked about a test program. Can the gentleman tell us how much the price differential to date has cost us?

Mr. MAVROULES. Unfortunately, I cannot answer that question. I do not have the figures. Staff perhaps can dig out the figures for the gentleman and relay them to him.

I yield to my chairman, the gentleman from New York (Mr. STRATTON), who has those figures.

Mr. STRATTON. According to the report from the Defense Department, the premium paid was $795,482, or an increase of 1.7 percent in procurment costs.

Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAVROULES. I yield to the gentlewoman from Maryland.

Ms. MIKULSKI. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I would just like to associate myself with the arguments both the gentleman in the well and the gentleman from Michigan made. I believe that if we are going to spend defense dollars, we ought to spend them in the community, to give jobs to the veterans who fought to defend this country. In my own community, at General Motors, when one considers the unemployment figures and the seniority level that they are laying off, all of these Vietnam vets at General Motors in my district do not have a job. When one takes a look at Bethlehem Steel in my district, we are now up to seniority levels where the Korean war veterans do not have a job. They are now telling the World War II veterans that they are now labor surplus. But they were not labor surplus at Iwo Jima or at Normandy.

I believe that if we are going to use these dollars, we need to do that. And our own Secretary of the Navy told the Maryland delegation that if we do not support this defense budget, then my shipyard workers better learn to whistle "Dixie" because that is the only place the contracts will be.

I support the Stratton amendment.

Mr. MAVROULES. I thank the gentlewoman for her remarks.

Mr. McDADE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAVROULES. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. McDADE. I am grateful to my friend from Massachusetts for yielding to me.

Mr. Chairman, I want to commend my colleague, the gentleman from New York, the House's favorite unreconstructed hawk, for bringing us the extension of this legislation. I think that the bottom line that we all have to look at is what this program does is to emphasize competition. Before the Defense Department can go out and make any kind of an award, they have got to, as my friend from Massachusetts knows, find that there is a competitive element in a given area and that they can compete on the nonstrategic side of the Defense Department's budget. That is the key here, and I think that is why I think my friend from Massachusetts is absolutely correct, and my friend from New York, in advocating the extension of this program. I am pleased to associate myself with their remarks.

Mr. Chairman, I hope that this amendment will pass overwhelmingly.

Mr. MAVROULES. I thank the gentleman for his comments.

Just to sum it up, if I may, a statement was made by my colleague, the gentleman from Michigan, just a moment ago about the economic recovery of the country at large. Just very basically, if we are going to go ahead in this country economically, let us keep one thing in mind, and that is, let us dare not leave one part of the country behind in this total economic recovery program. And to those of you who today might use the argument that you are taking away from me and you are going to give to someone else, remember these arguments in the future, some day in the future, very shortly, when we are discussing enterprise zones for this country, and then we will talk about the arguments that you are putting forth today.

I urge my colleagues to support this amendment.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, we have heard views expressed by various Members from various parts of this country. I would like to emphasize that mainly these were views expressed, and devoid of a whole lot of facts.

The fact is that we have unemployment in many areas of this country, not just in the Northeast or in the Midwest. In my own State of South Carolina, we have areas of high unemployment.

□ 1510

We have heard views expressed as to this being a cost-effective operation. Let us look for the first time at the facts.

The facts are that while we do not have the 1982 test results in yet, we do have the facts available from the 1981 test.

Those results show, in a nutshell, that the Federal Government spent $1.6 million on this problem to lose a total of 68 jobs throughout the Nation.

Here is how it works out.

On this program, 2,300 jobs were gained in labor surplus areas, but 2,368 jobs were lost in other areas of this country.

So we have, as a result, not decreased unemployment in this Nation, but we have spent $1.6 million to increase unemployment.

If this kind of job shifting continues, we may simply end up spending excess money on defense every year to change the location of high unemployment from one section of the country to another, all at taxpayers' expense.

Half of the $1.6 million spent on this program in fiscal year 1981 went not for the actual cost of defense procurement, or the creation of jobs, but rather to employ governmental personnel to administer and monitor the test program.

The Government spent $795,000 to administer a program which enabled us to lose 68 jobs in this country.

Now, if that is not a boondoggle, you call it something else.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPENCE. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. BUTLER. I thank the gentleman for his contribution. I appreciate the accurate figures he has given us. A moment ago I asked a Member to give us the figures on what the price differential has had, and the gentleman turned to the gentleman from New York and got a figure in the neighborhood of $700,000. I left the floor for a moment to check once more with my staff and also the Senate debate. I can verify the figure that the gentleman now uses of $1.6 million as what it costs. I can verify, too, having just checked with my staff within the last moment, that the number of jobs it has cost us has been 68 jobs. It has transferred 2,300 jobs from one place, where there were 2,368 jobs in another place, and the net result is that it has cost us 68 jobs at a cost of $1.6 million.

You have to do a hell of a volume in a business like that to cut national defense expenses.

So, I say to the gentleman, I appreciate his contribution, and I join with the gentleman from South Carolina and the gentleman from Florida who have identified this as in fact a true boondoggle.

Mr. BADHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, there are very few occasions when this Member rises in opposition to the chairman of the subcommittee on which I serve in the Armed Services Committee, the gentleman from New York. But this is most certainly one.

When we reduce this political argument, this regional argument, to actual business terms, I do not think there can be any conclusion to come to, other than to defeat this amendment.

Assuming that the U.S. Government, for military purchases, needs only so many things and only has so many dollars to spend, it would seem to me as a former businessman that the way to go about that would be to buy all the material they need with all the dollars available for the lowest price.

Now, if we are going to make a social program out of military purchases, we should transfer the function out of the defense budget and put it into the social welfare budget.

To say that we should transfer jobs from productive areas to areas where we have to pay a higher price because of unemployment, we should look rather to the root cause of the unemployment than make a social program out of defense purchases.

Mr. Chairman, from a pure business standpoint, we no longer have the luxury of making social programs out of defense purchases. We ought to purchase the goods and supplies that we need for our defense material and for our country's defense at the cheapest possible place to save money rather than pay too much for the goods that are available.

Mr. McCURDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BADHAM. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. McCURDY. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I would like to associate myself with the comments of the gentleman, and commend him for his accurate and eloquent statement. I believe the amendment as proposed constitutes bad procurement policy and results in excessive additional costs to our national defense.

Mr. BEARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BADHAM. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. BEARD. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I would like to associate myself with the gentleman's remarks. I must say I think his remarks were probably one of the most pertinent set of remarks I have heard on this whole issue. As a result of those remarks this body should be ready to vote on this issue.

Mr. BADHAM. I thank the gentleman and agree.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Chairman, I believe we are about to a point where we can wind up this debate on this amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee cut off all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto at 3:30 p.m.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The gentleman moves that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto end in 10 minutes.

The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Florida (Mr. BENNETT).

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object——

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Chairman, I made a motion; I did not ask unanimous consent. I thought I made a motion.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The gentleman from Florida (Mr. BENNETT) has offered a motion.

The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Florida (Mr. BENNETT).

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Members standing at the time the motion was made will each be recognized for approximately 30 seconds.

□ 1520

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York (Mr. GARCIA).

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Chairman, I only caught the tail end of the discussion of my colleague from California.

Just let me say, what we are talking about is 3 percent. After what has happened by this Congress in 1981 and 1982, to those areas of this country which need so much help 3 percent is not very much, that is what we are talking about.

We have plants today in the South Bronx which are taking people off welfare because of defense spending and the only reason we are doing that is to try to put those people that you claim do not want to work back to work—3 percent.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Florida (Mr. BENNETT).

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Chairman, I oppose this amendment. It seems to me, if it has any philosophical value to it, it ought to be applied across the board to all branches of Government.

I do not remember a big program doing anything like this for the South or any other section I know of in the States. I see no reason for making a sectional, parochial thing out of the matter of national defense.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chairman recognizes the gentleman from New York (Mr. STRATTON).

(By unanimous consent, Mr. PRICE yielded his time to Mr. STRATTON).

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to remember that this is a test program, a test program that has worked effectively and one that the President of the United States, who is certainly not a big spender in the economic area wants to continue for another year.

The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. SPENCE) suggested that while there were thousands of jobs created by the program, thousands of other jobs disappeared; but there is no connection between those two, the jobs that disappeared are jobs I daresay that disappeared because businesses could not pay the high interest rates and because of the economic recession. That is happening every day in New York State and in my district; but to suggest that that has any relationship to this program, which is creating jobs, is sheer fantasy.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. JOHNSTON).

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the concern of the gentleman from New York about my 24 counties in North Carolina that are surplus labor areas; but what about the other 76? Am I willing to tell a businessman in that county that you are at a 3-percent disadvantage over one in an adjacent county because he happens to live across the county line? That is precisely what this bill would do to what should be competitive low bid contracts.

The second point, the economic realities are that in an area of high labor surplus, labor costs should be lower, so the business in a high labor surplus area presumably already has a competitive advantage. Why provide such business another competitive edge at the expense of the American taxpayer. A 3-percent add-on cost to $5 billion in procurement means a $150 million additional burden on the American taxpayer.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Florida (Mr. GIBBONS).

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Chairman, this is a test that never should have been tested and when tested flunked and ought to be discarded.

This does not create employment. It just merely transfers and dislocates the American economy. It transfers one form of hardship from one place to another.

In my own area, it transfers jobs a few miles down the road. It meant that a lot of blacks and women became unemployed and had to join the unemployment force.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL).

(By unanimous consent, Mr. BUTLER yielded his time to Mr. FRENZEL.)

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, the inevitable result of the passage of this amendment will be either less defense for the same amount of dollars, or the same amount of defense for more dollars. Both are unacceptable.

I have been very critical of this bill, and this defense budget, indicating that for the first time in many years I might vote against the bill because we cannot afford it.

I think if we have so much extra money in this defense bill that we can use it for a national welfare program, then I, indeed, will vote against the bill.

I think it is an absolute outrage that we would use the hard-earned tax moneys of our suffering taxpayers to make defense purchases which are priced over the market.

I think anybody that votes for this amendment is going to bear a terrible burden of explanation in his or her constituency.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. ECKART).

Mr. ECHART. Mr. Chairman, obviously there have been all sorts of boogey men raised in this debate, calling it a welfare program. We have avoided everything including the facts.

According to the report of the Defense Department, 97 percent of the contracts awarded under this program went to the low bidder. Less than 3 percent of the total number of contracts went to preferential treatment. Clearly, I would not call that welfare.

I think what we are talking about is equity, fairness, saving our industrial base, sharing the wealth of one of the largest public works programs that this country is embarking upon, that of national defense.

I urge adoption of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. MONTGOMERY).

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. We have had a test program for 11 months and it has not done anything.

This amendment only extends it for another year.

I would certainly oppose the amendmnent. It does affect the little businessman. It does not affect the big businessman. It is a bad precedent to say who gets certain contracts because of unemployment. In my State all we did was transfer 52 jobs to another part of the State, 52 jobs, and it cost the taxpayers of this country a million and a half dollars.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. EDGAR).

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Chairman, there has been a lot of misinformation shared in this debate. I hope our colleagues have taken the time to read some of the documentation.

First, this is a test program that the President requests that we continue for an additional year. Second, it is already available in all of our nondefense spending. We already have this amendment in public law and are using it, not in a test program, but in the nondefense civilian procurement.

Third, it will strengthen our national defense, because the Nation cannot quickly tool up for wartime production when thousands of factories are idle and millions of workers are left jobless.

Mr. Chairman, use of the DLA test program to target contracts to high unemployment areas is a significant tool to combat the effects of the recession on distressed urban areas without fueling inflation. Because the program focuses spending on areas that have a surplus of labor, it avoids the effect of heating up the labor market in areas that have high levels of employment or even shortages of skilled workers.

Dr. David Rasmussen of Florida State University explained this noninflationary effect to the House Small Business Subcommittee on Capital, Investment, and Business Opportunities. I would like to quote from his testimony:

> The labor surplus policy is one way to raise the employment effects of a given rate of growth. It is an attempt to selectively raise employment in those areas which economic growth is last to reach. Such a policy lowers the amount of growth required to achieve any target rate of unemployment and therefore works to reduce inflationary pressures in the economy.
> Some may view the labor surplus policy as a zero sum game: that jobs created in areas of persistent unemployment will be lost in other areas. This is a misperception. In fact, the view presented above suggests that the entire Nation receives some benefits from efforts to increase the number of jobs in high-unemplyment areas. If we take our commitment to full employment seriously, this policy will help produce conditions under which we can realize full employment in most labor markets with less inflation.
> Rather than having less than full employment in areas ineligible for the labor surplus policy, they may suffer less inflation when they do have full employment. Monetary and fiscal policy can stimulate growth to generate full employment in most labor markets. These areas will not lose jobs because of the labor surplus policy. In fact, these regions benefit because the Nation can reach full employment with less inflation. With a commitment to our stated goal of full employment, the labor surplus program does not rob Peter to pay Paul.

Mr. Chairman, there is no evidence to indicate the DLA test program has reduced competition or increased the cost of goods to the military.

First, competition is restricted only on those contracts set aside for labor surplus areas, and this occurs only when the Defense Department determines that enough firms will bid on the contracts to insure adequate competition. Therefore, the Pentagon is not required to target purchases to LSA's if the Secretary of Defense determines that an unreasonable price will result or it is not in the best interests of the Nation. In fact, the program most likely increases competition by bringing more firms into the bidding process, and this additional competition serves to keep prices down.

Second, the Defense Logistics Agency has paid a small price differential under this program on only a relatively few contracts. Preliminary results from a study of the first 11 months of the program indicate that DLA paid a price differential on fewer than 15 percent of the contracts it awarded to firms in LSA's, and the average differential on these contracts came to just 1.9 percent. The language of the Stratton amendment would lower the allowable differential from 5 to 3 percent, further preventing the payment of unreasonable prices.

The early performance of the program means that if the DLA pays a low price differential on $1 billion worth of contracts, the added cost to the Government would be less than $20 million—an "investment" by the Federal Government that would generate $3 to $4 billion in private-sector activity in distressed areas. When the resulting reductions income maintenance payments, unemployment insurance, food stamps, housing subsidies, and the like are considered, the actual cost of this program is greatly reduced or even eliminated.

Mr. Chairman, modification of the Maybank amendment and establishment of the Defense Logistics Agency test program have neither jeopardized awards to the best qualified and most efficient producers nor resulted in decreased quality or delays in defense production. If anything, the result is just the opposite. By increasing the competition for contract awards and the incentive for companies to perform well, the program more likely increases the quality of goods available to the military and the likelihood of on-time delivery.

Many of the Nation's best qualified and most efficient producers are located in labor surplus areas. In fact, nearly one-fourth of the Nation's cities, counties, and other eligible jurisdictions have been designated as labor surplus areas—testimony to the widespread nature of our economic difficulties and the need for a program like this one. The many manufacturing centers among these LSA's probably have more qualified firms than other parts of the country. States that historically have contributed heavily to the Nation's defense efforts—New York, California, New Jersey, Georgia, Connecticut, Florida, and Pennsylvania, for example—all have a significant number of LSA's with many firms that must be counted among the Nation's most qualified and efficient. These firms are proud of the quality of their products and their ability to meet contract deadlines.

It also should be noted that the portion of the Pentagon budget affected by modification of the Maybank amendment and establishment of the test program involves purchases made by the Defense Logistics Agency, the branch of the Defense Department responsible for procuring nonstrategic goods and services widely used by all sections of the military. This combined budget represents roughly $15 to $20 billion for the purchase of such common items as food, clothing, medical supplies, hardware, hand tools, insignia, books, boxes, and so forth. Targeting such purchases to companies in high-unemployment areas broadens the base of available suppliers, and because many of these companies are small businesses eager for Government contracts, the program is likely to result in better quality and performance as well as reasonable, competitive prices.

Mr. Chairman, modification of the Maybank amendment and establishment of the DLA test program have not adversely affected the Nation's ability to mobilize for an emergency by denying some firms the opportunity to compete for contracts. In fact, the original purpose of Defense Manpower Policy No. 4 (DMP-4) was to minimize idle labor and machinery in connection with the Nation's efforts in Korea.

By directing Federal purchases to firms located in areas of high unemployment, the policy helps insure that the Nation has a broad and diverse manufacturing base capable of meeting defense needs. Passage of the Stratton amendment would continue a program that helps prevent procurement delays caused by a lack of trained workers at qualified manufacturing facilities. Thus, in case of war or other national emergency, a greater number of firms would be prepared to "tool up" for defense production.

● Mr. ATKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment of the gentleman from New York. At this critical time of economic hardship it is imperative that we seek new ways to revive our Nation's ailing industrial base. This program, in its first 2 years, has created new jobs and breathed new life into the most economically troubled areas of the United States. Not only does the targeting of Department of Defense moneys into these depressed areas put Americans back to work, but our Nation's industrial infrastructure—our factories and machines in these depressed areas which otherwise might become dormant—can be preserved and primed in readiness should the tremendous manufacturing capacity needed in wartime become necessary. The gentleman's amendment would continue a highly successful program of little or no cost to the Government, which would continue to infuse new money—and hence new jobs—into our country's economically hurting and troubled areas.●

● Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I rise in complete support of Congressman STRATTON'S amendment to the Defense Authorization Act for fiscal 1983. This amendment allows the Defense Department to continue the test program that targets some supply purchases to firms located in areas of high unemployment. This amendment will greatly benefit regional, State, and local efforts to attract more defense dollars into our area and reduce unemployment.

This amendment is crucial to Michigan and equally as important to the other Great Lakes States which have unemployment rates considerably above the national average. These States had at the end of 1981 no less than 409 labor surplus areas eligible for Federal procurement preference. The number of labor surplus areas in Michigan alone, at the end of 1981, was 101.

There is every indication that this program is working exactly as intended: Jobs are being created in the most economically distressed areas at little or no cost to the Government with no additional bureaucracy required. The 1980 results alone show that the Defense Logistics Agency (DLA) awarded 1,881 contracts to firms located in labor surplus areas under the provisions of the test program. A price differential was paid on only 248 of the 1,881 contracts. The price differential amounted to $555,912 on contracts valued at $29,817,012. This means that the added cost to the Government averaged 1.9 percent—significantly less than the 5 percent price differential allowed by statute. As a result of payment of a price differential on these 248 contracts, 1,732 jobs were either created or maintained. The cost of creating or maintaining a job under this program is only $421.65, even after adding DLA's administrative expenses. In fact, the reduction in income maintenance costs may actually reduce this cost further.

I was pleased that the Senate adopted an amendment to continue this program through the next fiscal year, but I was shocked and disappointed that the funding level was reduced from $5 billion to $3 billion and that the price differential was reduced from 5 to 1.5 percent. The amendment we are voting on will maintain the funding level at $5 billion, and reduce the price differential to 3 percent, through fiscal 1983.

This amendment is clearly a vote for the Nation's industrial preparedness, and for bringing America's jobless workers back into the productive mainstream of the Nation's economy. I urge its adoption.●

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. STRATTON).

The question was taken; and the Chairman pro tempore announced that the noes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

Messrs. BROOKS, FOWLER, and LEWIS changed their votes from "aye" to "no."

Mr. O'BRIEN and Mr. PETRI changed their votes from "no" to "aye."

So the amendment was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. M'CURDY

Mr. McCURDY. Mr. Chairman, I offer and amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McCURDY: At the end of the bill add the following new section:

IMPROVED OVERSIGHT OF COST GROWTH IN MAJOR DEFENSE ACQUISITION PROGRAMS

SEC. . (a)(1) Chapter 4 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"§ 139a. Major defense acquisition programs: control of cost growth

"(a) In this section:

"(1) 'Major defense acquisition program' means a Department of Defense acquisition program that is not a highly sensitive classified program (as determined by the Secretary of Defense) and—

"(A) that is designated by the Secretary of Defense as a major defense acquisition program; or

"(B) that is estimated by the Secretary of Defense to require an eventual total expenditure for research, development, test, and evaluation of more than $200,000,000 (based on fiscal year 1980 constant dollars) or an eventual total expenditure of procurement of more than $1,000,000,000 (based on fiscal year 1980 constant dollars).

"(2) 'Program acquisition unit cost', with respect to a major defense acquisition program, means the amount equal to (A) the total cost for development and procurement of, and system-specific military construction for, the acquisition program, divided by (B) the number of fully-configured end items to be produced for the acquisition program.

"(3) 'Major contract', with respect to a major defense acquisition program, means (A) each prime contract under the program, and (B) each associate or Government-furnished equipment contract under the program (i) that is one of the six largest contracts under the program in dollar amount, or (ii) that, with other contracts under the program, represents at least 90 percent of the total contract cost for current contracts under the program, whichever represents the greater dollar amount.

"(b)(1)(A) The Secretary of Defense shall submit to Congress at the end of each fiscal-year quarter a report on current major defense acquisition programs. Except as provided in subparagraph (B), each such report shall include a status report on each defense acquisition program that at the end of such quarter is a major defense acquisition program. Reports under this subsection shall be known as Selected Acquisition Reports.

"(B) A status report on a major defense acquisition program need not be included in the Selected Acquisition Report for the second, third, or fourth quarter of a fiscal year if such a report was included in a previous Selected Acquisition Report for that fiscal year and there has been no change in program cost, performance, or schedule since the most recent such report.

"(2) Each Selected Acquisition Report for the first quarter of a fiscal year shall include (A) the same information, in detailed and summarized form, as is provided in reports submitted under section 139 of this title, (B) the current program acquisition unit cost for each major defense acquisition program included in the report and the history of that cost from the date the program was first included in a Selected Acquisition Report to the end of the quarter for which the current report is submitted, and (C) such other information as the Secretary of Defense considers appropriate. Selected Acquisition Reports for the first quarter of a fiscal year shall be known as comprehensive annual Selected Acquisition Reports.

"(3) Each Selected Acquisition Report for the second, third, and fourth quarters of a fiscal year shall include—

"(A) with respect to each major defense acquisition program that was included in the most recent comprehensive annual Selected Acquisition Report, the information described in paragraph (4); and

"(B) with respect to each major defense acquisition program that was not included in the most recent comprehensive annual Selected Acquisition Report, the information described in paragraph (2).

Selected Acquisition Reports for the second, third, and fourth quarters of a fiscal year shall be known as Quarterly Selected Acquisition Reports.

"(4) Information to be included under this paragraph in a Quarterly Selected Acquisition Report with respect to a major defense acquisition program is as follows:

"(A) The program acquisition cost.

"(B) The quantity of items to be purchased under the program.

"(C) The program acquisition unit cost.

"(D) The current procurement cost for the program.

"(E) The current procurement unit cost for the program.

"(F) The reasons for any changes in program cost, program unit cost, procurement cost, or procurement unit cost or in program schedule from the previous Selected Acquisition Report.

"(G) The major contracts under the program and the reasons for cost or schedule variances under those contracts since the last Selected Acquisition Report.

"(H) The completion status of the program (i) expressed as the percentage that the number of years for which funds have been appropriated for the program is of the number of years for which it is planned that funds will be appropriated for the program, and (ii) expressed as the percentage that the amount of funds that have been appropriated for the program is of the total amount of funds which it is planned will be appropriated for the program.

"(I) Program highlights since the last Selected Acquisition Report.

"(5) Each comprehensive annual Selected Acquisition Report shall be submitted within 30 days after the date on which the President transmits the Budget to Congress for the following fiscal year, and each Quarterly Selected Acquisition Report shall be submitted within 30 days after the end of the fiscal-year quarter. If a preliminary report is submitted for the comprehensive annual Selected Acquisition Report in any year, the final report shall be submitted within 15 days after the submission of the preliminary report.

"(c)(1) The estimate of the program acquisition cost for a major defense acquisition program as shown in the Selected Acquisition Report in which such program is first included is the baseline program cost for the program, and the estimate of the program acquisition unit cost for that program as shown in such report is the original unit cost baseline for the program.

"(2) The estimate of the program acquisition unit cost of a major defense acquisition program in the Selected Acquisition Report in which such program is first included or in the most recent comprehensive annual Selected Acquisition Report, whichever is later, is the current unit cost baseline for that program. The most recent estimate at any time of the program acquisition unit cost of such program is the current unit cost of the program.

"(d)(1) If after the submittal of a Selected Acquisition Report establishing the current unit cost baseline for a major defense acquisition program the program manager for that program at any time finds that there is reasonable cause to believe—

"(A) that the current unit cost of the program has increased by at least 15 percent above the current unit cost baseline; or

"(B) that cost variances or schedule variances of a major contract under the program have resulted in an increase in the cost of the contract of at least 15 percent above the cost of the contract as of the time the contract was made;

the program manager shall submit a report to the Secretary concerned stating such finding.

"(2) If after the submittal of the Selected Acquisition Report establishing the current unit cost baseline for a major defense acquisition program the program manager for the program has submitted a report to the Secretary under paragraph (1) with respect to that program and the program manager for that program then finds that there is reasonable cause to believe—

"(A) that the current unit cost of the program has increased by more than five percent above the current unit cost as shown in the most recent report submitted to the Secretary concerned with respect to that program under this subsection; or

"(B) that cost variances or schedule variances of a major contract under the program have resulted in an increase in the cost of the contract of at least five percent above the cost of the contract as shown in the most recent report submitted to the Secretary concerned with respect to that program under this subsection;

the program manager shall submit a report to the Secretary concerned stating such finding.

"(e)(1) When a report is submitted to the Secretary concerned under subsection (d) with respect to a defense acquisition program and the Secretary has not submitted a report to Congress under this subsection with respect to that program since the submittal of the Selected Acquisition Report establishing the current unit cost baseline for the program, the Secretary shall determine whether the current unit cost of the program has increased by 15 percent or more above the current unit cost baseline of the program. If the Secretary determines that there has been such an increase, the Secretary shall submit a report to Congress containing the information described in subsection (f).

"(2) When a report is submitted to the Secretary concerned under subsection (d) with respect to a defense acquisition program and the Secretary has previously submitted a report to Congress under paragraph (1) with respect to that program since the submittal of the Selected Acquisition Report establishing the current unit cost baseline for the program, the Secretary shall determine whether the current unit cost of the program has increased by 5 percent or more above the current unit cost of the program as shown in the most recent report submitted to Congress under this subsection. If the Secretary determines that there has been such an increase, the Secretary shall submit a report to Congress containing the information described in subsection (f).

"(3) Reports under this subsection shall be known as Program Cost Assessment Reports. Any such report shall be submitted not later than 30 days after the date on which the Secretary concerned receives the report from the program manager that is the basis for the submittal of such report.

"(f) Each Program Cost Assessment Report under subsection (e) with respect to a major defense acquisition program shall include the following:

"(1) The name of the major defense acquisition program.

"(2) The date of the preparation of the report.

"(3) The program phase as of the date of the preparation of the report.

"(4) The baseline program cost in constant base-year dollars and in current dollars.

"(5) The current program cost in constant base-year dollars and in current dollars.

"(6) The completion status of the program (A) expressed as the percentage that the number of years for which funds have been appropriated for the program is of the number of years for which it is planned that funds will be appropriated for the program, and (B) expressed as the percentage that the amount of funds that have been appropriated for the program is of the total amount of funds which it is planned will be appropriated for the program.

"(7) The base year.

"(8) The dates of the Selected Acquisition Reports that established the original unit cost baseline and the current unit cost baseline.

"(9) The current change and the total change, in dollars and expressed as a percentage, in the program acquisition unit cost, stated both in constant base-year dollars and in current dollars.

"(10) The quantity of end items to be acquired under the program and the current change and total change, if any, in that quantity.

"(11) The following contract performance assessment information with respect to each major contract under the program:

"(A) The name of the contractor.

"(B) The phase that the contract is in at the time of the preparation of the report.

"(C) The percentage of work under the contract that has been completed.

"(D) Any current change and the total change, in dollars and expressed as a percentage, in the contract cost.

"(E) The percentage by which the contract is currently ahead of or behind schedule.

"(F) A narrative providing a summary explanation of the most significant occurrences, including cost and schedule variances under major contracts of the program, contributing to the changes identified and a discussion of the effect these occurrences will have on future program costs and the program schedule.".

"(2) The table of sections at the beginning of such chapter is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new item:

"139a. Major defense acquisition programs: control of cost growth.".

"(b) Section 811 of the Department of Defense Appropriation Authorization Act, 1976 (10 U.S.C. 139 note) is repealed.

"(c) Section 139a of title 10, United States Code, as added by subsection (a), shall take effect on January 1, 1983, and shall apply beginning with respect to reports for the first quarter of fiscal year 1983. The repeal made by subsection (b) shall take effect on January 1, 1983.

Mr. McCURDY (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCURDY. Mr. Chairman, in offering this amendment to H.R. 6030, I sincerely believe it will improve the cost reporting on major defense programs and encourage improvements in cost management within the Department of Defense.

Mr. Chairman, last year I was fortunate to have been selected by Mr. PRICE, chairman of the Armed Services Committee and Mr. STRATTON, chairman of the Procurement and Military Nuclear Systems Subcommittee to chair a special panel on defense acquisition procedures. This special panel was chartered to review the Defense Department's acquisition process and to determine those factors which most frequently contribute to the cost growth plaguing many of our major weapon systems. The panel conducted 18 days of extensive hearings and heard from over 100 witnesses on the defense acquisition process and weapons systems cost growth.

The panel concluded that cost growth can be divided into two categories—controllable and uncontrollable. Uncontrollable cost growth is cost growth which is attributed to inflation. Clearly the Defense Department cannot be held responsible for inflationary trends which cause the price of major programs to increase. We all know that inflation is not unique to the defense acquisition process, but in fact, inflation touches all of our lives. This leaves us with the so-called controllable cost growth factors. Those factors include poor cost estimating procedures, program stretchouts, changes in weapon systems specifications, and lack of competition, to name a few. These are the factors which frequently result in unanticipated cost growth affecting many of our high cost defense weapons programs. It is my view that the Congress should encourage the Department of Defense to focus increased management attention on controlling this unanticipated cost growth. I believe that by insisting on improvements in cost report systems, we could help to accomplish this objective. I might add that the special panel on defense procurement procedures, in a 59-page report, recommended, among other things, that the current cost reporting system be changed.

My amendment would change the system currently used to report the status of major defense programs to Congress. This system is called the selected acquisition report—SAR—system. The SAR system was initiated by the Department of Defense in 1967 as an internal management information reporting system. Since then, the SAR system has evolved into a comprehensive reporting system on major defense acquisition programs. I would suggest that it is perhaps the most comprehensive management information reporting system in all of Government. A selected acquisition report is a routine quarterly report that reflects the Department of Defense's acquisition plans for a major weapon system and contains cost, scheduling, and performance data. Selected acquisition reports are prepared as of March 31, June 30, and September 30 of each year.

The Congress started receiving limited SAR's in 1969. However, in 1975, Congress, in recognition of the importance of SAR information, enacted legislation—Public Law 94-106—which required the Department of Defense to provide selected acquisition reports on a quarterly basis. The legislation also established dollar reporting thresholds. In 1979, Public Law 96-107 changed the reporting thresholds from $50 million to $75 million for R.D.T. & E. and from $200 million to $300 million for procurement. Although the intent of Public Law 96-107 is absolutely clear, there does remain some question as the definition of a major system. In fact, unless the Secretary of Defense has designated a system as a "major system" it may not be reported in SAR's although it may exceed the dollar thresholds outlined in Public Law 96-107. Therefore, my amendment will help to clarify the definition of a "major system."

Specifically, what does my amendment do?

The amendment insures that SAR's are provided to the Congress on all major defense programs which exceed $200 million in R.D.T. & E. cost or exceed $1 billion in procurement cost. This provision is clear and leaves no room for interpretation. The provision also provides that the Secretary of Defense may select any system as a major defense program even though it may fall below the dollar thresholds.

The amendment changes the requirement of providing comprehensive SAR's from four times a year to only once a year. Comprehensive SAR's will be those with a reporting period ending December 31 and will coincide with the President's budget submittal. The special panel determined that December 31 SAR's were the most accurate SAR's provided during the year, and they should be the benchmark against which all programmatic changes and cost increases are measured throughout the year. The amendment requires that in addition to the December 31 comprehensive SAR's, three additional quarterly SAR's be provided for the quarters ending March 31, June 30, and September 31. These will be abbreviated SAR's, and they will only be required when there is a change in the cost, performance, or schedule of a major defense program. I understand that the Department has estimated that reducing the number of comprehensive SAR's could potentially save over $330,000 a year.

The amendment will provide for exception reporting SAR programs. By exception reporting, I mean that reports are only required when the cost growth of a particular program exceeds a specified dollar threshold. As many of you know, last year the Congress passed a 1-year provision, as part of the Defense Department Authorization Act for fiscal year 1982, commonly referred to as the Nunn amendment, requiring the Department to provide exception reports when there is a 15-percent increase in program or procurement cost for those systems reported in the SAR. Although I believe that the Nunn amendment has been effective, my amendment goes one step further by requiring that major defense programs be examined by the military service secretary when there is a 15-percent increase in contract cost or a 15-percent slippage in contract schedule. The occurrence of either of these events would require the Secretary to examine the specific program concerned and assess the likelihood that the contract cost growth or schedule slippage may result in a 15-percent increase in the cost of the program.

Mr. Chairman, I understand that the gentleman from Maine (Mr. EMERY) will offer an amendment to this amendment which will provide for waivers to the SAR reporting requirement. I have reviewed his amendment, and I find it perfectly acceptable. I am conviced that Mr. Emery's amendment will not weaken my amendment by providing a loophole through which many major programs could slip. I will, therefore, accept his amendment when offered.

In conclusion, it is my belief that this amendment, if accepted, will improve cost reporting to the Congress we do not need more information; we need better information and we need it early enough to make changes and at the same time, assist in encouraging all levels of management within the Defense Department to focus increased management attention on cost growth and cost management. I, therefore, encourage my colleagues to support this amendment.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCURDY. I gladly yield to my distinguished subcommittee chairman.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to express my appreciation to the gentleman for offering this amendment. Do I understand that the gentleman's amendment now includes what is known as the Emery amendment?

Mr. McCURDY. I believe that the gentleman from Maine is about to offer his amendment, which I have gone over with him in detail and am ready to accept in toto.

□ 1550

Mr. EMERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCURDY. I yield to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. EMERY. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

If it is appropriate at this time, Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to the gentleman's amendment, but first I want to commend him for the work that he has done.

Mr. McCURDY. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time in order to allow the gentleman from Maine (Mr. EMERY) to present his amendment, which I have read and again am prepared to accept in toto. I think we can suspend with much of the debate on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. McCURDY) yield back the balance of his time?

Mr. McCURDY. Yes, Mr. Chairman.

● Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the amendment offered by my colleague, Mr. McCURDY, and want to commend him upon the quality of his leadership in the effort to gain control over massive cost overruns in the Pentagon budget.

Last year, the Congress passed the administration's defense program—a program that set new precedents in the rate of peacetime military spending by authorizing the Pentagon to spend $1.6 trillion on defense over the next 5 years. The sheer magnitude of this level of spending is difficult to conceptualize. Indeed, if we were to spend the sum at the rate of $1 million per day, 365 days per year, it would take over 4,000 years to exhaust the warchest. But perhaps even more difficult to comprehend is how the life cycle cost of only 47 weapons systems that are a part of that defense program increased by over $114 billion in the last quarter of 1981 alone. It is this kind of out-of-control cost overruns, that threaten to reduce to pocket changeall of the budget-savings in domestic programs so far identified by the Congress.

The special panel on defense procurement procedures of the House Committee on Armed Services, chaired with distinction by my colleague, Mr. McCURDY, has begun to take a look at cost overruns in the Pentagon. In its recent report, the panel determined that the massive cost overruns were predestined by poor initial cost estimates, unrealistic assumptions of inflation rates, changes in design made after program authority was obtained from Congress, and the lack of competition throughout the acquisition process. A skeptical observer might suggest that military planners intentionally underestimated program costs in order to win congressional approval of their designs. But even the most fair-minded critic would have to concede that initial Pentagon cost estimates have not been reliable, and that cost overruns of this mind-boggling and inexcusable magnitude cannot be explained as the consequence of inflation or unanticipated fluctuations in the supply and demand of component parts.

We must recognize that these runaway and unrestrained program costs threaten directly our national security efforts.

First, cost overruns in major weapon systems result in substantial reductions in procurement. As a natural consequence of cost overruns, the military has to make cuts in its procurement orders to bring program costs closer to budget targets. As James Fallows, author of National Defense, comments:

> No matter what the weapons system, whether ships, planes, helicopters, or missiles, the military ends up buying a smaller number than it originally planned simply because it must compensate for (runaway program costs.)

Second, cost overruns undermine directly our efforts to secure adequate maintenance of existing military equipment. Unwisely, military planners have often turned to maintenance budgets to achieve large portions of their cost savings; and consequently, equipment already in our arsenals receive inadequate attention. We need only remember the ill-fated rescue mission in Iran to grasp the significance of proper equipment maintenance to our military preparedness. Yet it is precisely this essential element of our defense readiness that is being ignored in the wake of massive cost overruns in major weapons programs.

Finally, we must recognize that our national security is at least as dependent upon economic stability and the revitalization of our industrial base as it is upon the size of our defense budget and the number of weapons in our arsenal. In this connection, cost overruns in the Pentagon serve only to fuel the unending demands of the military for more money—demands which, if agreed to, threaten to postpone indefinitely our hopes for an economic recovery. Last fall, a reknowned panel of economists studies the impacts of massive military spending; their conclusion—sustained massive military spending will lead to greater deficit spending. And with tax deductions far exceeding cuts in social spending, sustained defense increases will push the Federal budget even further into the red, meaning continuing high rates of interest and mounting economic distress.

Never before have Americans been asked to commit such large portions of their resources to a peacetime military buildup, and never before have Americans felt less secure. Frankly, their feelings of insecurity are well-founded. I say this because this Congress—without seriously questioning the extravagance of military planners or blinking an eye at the outrageous cost overruns their programs are incurring—is indiscriminantly throwing dollars at the Pentagon, and in the process, it is buying less security rather than more.

Simply, it is time to demand that the Pentagon become more accountable to the Congress. It is time to demand that initial cost estimates submitted to Congress be more accurate, that procurement projections be more realistic, and that contracts be obtained through competitive bidding.

The key to achieving this kind of accountability is to give priority to well-informed congressional oversight of Pentagon procurement procedures, and this is what Mr. HERTEL's amendment is all about. By mandating the Pentagon to submit to the Armed Services Committees of the Congress a detailed report of all the substantial cost overruns in major weapon systems, we might be able to exert greater control over the now unrestrained spending practices of the military.

Passage of this amendment will assist us in our struggle to achieve a national economic recovery through the elimination of unnecessary spending and will create incentives for the efficient and effective expenditure of our defense dollars. Mr. Chairman, our national security goals can only be enhanced by the adoption of this amendment.●

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. EMERY TO THE AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. M'CURDY

Mr. EMERY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. EMERY to the amendment offered by Mr. McCURDY: At the end of section 139a(b)(1)(B) of title 10, United States Code, as proposed to be added by the amendment, insert the following: "In addition, the requirement to report on a particular major defense acquisition program in any quarter may be waived with the approval of the Committee on Armed Services of the Senate and the Committee on Armed Services of the House of Representatives.".

Mr. EMERY (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine?

There was no objection.

Mr. EMERY. Mr. Chairman, to expedite matters, I will describe this amendment very briefly. It is a perfecting amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. MCCURDY) which we have worked out together, and which merely clarifies the role of the Armed Services Committee and states that certain reports may be waived under certain circumstances.

I rise in support of the McCurdy amendment on selected acquisition reports, with the understanding that Mr. MCCURDY will accept my amendment concerning the waiver provision for SAR's.

The McCurdy amendment, as amended by my amendment, will have the effect of increasing congressional awareness of weapons costs, while insuring that the Department of Defense is not forced to prepare the 100 or more SAR's that would be required by the increase in the SAR dollar thresholds. Together, the Emery and McCurdy amendments will provide the Congress with a more incisive look at the cost growth in major weapons programs.

A discussion of the problem that brought my colleague and I to these amendments would be in order. In the fiscal year 1982 Defense authorization bill, Senator NUNN added a requirement for very strict cost reporting on weapons systems which are suffering from unacceptable cost increases and schedule slippages. The McCurdy amendment incorporates the provisions of the Nunn amendment, and provides for exception reporting when there is a cost overrun of more than 15 percent. The amendment also provides for 1 yearly SAR of a comprehensive nature, to be complemented by quarterly SAR's when problems develop in weapons systems. Finally, the amendment eliminates the discretion of the Secretary of Defense in determining which programs will undergo the SAR process.

The original Emery amendment shared several provisions with the McCurdy amendment, including the increase of the reporting thresholds to $200 million in R. & D. and $1 billion in procurement funding. In addition, my amendment would permit the Secretary of Defense to ask the House and Senate Armed Services Committees to exempt certain programs, like military trucks and transport vehicles, from the SAR requirement. We must acknowledge that the SAR's are very comprehensive and exhaustive reports, and it is not the intention of Congress to have reports prepared merely for their own sake. There must be some flexibility in this area, and this is the reason from my amendment to the McCurdy amendment.

To show the Members the kind of loopholes that now exist in the SAR process, you may be disturbed to know that such major programs as the MX missile, the Trident II missile, the DDG-51 destroyer, the battleship reactivations, and the space shuttle inertial upper stage are not currently subject to the SAR requirements. This is because these programs have not advanced to DSARC Milestone II, or full-scale development. However, I have asked the chairman of the Armed Service Committee to request the initiation of SAR's on these programs, and he has agreed to do this. I also understand that the Secretary of Defense has agreed to this request. We simply cannot allow such major programs to escape the scrutiny of the SAR process, and I would hope that the Members will agree with and support my logic in this regard.

Mr. MCCURDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EMERY. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. MCCURDY. Mr. Chairman, I will gladly accept the gentleman's amendment with the understanding, under the format that we worked out earlier, that it does not become proforma within the Armed Service Committee for the Department of Defense to seek a waiver of reporting of major weapons systems.

As long as the gentleman, for the purpose of legislative history, agrees that committee approval means a majority vote of Members present and voting, with a quorum being present in committee, I will gladly accept the amendment offered by my colleague from Maine (Mr. EMERY).

Mr. EMERY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's understanding of the intent of my amendment is exactly correct. It is merely to provide an opportunity for the committee to work its will in the usual way and is not by any means a pro forma waiver of any provisions of his amendment.

Mr. HERTEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EMERY. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HERTEL. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Let me state that I, too, support the Emery amendment to the McCurdy amendment, which I cosponsored. I cosponsored the McCurdy amendment because we are all concerned about cost overruns, and the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. MCCURDY) has one of the best ideas on how to control that in the future and to keep the Congress well informed so we can deal with this problem and reduce costs in the future.

Since the chairman has agreed to accept the amendment, if the House agrees to the McCurdy amendment, I, therefore, withdraw the Hertel amendment, which is going down the same road. I do that because of the excellent job done by the sponsors.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EMERY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, I will try to expedite the operations, and I want to say on behalf of the committee that we accept the McCurdy amendment, as amended by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine (Mr. EMERY).

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. MCCURDY).

The Armed Services Committee has always been interested in the issue of cost control in the acquisition of major defense programs. In fact, the appropriate subcommittees—Research and Development, Procurement and Military Nuclear Systems, and Seapower—conduct a series of comprehensive, formal hearings each year which effectively provide continuous oversight of their respective jurisdictional areas. During these hearings, cost control in the development and procurement of weapons programs is a recurring theme.

As chairman of the Procurement and Military Nuclear Systems Subcommittee, I believed it would be beneficial to focus specifically on Defense Department procurement procedures and policies that could tend to increase the cost of weapons systems. Consequently, I appointed a special panel of the subcommittee to review procurement procedures and policies; and as Mr. MCCURDY indicated, he was appointed as chairman of the special panel.

Mr. Chairman, I want to commend Mr. MCCURDY and the other members of the special panel who worked many long hours developing the recommendations related to cost control in the defense acquisition process. As was indicated by Mr. MCCURDY, the amendment before you is one of those recommended by the special panel.

I believe the amendment is a positive step, and I urge your support.

Mr. HILLIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EMERY. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HILLIS. Mr. Chairman, the minority has had a chance to examine both amendments and finds them to be acceptable.

Mr. EMERY. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine (Mr. EMERY) to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. MCCURDY).

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. MCCURDY), as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. BEARD

Mr. BEARD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BEARD: At the end of the bill, add the following new section:

OVERSIGHT OF DEFENSE EXPENDITURES

SEC. 902. (a) Concurrent with the submission of the budget to Congress for fiscal year 1984, the Secretary of Defense shall submit to the Committees on Armed Services of the Senate and House of Representatives a report concerning the strength requested in such budget for civilian personnel for the Defense Contract Audit Agency, Defense Audit Service and the Defense Criminal Investigative Service. Such report shall state the number of such personnel at the end of fiscal year 1982, the number at the time the report is submitted, and the number requested in that budget and shall include a justification for the number requested. The report shall also include the opinion of the Secretary of Defense as to whether the number requested is sufficient for those agencies to accomplish their functions with respect to the reduction of waste, fraud, and abuse in defense expenditures during the next fiscal year, particularly in light of any increases (in real terms) in the levels of appropriations requested in that budget for operations, procurement of new equipment, and for research, development, test, and evaluation.

(b) The Secretary shall include in the report under subsection (a) information concerning the savings in defense expenditures achieved by the Defense Contract Audit Agency, Defense Audit Service and Defense Criminal Investigative Service during fiscal year 1982, including a statement for each agency of the amount of such cost savings achieved as a percentage of the number of dollars spent by such agency during such year.

Mr. BEARD (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. BEARD. Mr. Chairman, today I am introducing an amendment to the Department of Defense authorization bill that I sincerely believe will greatly strengthen the ability of the Defense Department to adequately monitor its expenditures, and in turn provide assurance to the Congress and the taxpayers that defense funds are being spent wisely, not wastefully.

In short, this amendment will instruct the Secretary of Defense to provide a report to the Congress which demonstrates that the Defense Department budget contains an authorized level of personnel for the Defense Contract Audit Agency, the Defense Audit Service and Defense Criminal Investigative Service that is sufficient to adequately oversee the real increase from one fiscal year to the next in the level of outlays for research, development, test, and evaluation procurement. Insuring adequate personnel for those particular agencies within the Defense Department will substantially minimize waste, fraud, and abuse.

The reason I am offering this amendment is simple. I have encountered in Tennessee, my home State, a growing feeling that all the dollars we are pouring into the defense budget are not necessarily being spent wisely. Clearly, this sentiment is not because Tennesseans want to scrimp on defense. There is no other State in the union where support for a strong defense is greater.

But many are skeptical that simply increasing defense spending will result in a stronger defense. There is a feeling that when you significantly increase spending in any one area, defense or otherwise, a lot of waste occurs. I am sure my colleagues on both sides of the aisle have experienced similar reactions from their constituents.

My amendment is directed squarely at those legitimate concerns. My goal is to strengthen those agencies within the Defense Department whose purpose is to oversee our spending and root out waste and fraud. I want to insure that they have the people to go after waste, fraud, and abuse in the Pentagon budget and do it effectively.

Aside from the positive effects of price competition, the best check on spending for weapons procurement is an adequate audit function, both internal and contract audit.

On the contract audit side, the Defense Contract Audit Agency, or DCAA, is the only professional audit organization designated by the Defense Department to perform audits of contracts let by that Department. Its responsibility is a significant one because of the magnitude of defense contracting and the large increase in spending.

DCAA's function is to assist procurement and contract administration managers by providing financial information and advice on proposed or existing contracts. To accomplish their assigned mission, DCAA auditors review new proposals submitted to DOD by defense contractors and perform audits of costs already incurred under existing contracts.

On the internal audit side, several organizations within the Defense Department are established to perform oversight of Department spending and practices. The most recent organization to come into existence within DOD is the Office of the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Review and Oversight. Within that office my amendment specifically affects the Defense Criminal Investigative Service, or DCIS, and the Defense Audit Service, or DAS.

The DCIS concentrates primarily on theft of Government property from military depots and white-collar crime such as embezzling. In other words, the DCIS is the agency that goes after actual criminal behavior within the Department.

The DAS, on the other hand, performs internal audits on behalf of the Secretary of Defense.

Continuing the fight against waste in Government programs and preventing fraud and abuse is a critical part of our endeavor to revitalize America's defenses. The success of our efforts depends, to a large extent, on the innovative and dedicated work performed by the men and women in the DCAA, DCIS, and DAS. We must receive the maximum value for every taxpayer's dollar spent for defense. I am sure that this amendment will help to reach that goal. The reason strengthening the audit function within DOD will help us reach that goal is that auditors within DOD, like the Internal Revenue Service, provide a payback to the Government. For example, for every dollar invested in DCAA in fiscal year 1981, $47 was saved in potential contract costs, a 4,700-percent return on investment.

The most-effective way to increase audit staff is gradually. DCAA auditors are recruited from colleges across the country and they must be trained in the unique and complicated role of auditing Defense Department contracts and procedures. That takes time, and simply doubling the DCAA overnight would itself be wasteful. The same principle applies to the DCIS and DAS.

My amendment, therefore, will require the Secretary of Defense to establish a reasonable rate of return, say $20 for every $1 invested in the agencies named, and adjust the staffing levels gradually each year to maintain at least that level of return.

I have discussed this amendment with officials in both the Office of Management and Budget and the Department of Defense and they agree that one sure way to combat waste, fraud, and abuse is the approach taken in my amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I ask my colleagues to support this amendment. Improving the audit function of the Defense Department may not sound too exciting, but it is in the trenches of the auditing and watchdog agencies that the war against waste will be won or lost. Thank you.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEARD. I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from New York.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, we have had an opportunity to read the gentleman's amendment. It is an outstanding amendment, and on behalf of the committee I am prepared to accept the amendment.

Mr. BEARD. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEARD. Certainly, I yield to my friend, the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, just let me say that anything the gentleman from New York (Mr. STRATTON) accepts I am bound to accept. I thank the gentleman very much.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. BEARD).

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. ASPIN

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ASPIN: At the end of the bill, add the following new section:

LIMITATION ON STRATEGIC WEAPONS

SEC. 902. (a) None of the funds appropriated pursuant to authorizations of appropriations in this Act may be used for the procurement, testing, deployment, or operation and maintenance of any strategic nuclear weapon or nuclear weapon system, or of a launcher for a strategic nuclear weapon or nuclear weapon system, if that procurement, testing, deployment, or operation and maintenance would contravene existing strategic arms policies of the United States as declared by the President in his Memorial Day address of May 31, 1982, as follows: "As for existing strategic arms agreements, we will refrain from actions which undercut them so long as the Soviet Union shows equal restraint.".

(b) The limitations set forth in subsection (a) shall not apply after the date that is thirty days after the date on which the President transmits a report in writing to Congress (1) containing the President's certification that it is in the supreme national interest of the United States that such limitations no longer apply, and (2) setting forth the reasons for the certification.

Mr. ASPIN (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ASPIN) is recognized for 5 minutes in support of his amendment.

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. PRICE).

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, I have had an opportunity to review this amendment, and the committee accepts the amendment.

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. DICKINSON).

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman surprisingly, I find myself on the same side as the gentleman who is offering the amendment. We will be glad to accept it on this side.

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ASPIN).

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. DOUGHERTY

Mr. DOUGHERTY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DOUGHERTY: At the end of the bill, add the following new section:

DESIGNATION OF ESTONIA, LATVIA, AND LITHUANIA ON DEFENSE MAPS

SEC. 906. None of the funds appropriated pursuant to an authorization of appropriations in this Act may be used to prepare, produce or purchase any map showing the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics that does not—

(1) show the geographic boundaries of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania and designate those areas by those names;

(2) include the designation "Soviet Occupied" in parenthesis under each of those names; and

(3) include in close proximity to the area of the Baltic countries the following statement: "The United States Government does not recognize the incorporation of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania into the Soviet Union".

Mr. DOUGHERTY (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

□ 1600

Mr. DOUGHERTY. Mr. Chairman, despite the fact that the Soviet Union illegally took over the Baltic States of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania, the United States still recognizes the States as being separate and rightfully independent entities.

The policy of the State Department has supposedly been to clearly delineate the boundaries of these States on any maps produced by U.S. Government mapping agencies. In addition, the guidelines established by the State Department for maps of the Baltic States are very definite in calling for a printed disclaimer which says that the United States does not recognize the Soviet incorporation of these three nations. Memos explaining these regulations have been sent to all governmental mapmaking agencies, including the Defense Mapping Agency.

Unfortunately, I have discovered that a number of recently published maps do not exactly follow the policy guidelines. Some of these maps do not mark any boundary lines for Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania. Other maps I have seen proclaim the States as belonging to the Soviet Union, and the true identity of the States are placed in parenthesis below. Any such identification signals that our country accepts the incorporation of the Baltic States into the U.S.S.R. But our Government most certainly does not accept the Soviet takeover. As a matter of fact, this week marks the 60th anniversary of American recognition of the independent Baltic States in 1922.

Mr. Chairman, I am also quite disturbed that the State Department regulations allow the printing of U.S. maps that recognize the de facto incorporation of the Baltic States into the Soviet Union. It is a complete contradiction to the letter and spirit of the mapmaking regulations. As a result, more maps are printed which do not show Estonia, Lithuania, and Latvia as separate entities.

Therefore, in the interest of consistency for our Government and freedom for the Baltic States, I am introducing the following amendment to H.R. 6030 and ask for your support. The amendment takes a government mapping regulation already in place and strengthens it to follow more consistently our Government's foreign policy regarding the Baltic States. It is my hope that all those Members who long for a free Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia once again will join me in supporting this amendment.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHERTY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. STRATTON. We have had an opportunity to examine this amendment. I would accept it on behalf of the majority of the committee.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTERY. It is a pleasure to yield to my leader.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the people of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania, we are very pleased on this side of the aisle to accept the amendment which would mandate that the DOD mapping agency show these three countries by their ethnic name of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania rather than blending them in with the U.S.S.R.

We are very pleased to accept the amendment.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. Mr. Chairman, I would just, for the information of my colleagues, state this week represents the 60th anniversary of the U.S. recognition of the independence of Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia. All we do in the amendment is require the Defense Department to show this on maps when they purchase them.

I yield back the balance of my time.

● Mr. HERTEL. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Ad Hoc Committee on the Baltic States and the Ukraine, I would urge my colleagues to adopt Mr. DOUGHERTY's amendment which requires the designation of the Baltic States on Defense Department produced and purchased maps. Today we are in the midst of Captive Nations Week and July 28 marks the 60th anniversary of continual diplomatic recognition of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania by the United States. It is, therefore, an appropriate moment to reaffirm and strengthen our Nation's consistent foreign policy of nonrecognition of the incorporation of the Baltic States into the Soviet Union.

While the Western nations' attention was focussed on the war against Nazi forces, the Soviet Union used this opportunity to cut the Baltic States off from contact with the West. Fulfilling their part of the bargaining that was struck with Nazi Germany in the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact of August 23, 1939, the Soviet Union invaded the Baltic States on June 14, 1940. In Lithuania alone they used a force of 300,000 Red army troops supported by armor and airplanes. This works out to be 1 soldier for every 12 inhabitants of Lithuania. The Kremlin set up a hand-picked Peoples' Diet which immediately petitioned to incorporate Lithuania into the Soviet Union. The Supreme Soviet of the U.S.S.R. was ready, of course, to comply and on August 3, 1940, Lithuania was designated a Soviet Republic. This pattern was repeated in Latvia and Estonia with equal impunity. From Soviet maps captured by the United States during World War II, we know that the Soviets began to treat the Baltic States as an integral part of their territory as early as 1938.

It is not only a matter of principle, but also a matter of public education that the guidelines concerning maps of the Baltic States should be clear and unequivocal. The Department of Defense must in its day-to-day activities accurately reflect the policy of the United States; the forcible annexation of the Baltic States by the Soviet Union is illegal by any standard of international law and is not recognized by the U.S. Government.●

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. DOUGHERTY).

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. PRICE

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PRICE: At the end of the bill add the following new section:

WAIVER OF AUTHORIZATION REQUIREMENT FOR CERTAIN PREVIOUSLY APPROPRIATED FUNDS

SEC. 902. The provisions of section 138(a) of title 10, United States Code, requiring that funds may not be obligated or expended by the Armed Forces for certain purposes unless such funds have been specifically authorized by law shall not apply with respect to the obligation or expenditure of funds appropriated for fiscal year 1982 before the date of enactment of this act for the following purposes:

(1) Procurement of aircraft for the Army.

(2) Procurement of aircraft for the Air Force.

(3) Procurement of missiles for the Air Force.

(4) Operations and Maintenance for Defense-wide activities.

Mr. PRICE (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanmous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is very simple.

Last year the passage of the authorization bill was delayed because of late changes in the budget of the Reagan administration, so that the appropriations bill passed the House and was in conference by the time the authorization bill was enacted. In the resulting confusion the appropriations bill in a number of instances exceeded the level of authorization.

Section 138 of title 10, United States Code, requires not only authorization prior to an appropriation, but also prohibits the obligation of expenditure of funds in designated categories without an annual authorization. There has been, therefore, a problem for the managers of the Defense Department in being unable to obligate appropriated amounts because they were not duly authorized.

With the aid of Mr. DICKINSON and Mr. STRATTON of our committee we conferred on this matter with Mr. ADDABBO and Mr. EDWARDS of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee and subsequently received a letter from Mr. ADDABBO indicating his understanding that the action in those strained and difficult last days of a long session last year, which resulted in appropriated amounts exceeding authorized levels in a few instances, should in no way be construed as establishing a precedent.

Further, he stated it was his intention that the defense appropriations bill stay within the levels set in the authorizing legislation and such would be his purpose in formulation of the fiscal year 1983 and following appropriations bills.

Pursuant to Mr. ADDABBO's assurance and in light of the unique circumstances last year, I indicated to him that I would move during consideration of the fiscal year 1983 authorization to waive the provisions of section 138 of title 10 for fiscal year 1982 to help remove the legal impediment to the spending of these fiscal year 1982 funds for those instances where the appropriated amounts exceed authorization levels.

I will state, Mr. Chairman, that I appreciate the patience and cooperation of Mr. ADDABBO in this matter and I trust we have, by the means I am taking here, put the problem behind us, as both he and I desire.

My amendment, therefore, would waive the provisions of section 138 of title 10, United States Code for fiscal year 1982 for four accounts where the appropriated amount exceeds authorization levels.

It should be understood that in instances where appropriations exceeded authorization for specific programs, but there was unused authorization in the accounts, it was possible to cover the appropriation by an authorization reprograming and that has been done in a number of cases by the Armed Services Committees of the House and Senate. My amendment at this point would remove all obstacles to obligation of the moneys appropriated in fiscal year 1982.

Let me make clear that this action in no way increases the budget for fiscal year 1982, but merely allows the obligation of funds already appropriated.

I move adoption of my amendment.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words and rise in support of the amendment.

By way of explanation, and the chairman has explained it I think very succinctly, last year, because of a number of things; mainly, because of the parliamentary situation the Appropriations Committee appropriated certain funds which had not been authorized in this bill.

There is some confusion among the administration, the General Accounting Office, the Department of Defense and I do not know who else is involved as to whether or not these funds can be legally spent or obligated without an authorization. Because of the uncertainty there has been an agreement by the Appropriations Committee and our committee that we will include in this bill a waiver with the agreement that the appropriations committees will not appropriate funds in the future that have not been authorized because, you know, if the Appropriations Committee is going to appropriate money that has not been authorized we do not even need an authorizing committee.

So this is to correct a one-time fault.

We think we are now in agreement with the Appropriations Committee.

I think the amendment is necessary. There is no opposition to it and I certainly support it.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. PRICE).

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. PRICE

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PRICE: At the end of the bill add the following new section:

LIMITATION ON DEFENSE FUNDS FOR SPACE SHUTTLE

SEC. 902. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, during fiscal year 1983 the Secretary of Defense shall not transfer funds to the Administrator of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration to pay any part of the cost of placing Department of Defense payloads into orbit by means of the Space Shuttle except in accordance with laws in effect on July 1, 1982, and interagency agreements made pursuant to such laws.

Mr. PRICE (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to place a restriction on the amount of funding the Department of Defense may be required to transfer to the National Aeronautics and Space Administration—NASA—during fiscal year 1983 to pay to place DOD payloads in space via the Space Shuttle. The amendment insures that such payment will only be in accordance with laws and interagency agreements in effect on July 1, 1982.

Contained in the Senate version of the fiscal year 1983 NASA authorization bill is a provision that would require "the Secretary of Defense (to) transfer to the (NASA) Administrator such sums as may be necessary to pay the full costs of placing Department of Defense payloads into orbit by means of the Space Shuttle." No such provision exists in the House version of the NASA authorization bill.

There are several issues of concern embodied in the Senate provision to the NASA authorization bill.

First, a NASA authorization bill is being used as a vehicle to direct the Secretary of Defense to transfer Defense Department funding to NASA. The Armed Services Committees, the committees with jurisdictional responsibility for the DOD, have not been consulted on the matter.

Second, pricing agreements are currently in effect that establish DOD payload costs. These agreements take into account DOD's contribution to the Space Shuttle program. These contributions, which will cost the Air Force several billion dollars, include preparation of the Vandenburg Air Force Base for west coast Shuttle launches, development of the inertial upper stage and development and construction of the Consolidated Space Operations Center. The Senate provision ignores these very expensive Air Force contributions to the Shuttle program.

Third, if allowed to go unchallenged, the Senate provision would cause the Secretary of Defense to transfer unbudgeted funds in excess of $400 million in fiscal year 1983 to NASA. This funding would necessarily have to be taken away from other DOD programs.

Finally, the Shuttle is a national program and the National Aeronautics and Space Administration has been designated the executive agent for this program just as the DOD has been designated the executive agent for the NAVSTAR Global Positioning System. NASA has been given the primary responsibility for developing and placing the Shuttle into service. If DOD is now to be required to pay a larger share of the Shuttle in the national interest, then DOD should be provided with a larger budget to carry out this new reponsibility. The Senate provision does not provide for such a budget increase.

This amendment has the effect of neutralizing the provision in the Senate version of the NASA bill. The Senate legislation represents bad policy and, in my opinion, could ultimately lead to the demise of the entire Shuttle program. I strongly urge the House to adopt this amendment in that it will keep the Shuttle program on a straight and steady course.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, let me say in connection with the statement made by the chairman that there has been and is today an ongoing agreement and a coadventure by both NASA and the Department of Defense—namely, the Air Force—in the Space Shuttle program.

There was an amendment in the other body that would direct that funds be transferred from DOD to NASA to pay a larger share of the Shuttle program.

It is the feeling of the Department of Defense and our committee that if NASA needs more money for the Shuttle, it should be authorized and appropriated, but let us not take it out of the hide of the Air Force.

What we have done by this agreement, and in conversation with the various agencies involved, is to limit what moneys will be taken from the Department of Defense to give to NASA; and really, in effect, serve notice that in the future if there is going to be money spent by NASA, it is going to be authorized and appropriated and not taken out of the hide of the Department of Defense.

So I think this is a good amendment and I certainly support it.

Mr. WINN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. WINN. I appreciate the gentleman yielding.

I just wonder if the gentleman could clarify the statement he made that the other body put in some additional requests or took funding from the Air Force budget and wanted to put it over into NASA.

Mr. DICKINSON. Let me respond by saying that it is my understanding that the Senate version of the fiscal year 1983 authorization bill contains a provision directing the DOD to transfer $409 million of its funds, which have been budgeted for other purposes, to NASA to cover certain Space Shuttle expenses.

What we are trying to do here is put a limitation on that and to say that whatever NASA needs should be authorized and appropriated in the NASA bills. It should not come out of the hide of the DOD.

Mr. DICKINSON. What we are doing now is a technical necessity and I wanted to make that explanation to the membership.

I thank the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. PRICE).

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. KAZEN

Mr. KAZEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KAZEN: At the end of the bill add the following new section:

PRIOR NOTIFICATION TO CONGRESS ON FOREIGN SOLE SOURCE PROCUREMENTS

Subject to the provisions of Chapter 138 of title 10, United States Code (relating to North Atlantic Treaty Organization mutual support), none of the funds authorized to be appropriated in this Act may be used to enter into a prime contract for the purchase of a major article of equipment essential to the national defense from a manufacturer outside the United States that makes the United States dependent on that manufacturer as a sole source, unless the Secretary of Defense shall have notified the Committees on Armed Services and Appropriations of the House and Senate, in writing, and thirty days shall have elapsed from the date of receipt of such notification.

Mr. KAZEN (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. KAZEN. Mr. Chairman, this is a very simple and, I think, a very sound amendment. It would provide that during fiscal year 1983, the Defense Department could not enter into any prime contract for the purchase of a major article of equipment essential to national defense from a non-U.S. manufacturer that would make the United States dependent upon a foreign source unless the Secretary of Defense notifies the Armed Services and Appropriations Committees of the House and Senate and 30 days shall have elapsed from the date of receipt of such notification.

Let me point out first what this amendment would not do:

First, it would not preclude anything the Department of Defense is doing or plans to do.

Second, it does not prohibit cooperative programs; and Third, finally, it is not protectionist legislation.

What this amendment does do is to address a very serious concern, I think many of us in the Congress have from time to time questioned the way the Defense Department does business. All too often, the executive branch seems to assume that it is solely responsible for determining what is and what is not in the national interest and we find the Department of Defense making decisions and informing Congress after the fact. This amendment takes a small step in a limited area toward reversing that sequence of events.

There are, admittedly, occasions where it will be in the national interest to procure equipment from our allies instead of going through the expensive and time-consuming process of "reinventing the wheel." This amendment will not prevent foreign procurement in those cases where it makes good commonsense.

I also fully appreciate that we sell far more military equipment to our friends—particularly our NATO allies—than we buy from them. The ratio varies from year to year but it is about 10 to 1 in our favor over time. Those sales translate into jobs for U.S. industry and I appreciate that we cannot expect them to continue to buy U.S. equipment if we do not make an effort to buy something from them in those cases where it makes sense to do so. This amendment does not interfere with arms cooperation in any way.

The essence of this amendment is a long-standing and deep-rooted philosophy in this country that we should maintain a complete mobilization base in our defense industry and we should generally avoid becoming dependent upon a foreign source as the sole supplier of a critical item of military equipment.

All this amendment does is to require that Congress be informed, before rather than after the fact in those instances where the Department of Defense plans to award a contract that would make us dependent on a foreign manufacturer as the sole source of major defense equipment.

I repeat: This amendment is not protectionist or antiforeign. It is a vehicle for maintaining timely congressional oversight on policy decisions affecting the national security of the country.

I urge the adoption of this amendment.

□ 1610

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAZEN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, we have had an opportunity to examine the gentleman's amendment, and on behalf of this side of the Committee we are prepared to accept it.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAZEN. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama, the distinguished ranking minority member.

Mr. DICKINSON. Just as a matter of record, there are many items which we procure offshore, some of which are manufactured and some of which are not, many of which are sole source.

As I read the gentleman's amendment, his amendment is limited to manufactured articles only; is that correct?

Mr. KAZEN. Prime contracts.

Mr. DICKINSON. Prime contracts for offshore?

Mr. KAZEN. That is right.

All it does, I will tell my colleague, is request the Department of Defense to notify the committees of Congress when this is going to happen.

Mr. DICKINSON. I have no problem. I just wanted to understand it. We buy minerals, metals, strategic ingredients to many things which are manufactured here, which are sole source. This does not apply to that. Only manufactured articles. And this only applies to the prime contractor, not to the subcontractor; is that correct?

Mr. KAZEN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. DICKINSON. It is strictly a matter of notice so that we can be apprised and take whatever action we might feel appropriate.

Mr. WHITEHURST. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this amendment after having heard the explanation of it offered by the gentleman from Texas (Mr. KAZEN).

When I first learned of this amendment I was concerned that some of our allies might think it was aimed at them. I was concerned that it was another protectionist amendment. But I am pleased to find this amendment has more positive goals.

I am concerned about the state of our economy as is everyone else in this body. But I am also concerned about a very dangerous trend I see developing in the House this year. When a country experiences hard times, there is a tendency to search for scapegoats and one of the most politically popular devices is to blame the situation on our friends abroad—to accuse them of unfair competition.

It is a sad fact that when a nation is frustrated it also becomes narrow-minded, ethnocentric, and mean spirited. And, occasionally, its legislators propose laws that reflect that mood—shortsighted laws that, in the long run, exacerbate not only our political relationships with our allies, but also the economic situation here in the United States. In other words, the cure of the patent medicine of protectionism is worse than the malady itself.

For the last several years we have been running a very substantial surplus in our balance of trade with the Common Market countries—a surplus which translates directly into hundreds of thousands of additional American jobs—jobs the Europeans literally export to the United States.

Some Members in this body choose to ignore this basic fact by proposing to limit what little defense equipment we buy from our NATO allies—apparently in the naive belief that the European parliamentarians will not retaliate with protectionist legislation of their own.

I urge this House to abandon this mean spirited and shortsighted mood of protectionism. Literally, we are cutting off our nose to spite our face. And we are risking 10 jobs in the vain hope of saving one.

However, this amendment is not inspired by protectionist motives and it is not intended to limit cooperation with our allies and it does not attempt to retaliate against them for imagined unfair competition.

Because it does none of these things, but rather simply asks the Secretary of Defense to inform the Congress on a matter of national security interest, I am prepared to support it.

● Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support for my colleague, Mr. KAZEN's amendment.

The opposition to the concept of maintaining our defense industrial base has focused on the issues of jobs and whether "Buy American" provisions accomplish their goals. However, this amendment is not solely a jobs amendment. More importantly, it is a defense amendment. This amendment requires that the Congress be given the opportunity to know whether the United States is to be totally dependent on foreign sources for our major weapons systems.

At present, the Department of Defense does not adequately protect or consider our industrial base in its procurement decisions. As a result of focusing solely on a narrow definition of costs, we wind up buying systems abroad with little concern for the collateral costs incurred as a result of overseas procurement. An egregious example of this can be found in the naval weapons procurement section of the bill.

I refer to the three Mk75, 76mm gun mounts intended for use in Navy and Coast Guard escort vessels. A procurement decision made a month ago will result in all our 76mm's having to be from a foreign source and as a result of this decision, the United States will lose its domestic source for these gun mounts. Obviously, such a situation could cause serious difficulties in case of war. Apart from the possibility of interruption of supply we will require protection to convoy the cargo vessels carrying foreign built gun mounts to the United States. This puts us into the ridiculous situation of having to buy extra foreign gun mounts for the extra escort vessels needed to insure the safe arrival of more foreign gun mounts. This amendment, if adopted, would provide a mechanism for adequate congressional oversight so that we can make any necessary modifications to protect our defense industrial base.

This issue goes beyond economics. In the case of the gun mounts, the foreign source did underbid the domestic manufacturer for the fiscal year 1982 procurement. However, this savings is largely offset by the extra overhead costs on other guns and missile launchers. I certainly do not want to crush the first commendable glimmerings of a desire for economy in the Navy but there seems to be a lack of proportion in this decision. When the Secretary of the Navy is willing to spend $80 million to get a second source for the Aegis crusier, it seems ludicrous to avoid spending an extra $1 or $2 million in order to maintain the single U.S. source for an important weapons system. The Navy is unwilling to protect our sole domestic source for these gun mounts whose total yearly cost is less than $15 million.

The basic issue is the defense of the United States. Because of the Navy decision, we will have an interruption in domestic production of gun mounts, making it impossible for the United States supplier to have a chance in bidding for the 1982 Mk75 procurement. As a result, the U.S. capability to produce 3 inch naval guns will cease next year with completion of the 1981 procurement. A skilled work force, unique in the United States, will disperse to other jobs and will not be able to be reassembled even if we maintain the machinery in mothballs.

Mr. Chairman, I have described the loss of an important defense capability for the United States. Unfortunately, skilled workers are not easily replaceable. Defense requires many skilled workers and a strong defense industrial capability. This is the proper goal of the Kazen amendment. I urge my colleagues support this amendment.●

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas (Mr. KAZEN).

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. SOLOMON

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which is printed in the RECORD.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SOLOMON: Page 26, after line 22, add the following new section:

ENFORCEMENT OF MILITARY SELECTIVE SERVICE ACT

SEC. 1010. (a) Section 12 of the Military Selective Service Act (50 U.S.C. App. 462) is amended by adding after subsection (e) the following new subsection:

"(f)(1) The Director of the Selective Service System shall submit to the Secretary of Education, with respect to each individual receiving, or applying for, any grant, assisted loan, benefit, or other assistance, under title IV of the Higher Education Act of 1965 (20 U.S.C. 1070 et seq.), or participating in any program established, or assisted, under such title, verification of whether such individual has violated section 3 by not presenting and submitting to registration pursuant to section 3.

"(2) On the basis of the verification submitted pursuant to paragraph (1), the Secretary of Education shall make a preliminary determination on whether each individual described in paragraph (1) has complied with or violated section 3.

"(3) If the Secretary of Education preliminarily determines that any individual described in paragraph (1) has violated section 3, the Secretary of Education shall notify such individual of the preliminary determination.

"(4) Any individual notified pursuant to paragraph (3) may submit to the Secretary of Education within a period of time of not less than 30 days after receiving such notification any information with respect to the compliance or violation of section 3 by such individual.

"(5) After the period of time specified in paragraph (4) and taking into consideration any information submitted by the individual, the Secretary of Education shall make a final determination on whether each individual notified pursuant to paragraph (3) has complied with or violated section 3.

"(6)(A) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, any individual finally determined by the Secretary of Education pursuant to paragraph (5) to have violated section 3 is not eligible for, and may not receive, any grant, assisted loan, benefit, or other assistance, under title IV of the Higher Education Act of 1965 (20 U.S.C. 1070 et seq.), and may not participate in any program established, or assisted, under such title.

"(B) The Secretary of Education shall take all possible actions to carry out subparagraph (A).".

(b) The amendment made by subsection (a) shall take effect on October 1, 1982.

Mr. SOLOMON (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. KAZEN. Mr. Chairman, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KAZEN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is to what section of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair will state that the amendment goes to the existing title IX.

Mr. KAZEN. I thank the Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLOMON) is recognized for 5 minutes in support of his amendment.

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Chairman, this amendment prohibits young men who are in violation of the Draft Registration Act from receiving any financial assistance under title IV of the Higher Education Act.

The amendment which establishes an additional condition of eligibility for student financial assistance should more properly be a part of the law governing the relevant program, which is the Higher Education Assistance Act; however, because there is an immediate need for this legislation now—that means today—and because there will be no opportunity this year to amend the Higher Education Assistance Act, which is not due for reauthorization until next year, I felt that it was imperative, as did the other body, to offer this amendment to the defense authorization bill.

Incidentally, an identical amendment has already passed the other body by an overwhelming vote.

Mr. Chairman, there have been over 8 million young Americans in this country who have lived up to their obligations as American citizens, who have lived up to the law of the land which requires that all men between the ages of 18 and 19 register under the Draft Registration Act. I do not have to tell the Members that, as a parent who has a son who has registered for the draft, all of these 8 million young men who have registered sorely resent the other 7 percent of Americans who have either intentionally or unintentionally chosen not to register. Many of them have been misled by their peers. Many of them have been misled by college professors who tell them to "go ahead and disobey the law of the land, commit a felony and live with that for the rest of your life."

Mr. Chairman, I would not want that to happen to my children, and I certainly would not want that to happen to yours or any other young Americans who may be too young to understand just how important this issue is.

There are some 700,000 young men in this country who have, for the most part, unintentionally failed to register, and I intend not only to offer this amendment to this legislation, but as other legislation comes down the pike, such as the jobs training bill, such as home loans in various categories, I intend to offer the same amendment until every young man is deprived of any kind of Federal assistance unless he has obeyed the law and fulfilled his obligation as a citizen of the United States of America.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SOLOMON. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. NICHOLS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, the Armed Services Committee has not taken a position on this legislation, as its impact, to some degree, is in the educational area and it is beyond the committee's jurisdiction.

I want to say to the gentleman from New York that I personally support what he is trying to do. I believe very strongly that the minimum responsibility of good citizenship is to be able to defend this country in time of need. At the same time, I would say that the Secretary of Education and others have indicated some opposition to this.

I commend the gentleman. I support his amendment. I offer no objections.

Mr. WHITEHURST. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SOLOMON. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. WHITEHURST. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I also want to salute the gentleman for initiating this legislation. I think it sends a powerful message, and I think it will act as a veritable tonic on those who have not seen fit to register so far.

Mr. MITCHELL of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SOLOMON. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MITCHELL of New York. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I have no problem with this amendment either. As the gentleman from New York points out, it only affects 7 percent of the 100 percent eligible. Ninety-three percent of the young men have registered. I support the concept strongly. If young men do not think enough of their country to register to defend it, I do not see any reason at all why they should get benefits from that country.

Our side will be pleased to accept the amendment.

□ 1620

I commend the gentleman on his amendment. This side is pleased to accept it.

Mr. SOLOMON. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SOLOMON. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I was earlier a cosponsor of this amendment. I serve on the Personnel Subcommittee. From the position I sit in I certainly support the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLOMON) has expired.

(At the request of Mr. MONTGOMERY and by unanimous consent, Mr. SOLOMON was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. MONTGOMERY. If the gentleman will yield further, it is certainly not fair to that 8 million to let the other 500,000 have the same privileges. As the gentleman said, the 500,000, it is a felony, they have violated the law, and they are not entitled to these educational benefits.

I thought the Secretary of Education had come out in support of the gentleman's amendment. Am I correct on that?

Mr. SOLOMON. The gentleman is correct. The Secretary of Education is in support of the general concept of this amendment, as is the Department of Defense and the Selective Service Administration.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Well, in behalf of the 8 million who did register, we certainly ought to enforce the gentleman's amendment and we should pass it.

Mr. SOLOMON. I thank the gentleman.

I would just like to point out one thing. Back in February, on February 1, when President Reagan offered a 30-day grace period to many of these young men, hundreds of thousands of young men took advantage of that. And I just think this is going to be an additional encouragement.

● Mr. MOFFETT. Mr. Chairman, I am deeply troubled by the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLOMON). His amendment would eliminate from the guaranteed student loan program those students who have declined to register for the draft. While I respect the arguments he has offered in terms of dealing with students who have evaded registration, I oppose his amendment on several grounds.

First, this will do nothing to increase draft registration. As reported during the debate by the gentleman from California (Mr. GOLDWATER), the All-Volunteer Army is exceeding its recruitment targets. On the other hand, the draft registration effort has resulted in 800,000 students choosing not to register. Rather than trying to introduce a new series of penalties, I believe that we should continue trying to perfect the All-Volunteer Army and spend less time with this somewhat punitive Rube Goldberg device to promote registration.

Second, the Solomon amendment is blatantly discriminatory. Only low-income and middle-income students will be caught in this trap. If a student comes from a wealthy background, is capable of financing his education privately, the amendment does not punish him. However, if a student is poor or from a middle-income background, the full force of the Solomon amendment is applied. This dichotomy is reminiscent of the charges leveled against registration during the Vietnam war. It motivated me to oppose registration during the Carter administration. And, I believe that the Solomon amendment continues this unfortunate history of discrimination.

It seems to me that we need to think long and hard about the entire issue of registriation. The purpose of registration is to provide young men to the military; yet, the All-Volunteer Force appears to be accomplishing that. Registration is not working given the huge numbers of conscious evaders. Rather than piling on an additional penalty—one which is unworkable, one which is discriminatory, one which cannot even achieve its own purpose—I would recommend that the Armed Services Committee reexamine the entire issue of registration.●

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. SIMON AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. SOLOMON

Mr. SIMON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment as a substitute for the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SIMON as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. SOLOMON: At the end of the bill add the following new section:

ENFORCEMENT OF MILITARY SELECTIVE SERVICE ACT

SEC. 1010. (a) Section 12 of the Military Selective Service Act (50 U.S.C. App. 462) is amended by adding after subsection (e) the following new subsection:

"(f)(1) In order to receive any grant, loan, or work assistance under title IV of the Higher Education Act of 1965 (20 U.S.C. 1070 et seq.), a person who is required under section 3 to present himself for and submit to registration under such section shall—

"(A) submit to the institution of higher education which the person intends to attend, or is attending, proof that such person has submitted to such registration;

"(B) complete and submit the necessary forms for such registration at the time of filing application for such grant, loan, or work assistance; or

"(C) submit a statement that such person refuses to submit to such registration for religious or moral reasons.

"(2) For the purposes of paragraph (1), the Director, after consultation with the Secretary of Education, is authorized to prescribe methods for providing to, and collecting from, institutions of higher education the forms necessary for registration under section 3, and for collecting statements described in paragraph (1)(C) from such institutions.".

(b) The amendments made by subsection (a) of this section shall apply to loans, grants, or work assistance under title IV of the Higher Education Act for periods of instruction beginning on or after July 1, 1983.

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The gentleman from New York reserves a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. SIMON. First of all, Mr. Chairman, I would like to apologize to the gentleman from New York and to the members of the committee. We just got over here. I hope somebody on my staff is getting some additional copies of the amendment around right now. I do not like to be submitting amendments that others have not had a chance to take a look at.

The Secretary of Education sent me a copy of the letter that he sent about the legislation. It is frankly not a workable piece of legislation.

I voted for registration. I voted for it when the Carter administration was against it. I voted for it when the Carter administration was for it.

I happen to be one of those who believes we ought to have a draft. But I do not want to see something that is unmanageable and unworkable. And I think what we have in my amendment, the substitute amendment, is something that is workable.

It says when you register at a college or university, you, No. 1, show what you have in the way of evidence that you have registered, or if you do not have that evidence, then you can go ahead and register at that point, or No. 3, file a statement of conscientious objection. And that seems to me to solve the problem.

What do we do if we do not have my amendment? I recognize the political appeal of this thing. But let me tell my colleagues, that while there is political appeal, it is frought with difficulties, all kinds of difficulties.

If I can use a personal illustration, not only are there the difficulties that the Secretary of Education has pointed out, why this should not be enacted, there are very practical difficulties.

My son turned 18 on May 21. He registered. He has yet to receive anything from anyone indicating that he has registered. I asked him about it last night. In the meantime, he has registered for college.

Now, my son is not going to get any aid. But we have to be thinking of the sons of this Nation who do need aid. That is a very practical problem.

No. 2: Let us take your bank in your hometown in Florida, in Mississippi, in New York; they are reluctant right now to make student loans because we are making it more and more complicated. You complicate it further with this, and if you think bankers in this Nation are going to make student loans as widely as they now do, you are living in a dream world.

Talk about security, and that is what we have been talking about these days, what we need for the security of this Nation is to encourage education, not discourage education.

Just this morning I received a statement that last year Japan, with half our population, graduated 4,000 more engineers than did the United States.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMON. I would be pleased to yield to my colleague, the gentleman from New York.

Mr. STRATTON. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

It is my understanding that the gentleman is offering this proposal in the same vein that the gentleman from New York has offered his amendment, since it would require that anybody who is going to get this aid would have to be in compliance with the registration provision; is that not correct?

Mr. SIMON. That is correct. Only it does it in a workable fashion.

Mr. STRATTON. Well, since the gentleman has the same motive and the same purpose, I am surprised that in line 17 of this substitute he has the following words that the individual applying may be permitted to "submit a statement that such person refuses to submit to such registration for religious or moral reasons."

There is nothing in the existing law that gives anybody the right to ignore the Registration Act by reason of religious or moral purposes. And therefore the gentleman has given an out to individuals which is not at all sanctioned in law. That would make it impossible for the committee to accept the gentleman's substitute.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. SIMON) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. SIMON was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. SIMON. I recognize that that particular provision may be a matter of some controversy. I served in my country's Army, and I am proud to have served in my country's Army. But I think we have to recognize there are those who, for reasons of conscience, do not register.

□ 1630

I think we made a mistake when we wrote the registration law when we did not permit them to register the possibility of being a conscientious objector.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, we are simply providing a hole in this legislation that is big enough to drive a Mack truck through. Anybody can come in and say, "I have moral reservations against registering, but I want to collect all that is coming to me," even though his failure to register because of religious or moral reasons is not sanctioned in the law and he is in violation of the law.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from New York is designed to prevent anybody who is violating the registration law and according to the paper, the New York Times, this morning, we have 675,000 who are currently doing that, more than 20 times the number who now fill up all our Federal prisons, you are going to tell anybody that they can come in and violate the law. It would be absurd for us to sanction that in this House. Certainly, the gentleman would agree, I am sure.

Mr. SIMON. I certainly will not agree.

Let me just point out that what the gentleman talks about, a loophole you can drive a truck through, has been a loophole in World War II and in World War I. It has been a tradition of this country, a tradition that I happen to think we ought to stick with.

Now, the gentleman from New York makes the assumption that all those who have not registered have done so because they are conscientious objectors. I do not think there is any evidence to suggest that. A lot of them simply are avoiding it for one reason, thinking that it is easy to avoid; a lot of them probably do not even know about it.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMON. I would be pleased to yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. STRATTON. I did not suggest that all 675,000 were ducking out on grounds of religious or moral reasons. I simply pointed out that we have a very substantial number now who have not registered, and if we make it possible for them to avoid registering by putting in this legislation something that is not involved in the Registration Act, we are encouraging an increase in the total number of 675,000, that is all. And we certainly do not want to do that. The amendment of the gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLOMON) is trying to limit the violations.

POINT OF ORDER

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Chairman, I raise a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I offered and was printed in the RECORD was a nongermane amendment which had points of order raised against it.

Subsequently, I appeared before the Rules Committee and asked for those points of order to be waived, which they granted in the rule.

Now in the amendment that the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. SIMON) is offering, in section (c) he says to submit a statement that such person refuses to submit to such registration for religious and moral reasons. That is additional law which had nothing to do with the amendment and the waiver of points of order that were granted by the Rules Committee. I say that the gentleman's amendment is out of order because of that.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Illinois wish to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. SIMON. Yes, I do wish to be heard, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman, what we are talking about is how we can have something that is workable. My aim is the same as that of the gentleman from New York, but I think the gentleman from New York, with all due respect, has not dealt with this whole very complex problem of student loans and grants.

I think the amendment that I have is the only workable one. I think it is totally within the province of the amendment that the gentleman has.

I think the substitute amendment that I have offered is in order.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair is prepared to rule.

The Chair finds that both the amendment and the substitute amendment prescribe limitations on eligibility under title IV of the Higher Education Act of 1965, both in similar ways.

The question of the waiver granted to the Solomon amendment by the rule is not relevant to the point of order since the test of germaneness is whether the substitute amendment is germane to the amendment, not to the bill.

Therefore, the Chair rules that the amendment is in order and the gentleman is recognized.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. Chairman, I shall be very brief in closing.

We are all interested in the same thing. The question is, How do we do it in a workable way?

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. SIMON was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. SIMON. Mr. Chairman, I have fashioned something that the Department of Education can live with, that our colleges can live with, and yet encourages registration.

What the gentleman from New York has is an amendment that without this amendment is frankly going to lead to chaos on our campuses.

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMON. I would be pleased to yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Chairman, I would like to compliment the gentleman in the well. I think the amendment of the gentleman is a good amendment. I think it modifies the amendment of the gentleman from New York in some very constructive ways.

As a United Methodist Minister by vocation and a Congressman by accident, I know of many times when people have sought to have an opportunity to object to both draft and registration by virtue of conscience and by virture of concern.

I think the amendment of the gentlemen from Illinois is drafted in such a way that it at least allows for a correction of the mistake we may have made in the registration procedure and that is not giving someone that opportunity to express themselves; but more importantly, I think the amendment of the gentleman makes the amendment of the gentleman from New York workable and I think that is the important thing. I urge my colleagues to support it.

Mr. Chairman, I speak today against the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLOMON). Earlier this year, the administration decided to reinstate draft registration as a way to upgrade our defense preparedness. I was opposed to this policy, and I still feel that a mandatory draft is a poor way to provide the manpower needed to run our Armed Forces.

Today, however, I will not speak on the ends, but on the means. I feel strongly that the complexities and legal questions inherent in this amendment make it unworkable and extremely costly, and for this reason should be defeated.

There are several problems involved in the implementation of this legislation. Possibly the most serious question that it raises is whether possible due process violations would make it unconstitutional. Since requests for education assistance would be denied on the basis of Selective Service files, without first consulting the applicant, a due process problem arises which might be used to challenge any Education Department decision. Also, since there is currently no process for obtaining conscientious objector status prior to an actual draft, a student whose nonregistrant status might be judicially determined to be lawful, would be wrongfully, and perhaps illegally, denied assistance.

This problem is made worse by the fact that this amendment only allows for a 30-day appeal period. Since the Selective Service estimates that it takes the average registration 90 days to be processed, and since no permanent proof of registration is currently given to the individual when he registers, the amendment leaves a period of as long as 60 days beyond the appeal deadline when the registrant would be unable to prove his compliance with the law.

The second problem inherent in this amendment is the expense and administrative burden involved in its implementation. The Office of the General Council for Education Department has stated that to implement the proposals of this amendment—

> Some sort of elaborate tape system would be required. The Education Department does not now have tapes of Title IV recipients, and it is doubtful that they could be produced—certainly not on a timely basis.

There are currently no funds available for such a system, or for the personnel needed to set one up.

This amendment is also simply unworkable. Secretary of Education Bell, in a letter to OMB Director David Stockman concerning this amendment, maintains that—

> The regulatory and enforcement role that would be created by this provision for the Education Department is far beyond any of our current activities and would impose considerable burdens on institutions of higher learning and members of the public. We are deeply concerned that the burdens imposed would far outweigh the benefits gained.

The Secretary adds that—

> The means proposed * * * would require a level of unnecessary Federal intrusion and administrative complexity and burden which we roundly oppose.

Finally, this amendment is simply unnecessary. There are already severe penalties available to punish those who disobey the law, if we believe that this is desirable. Currently, the statutes provide for up to 5 years imprisonment and as much as a $10,000 fine. I seriously question whether additional penalties will be successful in getting significantly more men to register since a great many of these individuals have not registered because of their understandable objections to war.

I also question the premise that punishment should be used in order to induce young men to obey the law. This amendment has the obvious primary objective of increasing the number of men registered for the draft. However, it also has a secondary, and more subtle, objective, which is to punish those individuals who do not register. The social implications of this secondary objective are great. When 7 percent of the members of a certain population group refuse to obey a law, even under risk of severe punishment, is it not possible that there is something wrong with the law? I suggest that if what we really want to achieve is the full registration of these young men, then we should make it easier for them to register without compromising their consciences. The development of some type of alternative service program as well as the establishment of channels by which an individual could be classified as a conscientious objector before a draft, I believe, would be much more effective in eliminating nonregistration, and would do so in a much more civilized way then by punishing those who refuse to compromise their beliefs.

The Selective Service estimates that less than 7 percent of the men required to register have failed to do so. Since a large number of these nonregistrants do not receive title IV assistance, this legislation would only punish a very few individuals. I must agree with Secretary Bell that the cost, questionable legality, and administrative burden involved in the implementation of this amendment far outweigh the benefits to be gained. Also, I feel deeply that the use of such penalties as those proposed in the amendment in order to increase compliance, sets a poor precedent in a society which prides itself on individual rights. For these reasons, I stand strongly opposed to the amendment.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMON. I am pleased to yield to my colleague, the gentleman from California.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding and wish to commend him for his amendment. I think it makes the Solomon amendment perhaps acceptable.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the Solomon amendment. Although at first glance such an amendment seems attractive and well intentioned, I believe there are a number of serious problems with it. Not only is it highly discriminatory in nature and would require significant expenditures of time and money, but it is entirely unnecessary. Instead of creating new laws, we should be enforcing our current ones. We already have a law on the books for punishing those who fail to register for the draft: 5 years in prison, a $10,000 fine, or both.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment is highly discriminatory. Since only males are required to register for the draft, and since needy students are the recipients of student aid assistance, it punishes our country's needy, male students. We are already in the midst of sharply curtailing student aid funds for these people. What is the intended punishment for those who do not need or require student aid assistance or who do not go on to college after graduating from high school?

The implementation of Mr. SOLOMON's amendment would also require significant expenditures of time and money on the part of the Department of Education, which has neither to spare. Approximately 1.4 million 18- to 24-year-old, male, student aid recipients would have to be checked over, inevitably causing serious delays in the processing of financial aid awards.

I am not urging my fellow colleagues to oppose registration for the draft, even though I am strongly opposed to the idea. I am simply asking you to oppose an amendment which is unnecessary, which discriminates, and which would be a regulatory nightmare. I hope you will join with me in opposing the Solomon amendment.

Mr. BADHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMON. I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from California, and then to my colleague, the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. BADHAM. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

To my knowledge, I do not think there has ever been in this country a religious opposition to registering for the draft or registering for social security or registering for anything else.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

(At the request of Mr. BADHAM, and by unanimous consent, Mr. SIMON was allowed to proceed for 4 additional minutes.)

Mr. BADHAM. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, is it not true that in this country everybody has traditionally registered and only at the time of induction one has applied for conscientious objector status; is that not correct?

Mr. SIMON. That is not my understanding, but I stand to be corrected by those who know this better.

My understanding is that when you registered for the draft in the past, you could indicate at that time conscientious objector status, but I may be incorrect on that.

Mr. BADHAM. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, then I think the gentleman has made my argument, simply that when a person registers for the draft, he says whatever else he is, but he registers and he is given conscientious objector status then.

Mr. SIMON. The point is that there are those—and I hope we do not get hung up on this relatively minor point on the whole thing—there are those whom we have traditionally permitted to voice conscientious objection and that is what I permit here.

I frankly think that is a healthy tradition this country has had and should continue.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMON. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. STRATTON. I just wanted to clarify a point here, a legal point, that there is some confusion about. Under the law, the question of conscientious objection comes in at the point of classification. The only thing that we are dealing with here is registration; so the question of conscientious objection is not applicable at that time.

Mr. SIMON. Well, this is really the question asked by the gentleman from California (Mr. BADHAM), whether during World War II, for example, when you registered, whether you indicated at that time of registration that you were a conscientious objector. My understanding is that you did, but I may be incorrect.

□ 1640

Mr. STRATTON. I think the gentleman's understanding is incorrect. It was at the point of classification that conscientious objection came up because classification would determine if you were deferred for flat feet or for conscientious objection, or for some other reason and so on and so forth, but not at the time of registration.

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMON. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. EDGAR. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, there are two different precedents being set. In past days, in the 1960's and early 1970's, registration and classification took place at the same time. So people had a right to register. I can remember registering as a ministerial student and being classified at exactly the same time that I went to register for the status of being 4–D.

I think it is important for us at this point to recognize that we do not have that in existing law with registration, but there are many people out there who still have the conscientious concern, and that is the point that the gentleman from Illinois is raising.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMON. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. STRATTON. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, in World War II registration and classification may have come almost at the same time. But the point here is that the only legislation that we have on the books today is registration. And registration does not involve classification.

Some people, in fact I did it one time myself, have suggested that if we would classify people as well we would soon fill up the gaps in the National Guard and the Reserve Forces. But nobody has been anxious to move toward classification and it is only in connection with classification that conscientious objection would be applicable.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SIMON. I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from California.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. SIMON) has expired.

(On request of Mr. GOLDWATER and by unanimous consent, Mr. SIMON was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. GOLDWATER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I want to raise a point that may seem to be of minor concern here, but which illustrates the critical issue of discrimination.

The gentleman in the well used his son as an example. His son just registered for the draft and that he was not in needing of financial assistance.

If the gentleman's son does not register he will be penalized once; that is, he will go to jail or whatever the penalty might be for failure to register. But another man's son who is perhaps poor or in need of financial assistance has two strikes against him. He not only stands the chance of going to jail, but he also stands the chance of not receiving financial assistance for education, which is just as harsh a penalty in terms of the boys' future.

What the gentleman is trying to do may be valid, but it does discriminate between the less fortunate and those who are wealthy.

I think this would apply not only to the gentleman's amendment, but also to the amendment offered by Mr. SOLOMON.

Mr. SIMON. The gentleman from California is correct that there is some discrimination in that respect in both of our amendments. I guess where the gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLOMON) and I would disagree with the gentleman is that what we are trying to do to make the registration law a little more workable, a little more enforceable, and I think what I have presented is something the Department of Education can live with, the colleges and universities can live with.

I think what my colleague from New York has presented is something that is fine in theory but is going to cause a first-class mess.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, oftentimes we resort to expediency at the expense of more reasoned legislating. In this case we are guilty of discrimination against an already underpriviledged part of our population. When we write a law that is imperfect and unenforceable; often instead of going back to the books and rewriting that law we begin using band-aids. As now, we reach out to find other means of enforcing that law.

I am strongly reminded of the instance some years ago when Congress decided to permit the Federal Government to use social security numbers to seek out and pursue individuals in default of court-ordered alimony or child care payments.

These are all provisions of the original intent of the Social Security Act, and take this country closer and closer to the Big Brother state.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. SIMON) has again expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. SIMON was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. SIMON. Mr. Chairman, I would simply say to my colleague from California that if my amendment is defeated, I shall join him in voting against the Solomon amendment.

Mr. MITCHELL of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMON. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MITCHELL of New York. Under the present law everyone must register. There are no exceptions, no discriminations. All a person has to do is sign his name on a postcard.

In the event of a national emergency, he can apply for exemption to whatever classification he is considered for. So it is not necessary that he do anything now except send the postcard in.

Mr. Chairman, I feel this provision of the gentleman's amendment guts the amendment of the gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLOMON), and this side cannot accept it.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SIMON. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HUNTER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I think the fatal flaw in the gentleman's amendment is that this amendment would confer on some people the right to unilaterally classify themselves as conscientious objectors.

It is my understanding that conscientious objection is a classification that is made after some deliberation by an administrative body of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. SIMON) has again expired.

(On request of Mr. HUNTER and by unanimous consent, Mr. SIMON was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, I would like to ask the gentleman if it is his understanding that conscientious objection is not simply a unilateral classification that a young draft candidate confers on himself, but it is a status that the U.S. Government places upon that person after they have, in fact, examined the background and the substance from which that person would offer conscientious objection status? Is that right?

Mr. SIMON. The gentleman is partially correct. That classification was granted by the Government and I want to continue that. But what we have now is a situation where we have a registration and classification at two totally different periods.

As I indicated before, I happen to favor a draft. I favor a draft where we give people a choice of the military or a variety of other places where they can serve their country for 1 year.

But right now we are in a situation where we have only one registration and not classification at the same time. What I would like to do is to say that we ought to abide by the traditions of this country and recognize those who disagree with me, who disagree with the gentleman, who for reasons of conscience do not want to register. But we are not classifying them in that category.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. SIMON. I would be pleased to yield further to the gentleman.

Mr. HUNTER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I think what the gentleman is doing, if we in fact allow a young person to unilaterally put a conscientious objection status on his registration classification, the gentleman is going to render the law—and I understand there is a criminal law now against not registering—I think the gentleman is going to render that law unduly vague because the student is going to come up and say, "Why should I be punished criminally when I look at the statutes to see if I could go to college and get a Federal grant and find out all I had to do was say I was morally opposed to it and I would be released from that obligation."

Mr. SIMON. Let me say to the gentleman, then, if that is your opinion, and you want something that is workable, then toss in an amendment to knock those three lines out of my amendment. I will vote against it, but it does not do anyone any good in this country to have something that is unworkable and that is what we are being asked by the Solomon amendment.

I say do not take PAUL SIMON's word for it; take the word of the Secretary of Education.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMON. I would be pleased to yield to my distinguished colleague from Mississippi.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I certainly appreciate his yielding and he knows the great respect I have for him.

I am concerned that, in effect, this amendment might sanction breaking of the law, as the gentleman from California pointed out, and that is my concern about the amendment, that the gentleman would be encouraging these young men to break the law.

Certainly those three lines should be taken out of this amendment. If not, it is not workable; it is doing just the opposite of what you want it to do.

Mr. SIMON. My belief, I will say to my colleague, for whom I have great respect, and who has even been kind enough to come to southern Illinois, is that the courts are going to rule that anyone who is in fact a conscientious objector, who for religious reasons does not want to register, is going to have that right.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. SIMON) has again expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. SIMON was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. SIMON. We have never done anything other than that in this Nation. What my amendment does is to recognize the reality, and I would hope we move in the direction of adopting it.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentleman's answer, but I do not believe that really solves the problem. The gentleman admitted he rushed over here and entered the amendment. Had it been prepared earlier?

□ 1650

Mr. SIMON. It was hastily done. I concede that to my colleague from Mississippi.

Mr. BEARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMON. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. BEARD. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding. As one of the coauthors of this amendment, the Solomon amendment, I must say that I do not understand the gentleman's amendment to this amendment inasmuch as for an individual to be classified a conscientious objector, he has to register. Is that not part of the process?

Mr. SIMON. That has traditionally been part of the process because one is classified at the same time one registers.

Mr. BEARD. But there is no classification process at this time because there is no draft.

Mr. SIMON. That is precisely correct.

Mr. BEARD. Then I do not understand why the Solomon-Beard amendment needs to be amended—so why this amendment needs to be amended when it is really a moot point. The individual registers. He is only classified or presents himself for classification as a conscientious objector or whatever when there is a draft in effect, but there is no draft.

We are asking these people to sign their names and submit them, and that is it. I think it is a sad commentary if, all we ask in return for whatever aid or tuition aid or whatever, is just to sign one's name to part of a classification aspect when there is a draft.

POINT OF ORDER

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois is unconstitutional. On line 17, as we have just read, he provides that if the individual cannot supply the college with a statement that he has registered, he can then submit a statement that "such perason refuses to submit to such registration for religious or moral reasons." But that way, he is incriminating himself in a crime for having refused to register, and under article V of the Constitution, incrimination is unconstitutional.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from New York that the Chair does not rule on questions of constitutionality. The House votes on that question on the merits.

Mr. STRATTON. I think the House might want to rule.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the Simon amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I think we are missing one of the important things that the gentleman from Illinois is talking about. I think it is terribly important. I think it is not just the gentleman from Illinois, it is also the Secretary of Education who is talking about it, and I will bet that a lot of us have talked about it out in our districts as we are trying to get reelected. That is, the burden of policing this thing.

Do we really want to deputize America's bankers to enforce the selective service law? Do we really want to deputize all the different schools to enforce the selective service laws? Let me propose a further amendment. I think every student ought to be registered to vote. Do we want to say that before they get student aid we want to make sure that they are registered to vote? Do we want to say that anybody who is violating the EPA laws cannot get SBA loans? I mean, we can turn this thing into a big, gigantic police state, and I think that is the problem.

So, what we are really talking about here is that issue, and that issue alone. I think the gentleman from Illinois has offered an excellent amendment. I want to remind people too of some of our forefathers, remind them that Thomas Jefferson, who started the wonderful University of Virginia we are all so proud of, and also started a revolutionary war, but he also did not serve. I think all of us are happy that he was educated.

I think there is room for a lot of people in this country. That is what has made it so great, that people have done different things.

There is another innuendo floating around that I hear; that is, people who are conscientious objectors do not want to serve. Wrong. They want to serve, but they serve in a different way, and they object to war.

I want to tell the Members that one of the things I did when I was in college was spend a lot of weekends working in some of the intensive mental health wards at the psychiatric hospitals in Minnesota, and there were many conscientious objectors working in there that really put their lives on the line, and they worked there very, very hard. It was not that they were asking not to do anything for the country. They were asking to serve in another manner.

So, let us not be so quick to label; let us not be so quick to deputize America's bankers and schools and everything else to start enforcing our laws. I think this amendment makes sense. If the amendment does not pass, then I think we really should require voter registration for student aid. That is terribly important, but we are really not here as the Nation's parents, and we are really not here to be the Nation's policemen. We are here as a country of people who come from all different religions.

I also had the honor of having lunch a week ago with some members of a religious group in my district who do oppose registration. They oppose registration because they cannot classify themselves right now as conscientious objectors. They feel very strongly about that. They are a very small group. America is not going to fall because of them. They said, "We will be willing to do double time of service in mental health institutions or anything else. We just find this objectionable."

If we deny them and their children student aid, we are really shortchanging ourselves. As everyone says, if you think education is expensive, try the alternative, and we are really shortchanging ourselves. The best investment this Nation can make is in education and in its youth. They are our most important natural resources.

Maybe if we get them into school we can educate them a little more in America's history so that they will want to serve. Maybe we can turn them around. I think that happens to a lot of people. I think we ought to keep all those things clear.

I urge passage and support of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I yield to the gentleman from illinois.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. Chairman, I would hope that my colleagues would keep in mind not simply that one small provision in my amendment which would abide by our traditions, which some seem to want to cast aside, but go to the heart of where we are under the Solomon amendment if it is adopted as is. I simply quote from a letter from Secretary Bell. He says:

> The regulatory and enforcement role that would be created by the provision for the Education Department is far beyond any of our current activities and would impose considerable burdens on institutions of higher education and members of the public.

I think what we want, and I am sure what the gentleman from New York wants, is something that is workable. What he has is something that is totally unworkable.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentlewoman from Colorado has expired.

(At the request of Mr. EDGAR and by unanimous consent, Mrs. SCHROEDER was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I would be delighted to yield.

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Chairman, I would like to commend the gentlewoman for her comments about the Simon amendment and in opposition to the Solomon amendment. The Secretary of Education goes on to say in that same letter that the means proposed in the Solomon amendment would require a level of unnecessary Federal intrusion and administrative complexity and burden, "Which we roundly oppose."

This is not a liberal group or a moderate group; it is the administration itself being concerned about the excess burden that this amendment places on the Federal Government. So, I would hope that we can support the Simon amendment.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I thank the gentleman for his comments. I think another question that we have to point out as parents, because I know the gentleman from Pennsylvania is a parent and I am also, we are talking about people registering when they are 18 years old—still young. They come out of a home, and who knows how they were raised? They could be very subject to all sorts of environmental and peer group pressures at that age. We as a nation may be doing all the wrong things if we push them the wrong way and deny them further education because of a choice they have made when they have maybe not been able to hear all the different alternatives because of a more protected home environment, but the fact that they are minors, I think that is important.

I urge that we support the Simon amendment.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. HARTNETT TO THE AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. SOLOMON

Mr. HARTNETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HARTNETT to the amendment offered by Mr. SOLOMON: Strike out all after "SEC." in the matter proposed to be inserted by the amendment and insert in lieu thereof the following:

1010. (a) Section 12 of the Military Selective Service Act (50 U.S.C. App. 462) is amended by adding after subsection (e) the following new subsection:

"(f)(1) In order to receive any grant, loan, or work assistance under title IV of the Higher Education Act of 1965 (20 U.S.C. 1070 et seq.), a person who is required under section 3 to present himself for and submit to registration under such section shall file with the institution of higher education which the person intends to attend, or is attending, a statement of compliance with section 3 and regulations issued thereunder.

"(2) The Secretary of Education, in agreement with the Director, shall prescribe methods for verifying such statements of compliance filed pursuant to paragraph (1). Such methods may include requiring institutions of higher education to provide a list to the Secretary of Education or to the Director of persons who have submitted such statements of compliance.".

(b) The amendments made by subsection (a) of this section shall apply to loans, grants, or work assistance under title IV of the Higher Education Act for periods of instruction beginning on or after July 1, 1983.

Mr. HARTNETT (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARTNETT. Mr. Chairman, I thank the Chair for his courtesy. I would just like to say, Mr. Chairman, that this amendment to the Solomon amendment merely requires the Secretary of Education to furnish to the Selective Service System the names of those young men who have applied for Government grants in aid to attend colleges and universities.

□ 1700

It is then up to the Selective Service System to check these names against those of the young men over 18 who have registered. The enforcement of it is up to the Selective Service. That is where the enforcement of it should be, Mr. Chairman.

The front page of the New York Times, the newspaper that prints only news that is fit to read, said this morning, Mr. Chairman, in headlines "That a lag in draft registration raises doubt that the law can even be enforced."

I would hope that the lady from Colorado (Mrs. SCHROEDER), would understand and realize that what she proposes, and what has been proposed by the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. SIMON) is nothing but a Government deferment for college students at Government expense.

Mr. PEYSER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARTNETT. I do not yield at this time.

Mr. Chairman, I would say to my good friend, the gentleman from California (Mr. DELLUMS) that he must remember, as do I, the inequities of the last draft, when the burden of war was borne by our Nation's middle class, our Nation's minorities, and our Nation's poor, who, through no fault of their own, possessed neither the acumen, the finances, nor the mental capacity to attend colleges and universities at their own expense or at the expense of the Government.

Now, what the gentlewoman from Colorado (Mrs. SCHROEDER) and the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. SIMON) want to do is to grant someone the right to violate a law of this Nation through religious reasons. And I would see no difference in why I would have to register for the social security system if it was based upon my religious beliefs that I did not want to do that.

The lady and the gentleman are giving to citizens of this country the right to violate a law, the law of this land, whatever it says, that all young men over the age of 18 shall register, because by this amendment they grant them an exemption from that. They are granting them a right to violate the law of this land on the grounds of religious preference.

What I am saying, Mr. Chairman, is that this amendment I have offered to the Solomon amendment, places the onus where it belongs, on the backs of the Selective Service System, to enforce this amendment which has been offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLOMON). It does not, as has been proposed by the gentleman from Illinois and supported by the lady from Colorado, grant Government deferments to college students at the expense of the Federal Government.

I cannot imagine in my wildest imaginations the gentleman from California talking about discrimination or double discrimination when you are discriminating against those 8½ million, or whatever number of young men who have already registered. We talk about discrimination because they were not applying for Government loans. They had to register. Because a man was asking this country to pay his way through college or loan him money to do so, he would be exempt through some sort of discrimination from registering for the draft is absolutely the most absurd argument I have ever heard on the floor of this House of Representatives.

Mr. PEYSER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARTNETT. Not at this time.

Mr. Chairman, that the Selective Service System has found that the 675,000 young men who have failed to register is a serious problem. It may make the law unworkable, and we must remember that we only have a registration on the books now to help this country in time of war or in a time when we must implement a system of draft. Without that, we would be perilously at danger to go to war at any time with even a Third World nation, and without this Solomon amendment, we are not going to be able to get at a large number of those 675,000 men who have failed to register.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARTNETT. I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding, and I rise in strong support of both the Solomon amendment and the Hartnett amendment.

Let me clear up some error. We have had a letter written from Secretary Bell about how complicated this is going to be to be implemented. I have had calls from my own university. The amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. HARTNETT) correctly addresses that.

Let me tell the Members how simple that can be. We did some checking. All the guaranteed student loans go through two computers, one here in the District of Columbia and one in Princeton. Every student who applies, before that loan is approved, goes through that computer. What the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. HARTNETT) is suggesting is that we simply take that computer list, marry it with the list already over in Selective Service, and when there is not a match, they kick it back to the university and the university is notified the student is not registered and, therefore, is not qualified. That is not an unwieldy, burdensome operation.

Mr. Chairman, I strongly support the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. HARTNETT. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. DUNN).

Mr. BEARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARTNETT. I am happy to yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. BEARD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to compliment the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. HARTNETT) on his amendment, and I rise in total support of it.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. HARTNETT) has expired.

(On the request of Mr. SOLOMON, and by unanimous consent, Mr. HARTNETT was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARTNETT. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, let me say that the amendment that I had offered which was allowed by the Rules Committee was the Hayakawa amendment that was offered in the Senate and passed unanimously. If I had had the opportunity today, I would be offering not that amendment but the substitute amendment that the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. HARTNETT) is offering, because it is the amendment that was given to us today by Secretary Bell with his full approval, with the full approval of the Selective Service Administration, and with the full approval of the Office of OMB and the Reagan administration.

Let me read to the Members from this letter, which is dated yesterday afternoon:

> On behalf of the Secretary, I would like to clarify a recent misrepresentation in the press of the Secretary's position on receipt of student financial assistance and compliance with certain requirements under Federal law.

Then later they go on to say:

> To achieve that goal, the Department has recommended a substitute amendment to change the requirements for student eligibility under title IV by requiring students to certify compliance with section 3 prior to receiving such assistance.

Now, what we are doing is removing all of the objections that were there before on the Hayakawa amendment. We have corrected it. It is almost identical to the Simon amendment, and it answers all of the questions that the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. SIMON), the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. EDGAR), and others have had, except the conscientious objector question.

So, Mr. Chairman, I would urge all of the Members to defeat the Simon amendment, to pass the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. HARTNETT), and then finally to pass my amendment.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARTNETT. I am happy to yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, let me say that I commend the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. HARTNETT) on his amendment. I have talked with the members of the committee on our side. We are prepared to accept the amendment on our side of the aisle.

Mr. BEARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARTNETT. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. BEARD. Mr. Chairman, I concur with the leadership of the majority. We have discussed this with members of the committee on the minority side, and we accept the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. PEYSER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARTNETT. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PEYSER. Mr. Chairman, I would like an explanation again because I may have misunderstood the gentleman's amendment.

Did the gentleman say in his amendment that the Department of Education should provide a list that can be cross-checked? Would the gentleman restate that?

Mr. HARTNETT. What it does is that it requires the Department of Education to furnish to the Selective Service System the names of those young men who have applied for student loans or grants. They merely supply the Selective Service with those names. It is up to the Selective Service System then to check whether or not those men have registered.

Mr. PEYSER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further to me, I think the gentleman may or may not be aware of this, but the only list that the Department of Education has is on the Pell grant recipients, and that list is not filed until a year after the grants are filed. In other words, there is no list this year that the Department of Education could give to the Selective Service, nor could they next year. They could give them a list a year later.

Now, on the guranteed student loans that the gentleman from Michigan talked about, I am sure the gentleman was well intentioned in his remarks, but the Princeton list has no names on it whatsoever. There are no names on it. To get the tracking of that list would be a major operation because all that list shows is the numbers and amounts of loans.

All I am asking the gentleman—and I believe in his sincerity in offering the amendment—is this: How in the world would anybody carry it out when the guaranteed students loans list has no names on it and the Pell grant list is 1 year old? Every list we get is 1 year old.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARTNETT. I am happy to yield to my colleague, the gentleman from New York.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentleman's yielding.

I think the gentleman may have misspoken when he replied to the gentleman from New York (Mr. PEYSER) that the Secretary would furnish the lists.

□ 1710

Actually, in section No. 2 of the gentleman from North Carolina's amendment it provides at line 15: "Such methods may include requiring institutions of higher education to provide a list to the Secretary of Education or the Director of persons who have submitted such statements of compliance."

So it will be the job of the individual institution to submit those lists and they would of course be up to date, not 1 year old, as the gentleman from New York (Mr. PEYSER) suggests.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. HARTNETT) has expired.

(By unanimous consent Mr. HARTNETT was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. HARTNETT. I would say to the gentleman from New York (Mr. PEYSER), you see, Mr. PEYSER, with all of our great ingenuity you see how this problem was solved easily and with the stroke of a pen and a piece of paper. So I really think we can handle this situation.

I think it is only fair.

The Chinese laundry operator had an old saying, "No tickee, no laundry." I think the American people fully expect their young men, if they are going to receive financial assistance from this Government, to at least abide by the laws of this land.

The law of this land says that a young man is to register. It does not say he has to be drafted. It does not say he cannot be a conscientious objector.

The law of this land says he must register and if he is unwilling to subject himself to the laws of these United States, I do not think we ought to be willing to subject him to some of our grants and aid.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I would have appreciated my distinguished colleague yielding to me since the gentleman chose to make a very personal reference.

Mr. HARTNETT. Will the gentleman from California yield?

Mr. DELLUMS. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. HARTNETT. I apologize to my good friend from California. I did not realize you were requesting that I yield some time, but if you will yield to me I will be happy to answer any questions in the time you have.

Mr. DELLUMS. I appreciate that because I do consider my distinguished colleague a friend.

I would simply like to respond to you in the following manner. I tried diligently to follow the logic of the gentleman's argument.

I would simply say first, Mr. Chairman, that I stood in opposition to the passage of the legislation that created the draft registration on the grounds that this was just another step in our saber rattling and our missile rattling. It was an unnecessary piece of legislation.

But that point of view did not prevail. The majority of my colleagues saw fit to go forward with this legislation.

My distinguished colleague zeroed in on the issue of discrimination. One of the factors we did discuss during that debate was the fact that it is extemely difficult to fashion registration or a draft that does not engage in some level of discrimination, either at the level of race or at the level of class.

I do not think the amendment on the floor adequately addresses that. I think my distinguished colleague from southern California spoke to that.

But let me, before I amplify, let me first say you quoted the New York Times that said a substantial number of people have not registered. That is, they have not complied with the law.

You and I here can pass laws. Those laws will be adhered to by the American people if the American people respect those laws.

Maybe the fact that we have a substantial number of people not registering is because there are millions of American people here who feel that this law is absurd and useless.

There are many fathers and mothers who feel that their children would be cannonfodder in some Third World adventurism, as our involvement in Korea, our involvement in Vietnam, and our potential involvement in El Salvador.

People do not want their children used in that fashion.

I think we have to look at whether we were a reasonable group of people when we, indeed, enacted the law.

Finally to the question of discrimination, if we want to remove discrimination then let us treat all citizens before the law equally. If any citizen in this country, black, brown, red, yellow, white, rich, poor, middle class, working class, if they choose to violate the law we have an apparatus that addresses that.

To go beyond that, to create at least the dichotomy of those persons in need of Federal programs and those persons not in need of Federal programs, you have created a dichotomy that speaks to discrimination.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I would simply say to my colleague that you and I agree that we should fight valiantly against any form of discrimination in this country at whatever level it comes, race, sex, age, geography, class, or whatever. But you do not do that by creating this kind of a situation.

Every American citizen, young person who goes to college, does not have to qualify for a loan. So what have we done? We have discriminated again to the benefit of those persons who have the economic wherewithal and political clout to move beyond it.

But middle-class individuals, working-class individuals, working-poor individuals, and poor people in this country will be the only ones that will be affected by this kind of legislation.

I do not believe in that sort of double jeopardy. If people violate the law, we have an apparatus. To go beyond that, to harm people at that level, does not remove the discrimination, I would suggest to my colleague. It only creates discrimination.

I will yield in a minute to my colleague and hopefully we will engage in some enlightened colloquy.

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from California yield to me?

Mr. DELLUMS. I yield to the gentleman from New York first.

Mr. WEISS. I would like to address a question through him to the distinguished gentleman from New York who offered the original amendment, Mr. SOLOMON.

Our distinguished friend read a portion of a letter from the Secretary of Education. He then suggested that that letter in essence says that the Secretary of Education has suggested that we adopt the language that the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. HARTNETT) has offered in his amendment.

As I heard him read it, and I may have misheard, as I heard him read the Secretary's letter, what the Secretary was saying was that he would support certification by the student that he complied with the registration requirements.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from California (Mr. DELLUMS) has expired.

(At the request of Mr. WEISS and by unanimous consent Mr. DELLUMS was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. DELLUMS. I continue to yield to my colleague from New York (Mr. WEISS).

Mr. WEISS. If in fact that is what the Secretary's letter says then I suggest that the gentleman misspoke because the gentleman from South Carolina is not at all suggesting self-certification by the student. He is suggesting again this exchange of information between the Secretary of Education and the Director of the Selective Service System.

Would the gentleman from California (Mr. DELLUMS) yield time to the gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLOMON) to explain as to whether in fact my hearing was correct?

Mr. SOLOMON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DELLUMS. I yield to my distinguished colleague and friend from New York.

Mr. SOLOMON. I would say to my colleague from New York that I have just sent back to have copies made of the Secretary's letter.

The Secretary's letter went on to state exactly the wording in the Hartnett substitute, identical. There has not been one change made.

We have taken the language that the Secretary of Education has recommended, put it in the amendment, and that is what we are voting on here today.

I will furnish the gentleman with a copy of the letter in just 30 seconds.

Mr. WEISS. I would appreciate that because it is very hard to address an issue without having the copy in front of us.

I thank the gentleman from California for yielding.

If he would allow me 1 more minute, last year when this particularly onerous provision of allowing an exchange of information, addresses, and social security numbers between various agencies was put into this piece of legislation some of us fought it. We were told at that time that the only reason the exception was being made to allow this kind of an exchange of information was to allow tracking of individuals' addresses and social security numbers.

Never was it suggested that that exchange of information was then going to lead to the next step, which is being sought today, which is to deny young Americans who might be punished through the regular process of law for refusing to register, also being denied the right to accept grants or loans or whatever else they might be entitled to to pursue higher education.

It seems to me that some of my conservative colleagues on this floor ought really to be concerned about how fast "big brother" is coming.

Those who seem least concerned about that are usually the ones who are most concerned in the abstract about conserving people's rights.

I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. DELLUMS. I appreciate the comment my colleague makes.

I think the gentleman and the gentlewoman from Colorado spoke eloquently and pointedly to the potential of a police state mentality with the thrust of this kind of an amendment.

My second question rhetorically would be: Where is the crisis?

□ 1720

Is our Nation falling because a number of our colleagues, our young people, have not registered?

I will yield to my colleague, remembering this: My retort to your argument about discrimination is: First, I agree with you; and second, that you do not challenge discrimination by what we are doing here. We are creating a dichotomy of the haves and the havenots in this kind of approach. I realize that in this election year people want to make a very powerful political statement; but to crush our children as a way of making a statement is something that I am opposed to, and I do not think that we gain points trying to frighten our young people by making them believe that in some way they have got to register and have a draft for some long-term war with the Soviet Union. That, in my estimation, is absurd.

Mr. HARTNETT. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague, the gentleman from California, yield?

Mr. DELLUMS. I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. HARTNETT. I thank my colleague for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I would say to the gentleman from New York that this Member really has no more concern for, nor do I think we should even consider, the Secretary of Education's thinking on this, any more than the American people should consider the thinking of Secretary Watt on foreign policy in regard to Israel. We tell the Secretary of Education what he has got to do, that he has got to help us. So I am not any more concerned with his thoughts and opinions on this than I am with Secretary Watt's with regard to Israel.

I would say to my colleague from California that he has certainly been an eloquent spokesman for those countless thousands of nameless people who may feel as the gentleman does and who, maybe through their nonsupport of our registration laws, have voluntarily failed to register. But at least, my colleague, the registration law has no discrimination in it whatsoever. If you are a male and you are 18 years of age, you register, regardless of whether you are a quadriplegic.

Mr. DELLUMS. There is sex discrimination.

Mr. HARTNETT. I said "a male." Whether you are a quadriplegic, whether you are mentally incapable, whether you are blind, whether you cannot speak, whether you cannot hear—there is no discrimination among males 18 years of age and over, be it race, education, or any level.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from California (Mr. DELLUMS) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. DELLUMS was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, I continue to yield to my colleague, the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. HARTNETT).

Mr. HARTNETT. I thank the gentleman for yielding further, and I will only take another moment.

The gentleman from Illinois and the gentlewoman from Colorado are already starting to put exemptions and to put little outs in the registration law now by saying, "However, if you are religiously inclined not to register, that is one." And if we open the registration laws to one little loophole, than we will have another—if you are the son of a lawyer or the son of a Congressman or a son of a draft board member. The gentleman may disagree with the registration law, and I certainly respect his right to do that. But I think the gentleman and I agree that there should not be any discrimination involved.

What we are saying is that if a man is not educated enough to even go to college, or too poor to go to college, he has to register. But we are letting a man that we are paying to go to college get by without registering and looking the other way while he does it. I know that my friend, the gentleman from California, does not want to do that.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, I would reclaim my time and ask my colleague to respond to these questions: Why do we not rely upon the regular processes of law? Why do we have to engage in this double jeopardy situation?

I think my colleague would agree that if the law has no discrimination in it, why not let the processes go forward? We are creating a dichotomy here. For those persons who do not need Federal largesse in order to go to school, there is no application here. But for those who do, there is an application. So you have created a dichotomy. You first say, "There is no discrimination," but now, by the application of these amendments, you have created discrimination. My colleague from California spoke eloquently to that.

Mr. HARTNETT. If the gentleman will yield, I am not saying by this amendment nor is my colleague from New York saying, that that individual has to register. We are just saying that if he does not want to register, we do not have to pay for him to go to school. I am not requiring him to register. I am just saying that the law is there. If the Justice Department wants to enforce it, that is fine. But he does not have to register to get that loan. He just does not get the loan, that is what it amounts to. I am not requiring him to register. I am just saying that he does not get a loan if he does not. That is all I am saying.

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DELLUMS. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WEISS. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Chairman, harking back now to the exchange that we had with the gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLOMON)—and I take note of the fact that the gentleman from South Carolina has already stated for the record that, as far as he is concerned, he does not care what the Secretary of Education thinks about a matter that is directly within the jurisdiction of the Secretary of Education—the letter from the U.S. Department of Education, Anne Graham, Assistant Secretary, says as follows:

To achieve that goal—

And the goal is to comply with the requirements of the Selective Service System—the Department has recommended a substitute amendment to change the requirements for student eligibility under Title IV by requiring students to certify compliance with section 3 prior to receiving such assistance.

Now, that is not what the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina requires, and I just do not understand how the gentleman from New York can say that those two versions are the same. They are not the same.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DELLUMS. I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from California.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from South Carolina is missing the point. If you do not register, you cannot get a student loan. That is obvious. However, beyond this, the corollary is that if you do not register and you do not need financial assistance, you can still go to school. The poor are hurt and the wealthy are not. And if that is not discrimination, I do not know what is.

The Washington Post and the New York Times pointed out that to date 700,000 students and other young people have not registered with the Selective Service System.

How many of them are in need of Federal student loans and want to go to school? How many will be denied the needed assistance because they did not register? And how many of that 700,000 can personally afford a college education?

There is a difference, and there is distinct discrimination. The gentleman is using expediency to enforce a law that is not a valid or good law. If a law is unenforceable, then we should rewrite the law. I would suggest to the gentleman that, even given the adoption of this proposed amendment, you are not going to proceed in forcing this 700,000 to register for the draft. It just seems to me that we ought to go back to the drawing board.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from California (Mr. DELLUMS) has again expired.

(Upon request of Mr. PEYSER and by unanimous consent, Mr. DELLUMS was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, I continue to yield to my colleague, the gentleman from California (Mr. GOLDWATER) to conclude his comments.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. Chairman, inherent in these amendments is the admission that our action of several years ago in reinstating the draft was not perfect, even though perhaps well intended. Instead of using Band-Aid solutions and reaching out to violate individual privacy, we ought to try to make this imperfect law better. We can do this by repealing the draft registration program.

Mr. Chairman, it is a fact that the Military Pay and Benefits Act of 1981 sparked a marked improvement in the number and quality of men and women serving in our military. In fact recruitment consistently exceeds the quotas set. And the All-Volunteer Force that we created many years ago is beginning to work because we have made it work through reasoned pay raises and making it attractive again to serve in uniform. That is good law.

It would seem to me that this amendment misses the point and, in fact, we create discrimination by applying this kind of enforcement procedure.

□ 1730

Mr. PEYSER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, prior to yielding I would simply like to point out, No. 1, my distinguished colleague from California has pointed up the discriminatory aspects of this proposition most eloquently. The proponents of this approach say they oppose discrimination. Yet we are setting up that discriminatory dichotomy.

The proponents of this legislation suggest that they challenge exemptions. Yet what we have done here is to give an exemption. If you are wealthy enough, if you are powerful enough, you do not have to register and you can continue to go to school. But if you are not, then you get crushed by the weight of our bureaucracy, our statutes. And I think we ought to think long and hard before we engage in making laws that create that kind of discrimination.

Mr. Chairman, I would yield to my colleague, the gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLOMON) so we can continue this colloquy.

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Chairman, I would just like to point out that the gentleman from California (Mr. GOLDWATER) who spoke before, I would just like to say I have heard that same old song ever since I got here from that gentleman from California. He uses it against the draft, against the Draft Registration Act, and now against this.

The truth of the matter is he is just opposed to the draft period. So I think we know where that argument is coming from.

As far as the gentleman from California (Mr. DELLUMS) is concerned, he says they are discriminating against the wealthy, and maybe the poor. I do not know. But let me say this; that the majority of the wealthy families in America in years past have been taking advantage of the college loan programs. They have been borrowing it whether they needed it or not and investing it in money market securities at 16 and 17 and 18 percent at the taxpayers' expense in this country.

Now, maybe we are discriminating against the poor. And if we are, I guarantee I am going to come back with legislation on this floor tomorrow and the next day and the next day and every day of this session with amendments that will prohibit any funds from being used for the Job Training Act if they are not registered, for any unemployment compensation insurance if they are not registered, and for any kind of taxpayers' money if they are not registered.

Mr. DELLUMS. I would simply respond by saying, No. 1, I do not think it is necessary to impugn the motives or the integrity or the credibility of a person making an argument on this floor. I think that if an argument is sound, one can make that argument every single day.

The fact that it is repeated many times does not detract from the argument. This Member has talked about peace on the floor of this Congress every single day that I have had an opportunity and I do not think that is a discredited idea. It may not be perceived so in the majority of this body, but outside of this body people believe it.

I do not think we need to challenge people simply because they oppose legislation. If the gentleman opposed the legislation, so be it. We ought to argue on the basis of the merits of the argument as it is presented at the historic time it is being presented on the floor.

Mr. SOLOMON. I certainly would not impugn anyone. I was merely pointing out the similarity of his arguments.

Mr. PEYSER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DELLUMS. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PEYSER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I think that it is very important at this time that we get back to a very basic thing dealing with this amendment that was just offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

First, the facts are there are no lists. Now, the Secretary of Education in sending this letter back to the gentleman from New York clearly states, and it is not from the Secretary, it is from the Assistant Secretary, it clearly states:

> No conclusions have been reached as to the most appropriate or feasible methods of implementing this amendment.

And I can tell my colleagues there is a good reason why no conclusions have been reached.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from California (Mr. DELLUMS) has expired.

(At the request of Mr. PEYSER and by unanimous consent, Mr. DELLUMS was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. PEYSER. If the gentleman will yield further, there are good reasons.

First, the Secretary has no list to submit to comply to this. Second, the guaranteed student loan lists do not exist in any one central place. And if the gentleman is suggesting that each institution is going to file and check names all over this country among thousands of colleges, we are creating a ridiculous program and one that would not work.

But let us get away from that, because that amendment, I am convinced, is going to be defeated anyway, because just by the weight of it you could not enforce it.

The next thing we really come down to is the Solomon amendment. And I think, the Members really ought to think carefully on this. And maybe the gentleman from New York would like to add to his amendment another statement that says parents who file for the parent loan program will have to produce evidence that they filed an income tax, which is also the law of the land.

Now, I do know if the gentleman agrees with that. But if you are going to make students do this, why not make parents say that they must file their income tax to get a parent loan, because this I assure my colleagues will affect thousands of thousands of parents who are making these loans. And yet you are not requiring that.

I think that that is a very necessary amendment to perfect the gentleman's amendment, even though I think the whole thing is ridiculous. Because we are creating a role here that not only eliminates women, of course, but what about 17-year-olds who apply to college and who apply for the loans? They would have to do nothing even though they would become eligible for the draft when they entered school.

So these are all inconsistencies, all inaccuracies, and believe me, they are all attempts not to rectify the draft but to attack financial aid for students. That is what we are really dealing with, is a program and another effort by those who voted to cut student aid programs to get at students. And that is the only way this vote will be interpreted.

The amendments, all of them—the Simon amendment I will certainly vote for. But I think we ought to eliminate this whole thing because it really makes no sense.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to get out of this very complicated situation.

Mr. Chairman, I would simply conclude by indicating that the major thrust of my argument is that the proponents of the amendments before us are arguing in favor of a discriminatory proposition. They discriminate in favor of the wealthy. And we have done that on too many occasions here.

The full weight of these proposals comes down on the backs, for the most part, of people least able to handle the shock of the Government retreating from addressing their human misery.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Objection is heard.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois (Mr. PRICE) moves that all debate on the Solomon amendment and all amendments thereto, including the substitute, close in 20 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Members standing at the time the motion was agreed to will be recognized for 45 seconds each.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRES

Mr. SIMON. Mr. Chairman, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. Chairman, what will be the procedure in voting? Will we vote on the Harnett amendment first, or my amendment first, or what will be the procedure?

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair will advise the gentleman that the order of voting will be on the Hartnett amendment to the Solomon amendment, then the Simon substitute, and then on the Solomon amendment.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Chairman, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment also which would be an amendment to the Simon amendment.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman that the amendment could be offered at the time the gentleman seeks time.

Mr. BENNETT. The only reason I was making the inquiry is that the Chair did not list my name.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair will state the amendment is not yet pending. When the gentleman is recognized under his time, he can offer his amendment.

□ 1740

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Chairman, the inquiry I have, and I do not know if it is parliamentary or not, is: Was my name likewise on the list, because I came in about the time the Chair was calling them off.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair does not have the gentleman's name on the list.

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my name be included on the list.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Florida (Mr. BENNETT).

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. BENNETT TO THE AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. SIMON AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. SOLOMON

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment offered as a substitute for the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BENNETT to the amendment offered by Mr. SIMON as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. SOLOMON: In section 12(f)(1) of the Military Selective Service Act (as proposed to be added by the amendment)—

(2) strike out "; or" at the end of subparagraph (B) (page 1, line 16) and insert in lieu thereof a period; and

(3) strike out subparagraph (C) (page 1, lines 17-19).

In section 12(f)(2) of the Military Selective Service Act (as proposed to be added by the amendment), strike out ", and for collecting statements described in paragraph (1)(C) from such institutions" (page 2, lines 4 through 6).

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE CHAIRMAN PRO TEMPORE

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair will first state the sequence of the amendments when the Committee gets to the vote.

The first vote will be on the Hartnett amendment to the Solomon amendment.

The second vote will be on the Bennett amendment to the Simon substitute.

Following that will be a vote on the Simon substitute.

Finally, there will be a vote on the Solomon amendment.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is really an amendment of the gentleman from California (Mr. HUNTER), as well as myself, because we jointly introduced it.

The purpose is just to be simplistic in the approach to this matter by striking section (c), which has to do with religious and moral reasons. There is no reason for that to be in this law because the registration law exists already and by it they already state at registration whether they have a moral or religious reason to be in opposition to military service; so this amendment just simplifies the Simon amendment by taking that section out of the Simon proposal.

I think this makes very simple handling of the whole matter and I move that it be approved. It makes unnecessary the Hartnett amendment.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California (Mr. HUNTER).

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this amendment for the reason that what we are really talking about is registration. We are not talking about the draft itself. We are asking people to come forth and be identified and there has never been any provision in American law allowing people to escape from registering, or from identifying themselves for any governmental process on moral or religious bases.

I think that to some degree we have been misled in the debate and that we have been talking about two different subjects. Here we are talking simply about registration. We are talking about coming forward, being identified, and later on making your pitch or your case to be relieved on grounds of conscientious objection or mental or physical unfitness.

Striking these three lines, I think, would take away this defect in the Simon amendment.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. GUNDERSON).

Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I, too, rise in support of this amendment. I had a similar amendment awaiting, but the members of the committee have priority.

I think the gentleman from Illinois needs to be commended for his amendment, because the gentleman's substitute is the only workable thing in front of us. I was going to make that point in general debate on my amendment. However, with the present amendments before us we should eliminate at least all or part of section (c), because with "the moral reasons" in there, that effectively eliminates any enforcement or strength in the substitute amendment.

This amendment of the gentleman from Florida (Mr. BENNETT) clearly will correct the substitute amendment of the gentleman from Illinois and make it a very workable document.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentlewoman from Tennessee (Mrs. BOUQUARD).

Mrs. BOUQUARD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Solomon amendment. I think we are really missing the basic point of this, that with the freedoms and the blessings that we enjoy in this country also goes a little bit of responsibility. I hope our young people can appreciate this.

My son is 18. He recently registered and I think I have as much affection for my son as any mother; but he also has been taught and acknowledges the fact that when you live in this great country that the price of freedom is not free and that there are responsibilities in living here.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California (Mr. GOLDWATER).

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to all the pending amendments.

There is discrimination inherent in each amendment and as the gentleman from New York (Mr. PEYSER) pointed out, there are no lists available or created under the student loan programs that would make these amendments viable. These provisions are clearly unworkable and ought to be rejected and as a minimum, we ought to take the original draft of registration act back to the committee and rewrite it so that it is enforceable. Or, better yet, we should scrap it all together.

We are making criminals out of 700,000 young people who failed to register. Part of them we are denying access to the educational process. That, in my book, is discrimination and we ought to look hard and long at what we are doing today.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. MONTGOMERY).

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Solomon and the Hartnett amendments.

I would like to say that it is really not fair that those 8 million who have registered, to let those 500,000 that have not been registered, let them be under the laws now to be eligible for student loans.

The Solomon amendment, as I understand it, of these 500,000, they are not eligible until they register and he has even included that if they do register then they would be eligible for these funds and for these grants and loans.

I would say that these 500,000 who have not registered are in violation of the law. They should pay the penalties and they certainly should not be given any grants for not registering.

So I hope we will adopt the Solomon amendment along with the Hartnett amendment.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. PATTERSON yielded his time to Mr. SIMON).

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California (Mr. BADHAM).

Mr. BADHAM. Mr. Chairman, the obfuscatory debate on this issue has taken us way off the track of the main issue.

The question is, should young men who refuse to register according to the law of the land be given special benefits by the people of the United States, who asked them to register.

The answer should be and will be with the adoption of this amendment a resounding no, they should not. It is as simple as that.

I ask for an affirmative vote on the amendment, which would clear this situation.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York (Mr. WEISS).

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Chairman, if some of our colleagues believe that we have not heard enough from our constituents about the terrible thing we did in cutting back on student assistance programs last year, just pass the Solomon or the Hartnett amendment and you will hear from them. You are going to hear from your college presidents, your students, and your parents.

If we pass either of these amendments there will be members coming back begging that the matter be reconsidered and be repealed. It will make the student assistance programs absolutely unworkable.

If that is what this House wants, lots of luck. It is a terrible mistake which our constituents will not soon let us forget.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. DUNN).

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York (Mr. PEYSER) and I have some disagreement. I say that the lists are available and that the program is not unworkable, especially with the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. HARTNETT). That consideration aside, we discriminate against no one other than 700,000 people who have already chosen to break the law.

□ 1750

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York (Mr. PEYSER).

Mr. PEYSER. Mr. Chairman, in one sense perhaps I should go along with this awful amendment because I think this is the kind of action that could really end up killing this useless registration in this country. This is going to strike at the heart of a very basic principle in this country, which is the education of our young people. Those who deny it and try to hide behind a patriotic flurry are not going to fool anybody.

The truth is, we are going to hurt students all over the country, those registered and those who are not, we are going to hurt universities, all of whom are blameless, and I think all of these amendments should be defeated. Another reason to vote against these amendments is the cost. To administrate this action will cost millions of dollars at a time that we should not be voting to increase the deficit and increase interest rates.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentlewoman from Maryland (Mrs. BYRON).

Mrs. BYRON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Solomon and Hartnett amendments.

(By unanimous consent, Mrs. BYRON yielded the balance of her time to Mr. STRATTON.)

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. COURTER).

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Chairman, I believe there is confusion and blurring here between a "benefit" or a "privilege" on the one hand, and a "constitutional right" or "simple right" on the other. I see, very frankly, nothing wrong with placing contingencies or requirements on benefits and privileges such as aid to students to make sure they follow the law of the land, as is the case with the Solomon amendment as amended.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. MAVROULES).

Mr. MAVROULES. Mr. Chairman, I stand in opposition to all three amendments. I personally feel we are opening up here a can of worms that one day will come back and haunt all of us, and if we truly want to address this issue, we should take it back to committee, have full and open hearings on it, and come back with a recommendation.

So I am in opposition to all three amendments here this afternoon.

(By unanimous consent, Mrs. SCHROEDER yielded her time to Mr. SIMON.)

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. SIMON).

Mr. SIMON. Mr. Chairman and my colleagues in the House. We are in a somewhat complicated situation and I would like to make clear what I favor.

I am going to vote for the Hartnett amendment, not that I favor it ultimately but it is an improvement on the Solomon amendment. It makes the Solomon amendment at least a little bit workable. So I am going to vote for that.

Then I am personally going to vote against the Bennett amendment. But whether his amendment carries or does not carry, then I hope this body will vote for my amendment, which is a workable amendment.

What the Hartnett does now is, it asks the university to compile lists, and those lists ultimately are going to be forwarded.

What you have to understand is that there are about 15 different national programs, plus a great many campus-based programs, that are federally subsidized. So we are talking about a very, very complex thing. Even if the Hartnett amendment applies and they decide someone should be denied assistance, that will not happen until about 6 or 9 months after the person has the assistance.

My amendment puts it on the front end where it has to be, where it should be, to make it a workable amendment.

I hope my colleagues, after adopting the Hartnett amendment, and whatever your action on the amendment to my amendment by the gentleman from Florida—and I personally think we ought to continue to recognize conscientious objectors—but whatever your action, I hope my colleagues will vote for something that is workable.

One of the things that we do very, very well in this body sometimes is come out here and do work that we really ought to be doing in committee on programs that we know very, very little about. I am afraid this is one of those times.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York (Mr. STRATTON) to close debate.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, this is not a discriminatory bill; it is a method of trying to prevent violation of the law and also to encourage young people, as the gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLOMAN) said, to comply with the law. It may not catch all of the violators, but it is certainly going to prevent those who are violating the law from taking taxpayers' money.

Mr. SIMON said he opposed the Solomon amendment originally because it was too cumbersome and would not work. Mr. HARTNETT has come up with an amendment directly from the Secretary of Education who indicates that it will work. Even the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. SIMON) now says he is going to support that.

Since it will work, since it is workable, since it does the job, we do not need the Simon amendment with the unquestionably unconstitutional provision with respect to conscientious objection.

I urge overwhelming support of the Hartnett amendment and the defeat of the Simon amendment.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair, before putting the question, will restate the sequence of votes on the various amendments.

The first vote will be on the Hartnett amendment to the Solomon amendment.

The second vote will be on the Bennett amendment to the Simon substitute.

The third vote will be on the Simon substitute.

The fourth vote will be on the Solomon amendment.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. HARTNETT) to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLOMON).

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida (Mr. BENNETT) to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. SIMON) as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLOMON), as amended.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SIMON) there were—ayes 50; noes 13.

So the amendment to the amendment offered as a substitute for the amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. SIMON), as amended, as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLOMON), as amended.

The question was taken; and the Chairman pro tempore. announced that the noes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. SIMON. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 161, noes 241, not voting 32, as follows:

□ 1830

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. Smith of Pennsylvania for, with Mr. Moffett against.

Mr. MAZZOLI changed his vote from "aye" to "no."

So the amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. BROOKS

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BROOKS: At the end of the bill add the following new section:

INSPECTOR GENERAL ACT AMENDMENTS

SEC. 1011. (a)(1) Section 2(1) of the Inspector General Act of 1978 is amended by inserting "the Department of Defense," immediately before "the Department of Education,".

(2) Section 11(1) of such Act is amended by inserting "Defense," immediately before "Education,".

(3) Section 11(2) of such Act is amended by inserting "Defense (including the Departments of the Army, Navy, and Air Force)," immediately before "Education,".

(b) Section 9(a)(1) of such Act is amended by redesignating subparagraphs (C) through (M) as subparagraphs (D) through (N), respectively, and by inserting after subparagraph (B) the following new paragraph:

"(C) of the Department of Defense, the offices of the department referred to as the 'Defense Contract Audit Agency', the 'Defense Audit Service', and the 'Office of Inspector General, Defense Logistics Agency', and that portion of the office referred to as the 'Defense Investigative Service' which has responsibility for the investigation of alleged criminal violations and program abuse;".

(c) Section 8 of such Act is amended to read as follows:

"SPECIAL PROVISIONS

"SEC. 8. (a) In addition to meeting the requirements of the first sentence of section 3(a) of this Act, no individual who is a member of the Armed Forces of the United States (whether in an active or reserve status) may be appointed to be the Inspector General of the Department of Defense.

"(b) The provisions of section 1385 of title 18, United States Code, shall not apply to audits and investigations conducted by, under the direction of, or at the request of the Inspector General of the Department of Defense to carry out the purposes of this Act.".

(d) Section 5 of such Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(e)(1) Nothing in this section shall be construed to authorize the public disclosure by any individual of any information which is—

"(A) specifically prohibited from disclosure by any other provision of law; or

"(B) specifically required by Executive order to be kept secret in the interest of national defense or the conduct of foreign affairs.

"(2) Nothing in this subsection or in any other provision of this Act shall be construed to authorize or permit the withholding of information from the Congress, or from any committee or subcommittee thereof.".

(e) Section 5315 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"Inspector General, Department of Defense.".

Mr. BROOKS (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, this amendment would establish a statutory Office of Inspector General in the Department of Defense. There should not be any question of the need for such an office. Defense spending over the next 5 years has been projected at $1.65 trillion dollars, yet that department still does not have a statutorily established, independent Inspector General.

Last year, the House overwhelmingly—by a vote of 334 to 65—passed a bill (H.R. 2098) which would establish a statutory Office of Inspector General in the Department of Defense and three other agencies. That bill is now pending in the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee.

In the meantime, however, the Senate has taken action on an Inspector General for the Defense Department. By a vote of 94 to 0, the Senate adopted an amendment to the Defense Authorization Act for 1983 establishing an Office of Inspector General in the Department of Defense.

As it now stands, the House Defense authorization bill does not have any provision for an Inspector General. If my amendment is not adopted, we will be in a peculiar position when the House and Senate go to conference on the Defense Authorization Act: Both Houses will have passed Inspector General provisions, but the conferees will have before them only the Senate-passed version, and not the House-passed version.

The language of our amendment will correct this anomaly. It is the same language as the House passed last year in H.R. 2098 with extraneous language relating to other agencies deleted. The passage of this amendment will permit the House-Senate conferees on the Defense authorization bill to have before them both the House-passed version and the Senate-passed version of an Office of Inspector General for the Department of Defense.

We went over all the arguments in favor of having an Inspector General's Office in the Defense Department when we passed last year's bill, and the House agreed with them, overwhelmingly. The IG's in the other Departments have proven to be highly effective in uncovering waste and fraud and recovering millions of dollars for the U.S. Treasury. Congressman L. H. FOUNTAIN, retiring from the North Carolina delegation after 30 years of illustrious service, has been the leading proponent of this measure.

With its expenditures now running about a billion dollars a day, the Defense Department has a vast potential for waste and fraud and it is vitally important that a strong, statutory Office of Inspector General be established there. They love to spend money over in the Pentagon but they hate to let anybody know how they are spending it. Congress and the taxpayers can no longer allow them to get away with such a free-wheeling, unaccountable approach, and I urge adoption of my amendment.

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROOKS. I yield to my friend, the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment to H.R. 6030 as offered by the gentleman from Texas (Mr. BROOKS).

As the ranking Republican on the Government Operations Committee, which is responsible for all of the Inspector General legislation, I want to point out that we are offering nothing new when we offer this amendment. The language of this amendment, is the same as that in H.R. 2098, which was approved by this House last year by a margin of 334 to 65.

Although the House spoke very clearly and very forcefully when we considered H.R. 2098 last year, we are now in the unfortunate position of having to accept a much weaker Senate version unless we act to reaffirm our position by approving this amendment.

Although the House and Senate versions are similar in many respects, there are fundamental differences between the two that go right to the heart of the matter. Pointing out the greatest single difference between the two is easy. Our amendment provides for an independent Inspector General. Theirs does not. Like the 16 existing Inspectors General in departments and agencies all over this town, the Defense IG in our amendment would be under the "general supervision" of the Secretary. Under the provisions of the language from the Senate, the IG at Defense would be under the "authority, direction, and control" of the Secretary.

There is the single most glaring and important difference between the two versions. One calls for "general supervision" by the Secretary, who like 16 others in this town would provide an indirect and cautious guiding hand to the IG. The other calls for "authority, direction, and control" by the Secretary.

Taking the independence issue a step further, the bill from the other body has language allowing the Secretary to shut down any IG investigation he wants to shut down. Our amendment does not have that kind of open invitation to abuse. That point alone makes our bill superior to the other bill. An IG under the "authority, direction, and control" of the Secretary would be tantamount to having no IG at all.

I realize, of course, that there are those who question the need for an independent Inspector General at the Department of Defense. To those I would simply point out that DOD is spending more than $250 billion a year—and that is not counting military construction money. Over the next 5 years, we are earmarking $1.65 trillion for use at DOD.

Whether we like it or not, whether some of us believe it or not, some of that $1.65 trillion will be wasted at Defense. Some of it will be wasted right in front of the eyes of the 18,000 auditors, inspectors, and investigators who work there and who are under the "authority, direction, and control" of the Secretary.

It is difficult, of course, to get a precise reading on just how much is wasted at Defense during any given year. The Republican Study Committee sifted through volumes of GAO reports 2 years ago and very rapidly identified 45 items totaling $16.2 billion in unnecessary Federal expenditures resulting from waste, fraud, abuse, or mismanagement at DOD.

My friend and colleague from North Carolina (Mr. FOUNTAIN) took a look at that Republican Study Committee report at the time it was issued and quickly concluded that not one of the 45 items totaling $16.2 billion describing fraud, waste, or mismanagement in the Department of Defense could be attributed to DOD's 18,000 auditors, investigators, and inspectors. Those figures, he correctly pointed out, came straight out of GAO reports, As serious as those numbers were, however, they did not touch the depth of the problem at Defense.

A year and a half ago, U.S. News & World Report told the American people that the House Appropriations Committee had come up with 46 different ways in which—and I am now quoting—"the armed services appear to be frittering away billions of taxpayer dollars." Sooner or later the American people are going to be asking what Congress is doing to stop the frittering away of billions of taxpayer dollars at Defense.

I do not want to tell them that we created a statutory Inspector General at Defense but that we made sure all his teeth were removed before we let him loose at the Pentagon.

If you are still not convinced that there is a real need for an independent IG at Defense, let me tell you about a recent hearing of the Government Operations Committee. As many of you may know, the Defense Department often relies on the Defense Science Board to arrive at sound, objective judgments on highly complex, technical, and scientific matters. The General Accounting Office testimony in that hearing suggested that the Science Board was anything but objective.

First, the GAO presented evidence that the Board was stacked with members who had a bias in favor of the proposal. They told us, for example, that 7 of the 11 Board members had financial stakes in the outcome and that parties with differing positions were not given sufficient opportunity to present their views. This possible manipulation of private sector advisors—whose integrity is so vital to the formulation of objective decisions—has no place in a professional organization.

This is the kind of abuse that requires the attention of an independent Inspector General, not one who can be controlled or manipluated by the Department.

So, if you ask how serious is the problem of waste at DOD, I can tell you to ask the Republican Study Committee; ask the General Accounting Office; ask the Appropriations Committee. If you ask the Government Operations Committee, Chairman BROOKS can tell you or Mr. FOUNTAIN can tell you, or I can tell you. We can all entertain you with descriptions of the kinds of waste we have found over the years and are finding still today.

Regardless of the figures you use, however, anyone who has ever studied DOD can tell you that there are massive amounts of fraud and waste there. We have always known that there is waste there, but we have always managed to avoid doing something about it.

We can begin to do something about it when we give DOD an independent, statutory Inspector General, the kind we are seeking with this amendment.

Now, I agree that we must rebuild and shore up our Nation's defenses. I am not suggesting that we should thwart DOD's commitment to a strong and effective national defense.

I am suggesting that, at a time when we are cutting back on many worthwhile Federal programs, at a time when we are facing a $100 billion deficit, and at a time when we are practically choking at the prospect of raising taxes, we must have an aggressive, independent Inspector General rooting out fraud and waste at Defense.

Finally, I should point out that the language of H.R. 2098, the language we are considering again in the amendment before us, is, while firm, eminently fair to the Defense Department. We went to extraordinary pains to tailor our bill to meet the unique needs and requirements of DOD. We are convinced that DOD is not the same kind of department as, say, the Department of Labor or the Department of the Interior. We know that there are sensitive areas at Defense, areas that must be protected and must be preserved.

Knowing that Defense is unique is what took us so long to get around to figuring out what kind of IG we need there. We started on the other departments, some of you may recall, back in 1976 and we have progressed to the point today where we now have Inspectors General operating in 16 major agencies and departments. Last year, after lengthy and sometimes frustrating negotiations with Defense, we arrived at what we believe are the proper guidelines for an IG at Defense.

To prevent problems with the military chain of command, for example, our amendment requires that the IG be a civilian. We added some strong provisions to protect classified information, which was one of the areas of major concern to DOD. Reporting requirements in our amendment are tailored to protect against the disclosure of information that might threaten national security, which was another of DOD's major concerns.

What we did not do in our amendment—and what we must not do if we are to have an effective Inspector General at Defense—is to put the IG under the authority, direction, and control of the Secretary. The American people want DOD to do something about the fraud and waste that exist there. The American people deserve an independent Inspector General at Defense, one who—like Caesar's wife—is beyond reproach. If we allow the Defense IG to be under the authority, direction, and control of the Secretary, you can bet that is precisely what we will get—one who is under the thumb of the Secretary.

In closing, Mr. Chairman, I want to urge my colleagues to support this amendment. We have come to far and are so close to giving the American people what they want and deserve that we must not stop now.

Vote for the amendment and send a clear message to the conferees on this bill. The time has come for an independent Inspector General at the Department of Defense.

□ 1840

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROOKS. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from New York.

Mr. STRATTON. I would like to offer an amendment on behalf of the committee as an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas (Mr. BROOKS). If the gentleman would yield for that purpose, it would expedite matters.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, I yield for that purpose.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. STRATTON TO THE AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. BROOKS

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STRATTON to the amendment offered by Mr. BROOKS: In the matter proposed (in subsection (b) of the section to be added by the amendment) to be inserted in section 9(a)(1) of the Inspector General Act of 1978, strike out "the 'Defense Contract Audit Agency',".

Insert at the end of the section proposed to be added by the amendment the following new subsection:

(f) Within one year after the date of enactment of this section, the Inspector General of the Department of Defense (appointed pursuant to the amendments made by this section) shall submit to the Secretary of Defense and to the Congress a recommendation on whether the office of the Department of Defense referred to as the "Defense Contract Audit Agency" should be transferred to the Office of Inspector General of such Department (as established by such amendments).

Mr. STRATTON (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment to the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, this amendment would exclude the Defense Contract Audit Agency from Mr. BROOKS' amendment that would create an independent Inspector General in the Department of Defense.

The Defense Contract Audit Agency, known as DCAA, was created by the Department of Defense on June 9, 1965, to provide a single, consolidated contract audit function in DOD. The purpose of a contract auditor is to advise and assist the contracting officer in evaluating contractors' proposals prior to negotiations; to validate a contractor's expenses during performance; to evaluate claims submitted to the Government by contractors; and to perform a final audit to determine the final price of a contract.

A DCAA auditor is critical to the Government pricing team that supports the contracting officer in his negotiations with a contractor. In the course of his evaluation, the auditor becomes intimately familiar with a contractor's operation. In fact, major defense contractors have DCAA auditors permanently located in their facilities.

The DCAA auditor does not perform internal audits to review the performance of the contracting officer or negotiators. In performing the operatinal functions to support the DOD acquisition process through external audits of private contracts, the DCAA auditor works closely with the contracting officer and negotiators. Since the Inspector General organizations include internal audit functions that review the people with whom the DCAA auditor works so closely, the effect of having the DCAA responsible to the Inspector General would be that the contracting officer and his support team would be reluctant to work freely with DCAA representatives. Furthermore, the separation of the contract audit function was one of the reasons for establishing DCAA as an independent agency in the Department of Defense.

It should also be noted, Mr. Chairman, that the Inspector General Act of 1978, Public Law 95-452, at section 9(a)(2) states, "There shall not be transferred to any Inspector General * * * program operating responsibilities." Accordingly, it is clear that the functions of the Inspector General were not intended to, and should not, include the type of audits performed by the DCAA—contract cost audits for the purpose of assisting in the negotiations, administration, and settlement of Government contracts. It is critical that the procurement process not be disrupted and that we provide our contracting officers with as much support as possible as they negotiate how our own tax dollars are spent.

If the gentleman from Texas would accept this amendment, I can assure him that his amendment to establish an independent Inspector General would have the committee's support on the floor and in the conference.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRATTON. Yes. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, my amendment, which is identical to the language in the bill the House passed last year, does transfer the Defense Contract Audit Agency to the Office of the Inspector General. The Defense Contract Audit Agency is a vital part of the Defense Department's auditing effort. The functions of the DCAA are very compatible with the other functions that would be assigned to the Inspector General.

However, I am aware that the contract managers and other program people in the Department of Defense use the DCAA auditors in their contract negotiations and at other times. I would agree that a transfer of the DCAA should not be undertaken without a clear understanding of what effect it will have on all of their activities, including their work in preaward audits and postaward audits. It may be that they can serve the needs of the contract officers and of the IG without being transferred to the Office of Inspector General.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from New York proposes a deletion of the transfer at this time but couples that with a mandate that the Inspector General make a study over the next year of the desirability of transferring DCAA. While I am persuaded that a transfer of DCAA to the IG would not be inappropriate even now, I will agree to the gentleman's amendment with the understanding that we will all study the issue very carefully and very seriously over the next year and make a decision at that time. I appreciate the support of the gentleman from New York, a ranking member of the House Armed Services Committee, on the other aspects of my amendment.

Mr. DICKS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Brooks amendment, as amended, as a cosponsor of the original bill.

● Mr. FOUNTAIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment.

At a time when most Federal programs are being sharply reduced, the Nation's taxpayers are being called upon to provide billions of dollars in increased funding for the Department of Defense.

I support increased funding within responsible limits. Unfortunately, a shockingly high percentage of the funds made available to the Pentagon is being expended in a manner which does little or nothing to strengthen our national defense.

For example, in August 1980, the House Republican Study Committee, headed by Congressman JOHN ROUSSELOT, issued a special report on "Waste, Fraud, and Mismanagement in the Federal Government." The report identified 45 items totaling $16.2 billion which it characterized as "unnecessary Federal expenditures resulting from waste, fraud, abuse or mismanagement" by the Department of Defense.

In its April 27, 1981, issue, U.S. News & World Report gave a detailed description of what it described as "massive waste, fraud and mismanagement that send billions of taxpayer dollars down the military drain every year."

The General Accounting Office has issued—and continues to issue—an endless procession of reports detailing further examples of misuse and squandering of public funds by the Defense Department.

We must have a strong national defense. From a personal standpoint, since I have consistently supported defense authorizations and appropriations, I guess I am a hawk on the subject. But, we simply cannot afford to continue to tolerate such a high level of fraud, waste, extravagance, and mismanagement.

It is imperative that a strong, independent Inspector General be established by statute at the Department of Defense. Let me emphasize the word "independent."

Edwin L. Harper, then Deputy Director of the Office of Management and Budget, stated—speaking for the administration—that "We believe the key to the strength of legislatively mandated Inspectors General is their enhanced ability to operate objectively and independently."

A witness for the Defense Department, on the other hand, told the committee that a statutory Inspector General for the Department should be subject to the authority, direction and control of the Secretary, so that the Secretary could prohibit the Inspector General from looking into matters which the Secretary did not want investigated.

The committee found DOD's argument unconvincing, and unanimously voted out a bill providing for an independent IG. The House approved that bill by an overwhelming margin of 335 to 64.

The House bill establishing an independent Inspector General for the Department of Defense has not been acted on by the Senate. However, in its consideration of the Defense Authorization Act, the Senate—by a very narrow margin—voted to establish a DOD Inspector General who would not be independent, but would be under the authority, direction, and control of the Secretary.

The House has already voted, 335 to 64, for an independent Inspector General for the Department of Defense. But the bill presently before the House does not contain such a provision. If this amendment is not approved, the conferees will have before them only the Senate language establishing a DOD Inspector General who is under the authority, direction, and control of the Secretary.

By approving this amendment, the House will be reaffirming its commitment to an independent Inspector General who can and will lead an effective fight against the fraud, waste, and mismanagement which is sabotaging our efforts to strengthen the Nation's defenses.

I urge your support of the amendment.●

● Mr. MOFFETT. Mr. Chairman, I want to commend my chairman, Representative BROOKS, for offering this amendment to create an Office of the Inspector General in the Department of Defense. This language is similar to that which passed the House on May 19, 1981, by a vote of 334 to 65.

No one debates the need for a strong defense. And, there is nothing in the Brooks amendment which would stand in the way of our preparedness. Rather, it would institutionalize a process in the Pentagon for weeding out waste. Instead of fighting these battles on the floor—which, I am afraid, is ultimately a political process and not one of substance—we would have a waste watcher working daily in the Pentagon. This makes sense.

The Office of Inspector General would have all the powers and duties granted those created under the 1978 Inspector General Act. Although the Inspector General would have no program responsibilities, it would conduct and supervise audits and investigations relating to programs and operations of the Department of Defense. The Office would also provide leadership, coordination, and recommend policies for activities to promote economy and efficiency in the administration of the Pentagon's programs.

Mr. Chairman, as you are aware, I am deeply opposed to the provisions of this bill extending funds for the B-1 bomber, the MX missile and the Pershing II. I am a supporter of the nuclear freeze; and, I believe our national interest would be served far better by passing that resolution than debating this expensive and unwise Defense Department authorization bill. I think it is unfortunate that we are not debating the freeze today.

But regardless of each Member's position on that paramount issue, there can be no disagreement over our primary need to weed waste out of the Pentagon budget. This amendment, to institutionalize a "junkyard dog" for the Defense Department, will bring us closer to the goal of a waste-free Pentagon budget. The vote on the Brooks amendment should be unanimous.

Let me conclude by congratulating Chairman BROOKS for his leadership role on this issue. Due to his work, there exist statutory Inspectors General in 12 major departments and agencies. Our friend JACK BROOKS has always recognized that the public will always support the wise expenditure of funds if there is assurance that programs are waste-free. While we may never agree about the legitimacy of many items in this bill, passage of the Brooks amendment will strike a blow against cost overruns and simple waste that have continued to undermine programs in the Defense Department.●

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. STRATTON) to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas (Mr. BROOKS).

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas (Mr. BROOKS), as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

● Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I would like to state my strong support for three "Buy America" amendments that will be offered to the Defense Department authorization bill. All three amendments share a common principle: That the U.S. Government, supported by the tax dollars of American citizens and businesses, should purchase the goods it uses from American businesses and American labor. Additionally, it is a long accepted principle of national security that our military should not depend on foreign nations for materiel that we may need in the event of a war or mobilization.

Representative MIKULSKI's amendment would prohibit the Defense Department's purchase of foreign-made vehicles. In the last 2 years we have seen an alarming increase in the purchase of foreign vehicles by the U.S. military, including 20,000 administrative vehicles by the Armed Forces in Europe and 3,500 Mitsubishi trucks by the military here at home.

Auto industry unemployment is catastrophically high, as every Member of Congress knows. Auto plants have closed in record numbers, and 1 million auto-related jobs have been lost in the last 3½ years. There is no excuse for the Government to contribute to unemployment by purchasing foreign vehicles, and the practice should be prohibited.

Congressmen HERTEL and HILLIS are offering a more modest amendment, one which should receive the unanimous endorsement of the Congress. The amendment would prohibit Defense Department purchases of foreign-made administrative motor vehicles for use abroad unless the foreign manufacturer has won the contract in competitive bid in which U.S. manufacturers have had an opportunity to participate. The amendment does not mandate the purchase of American made vehicles; it merely requires the U.S. military to give U.S. auto companies a fair chance to compete for overseas contracts—a chance which our Government denies them today.

Finally, I support Mrs. Collins' amendment, which would require that the armed services purchase combat rations packaged in the United States. The Falklands conflict should bring home to every Member of Congress the importance of adequate food supplies for soldiers in combat. Picture American soldiers in the place of the starving Argentine troops and you will understand my concern that our own forces never be put in a comparable position.

But what would happen in a prolonged and controversial war if our troops were forced to depend on foreign companies for their combat rations? Can we trust any foreign source to meet such essential needs at a time of international conflict? I believe we cannot and I urge my colleagues to support the Collins amendment.●

● Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, I regret that the House during its consideration of H.R. 6030, the Defense Department authorization bill for fiscal year 1983, approved an amendment which in effect places a 1-year moratorium at the Department of Defense on commercial industrial-type activities.

At a time when fiscal prudence and economic good sense dictate that we seek the most efficient means to conduct governmental functions, this ill-advised amendment will preclude cost-comparison studies to determine whether private contractors could perform such functions more effectively than in-house Federal personnel. Moreover, the amendment was offered at a time when the Office of Management and Budget is actively reviewing its Circular A-76, governing contracting out, to assure efficient procedures which would shift functions to the private sector, if contractors can do the job cheaper and more effectively. OMB had estimated that implementing Circular A-76 will reduce the cost of providing goods and services by $1 billion annually.

I would urge my colleagues to consider that if they are truly looking for areas where fat can be trimmed from defense spending, and if they are concerned about removing our Government from its position of unfair competition with the private sector they will consider carefully any future efforts to hamstring our Government's ability to contract-out.●

● Mr. WEISS. Mr. Chairman, I support any and all amendments which curtail and suspend the MX missile system. The problems with the MX are too numerous at this time to proceed with its production.

The total cost of the MX system is not even known. While the Pentagon estimates that the total cost, in 1982 dollars, will be around $20 billion, it is more likely that the MX will cost Americans more than $100 billion. Even the Pentagon's conservative estimate seems too high a price to pay when the Federal Government literally is taking food away from hungry children in an effort to cut the Federal budget. Further, the cost of the MX system is even more excessive given the technical, procedural, and political problems that construction of the MX will inevitably present.

First and foremost, we are being asked to fund a multibillion-dollar weapon that has no home. Even though the Pentagon has experimented with or considered at least 34 different plans, the MX has no basing plan that can assure its own survivability. Even the Reagan administration admits that the current interim plan to deploy the MX in existing Minuteman silos leaves the weapon vulnerable to Soviet attack. In its mad scramble to propose a more viable plan, the administration has rediscovered "dense pack," an untried basing scheme based on questionable theory.

The Senate has already acted wisely in deleting the administration's $715 million request for implementing an interim basing plan. I urge my colleagues to do the same.

The political implications of deploying the MX will cause even greater defense problems. The MX is intended to be a super-accurate weapon designed to render the Soviet's missile force vulnerable while it remains invulnerable from Soviet attack. Clearly, it provides the United States with a first-strike capability, despite the fact that we have denounced a first strike. Deployment of the MX will heighten Soviet fears and undermine the arms reduction negotiations. It will likely spur a new round of weapons technology development on both sides, since it violates an existing agreement between the United States and Soviet Union which does not permit the building of any new ICBM launchers.

The administration is out of step with the growing mood toward arms reduction among Americans. Its plan to pour billions into the MX confirms this intention. Both the MX missile and its basing mode should be canceled and I, therefore urge passage of the Mavroules-Byron and Dellums amendments.●

Mr. BRINKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that title VIII be reopened for amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. AuCOIN, Chairman pro tempore of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 6030) to authorize appropriations for fiscal year 1983 for the Armed Forces for procurement, for research, development, test, and evaluation, and for operation and maintenance, to prescribe personnel strengths for such fiscal year for the Armed Forces and for civilian employees of the Department of Defense, to authorize appropriations for such fiscal year for civil defense, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A further message from the Senate by Mr. Sparrow, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 3663. An act to delay the effective date of proposed amendments to rule 4 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 4961. An act to make miscellaneous changes in the tax laws, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H.R. 4961) entitled "An act to make miscellaneous changes in the tax laws, and for other purposes," disagreed to by the House; requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. DOLE, Mr. PACKWOOD, Mr. ROTH, Mr. DANFORTH, Mr. LONG, Mr. BYRD of Virginia, and Mr. BENTSEN; on title IV only (excluding section 406(e)) Mr. PACKWOOD, Mrs. KASSEBAUM, and Mr. CANNON to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

PRIVILEGES OF THE HOUSE—SENATE AMENDMENTS TO H.R. 4961, MISCELLANEOUS REVENUE ACT OF 1981

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of the privileges of the House and offer a privileged resolution (H. Res. 541), and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 541

Resolved, that the Senate Amendments to the bill, H.R. 4961, in the opinion of the House, contravene the first clause of the seventh section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States, and are an infringement of the privileges of this House and that the said bill, with amendments be respectfully returned to the Senate with a message communicating this resolution.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I move to table the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to table offered by the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI).

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 229, nays 169, not voting 36, as follows:

Messrs. CAMPBELL, TAUKE, PERKINS MARLENEE, JONES of North Carolina, and WINN changed their votes from "yea" to "nay."

Messrs. GONZALEZ, PERKINS, EMERY, CHAPPELL, HUTTO, and FUQUA changed their votes from "nay" to "yea."

So the motion to table was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE ON ENERGY AND COMMERCE TO SIT DURING 5-MINUTE RULE ON THURSDAY, JULY 29, 1982

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Energy and Commerce may sit during the 5-minute rule on tomorrow, Thursday, July 29, 1982, to consider nuclear waste legislation.

The minority has no objection to this request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

APPOINTMENT OF CONFEREES ON H.R. 4961, MISCELLANEOUS REVENUE ACT OF 1981

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, at the direction of the Committee on Ways and Means, pursuant to clause 1 of rule 20, I move to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H.R. 4961) to make miscellaneous changes in the tax laws and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments thereto, and agree to a conference requested by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI moves to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H.R. 4961) to make miscellaneous changes in the tax laws and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments thereto, and agree to a conference requested by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI) is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. CONABLE) and pending that I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Ways and Means to agree to a conference with the Senate on its amendment to H.R. 4961. H.R. 4961, as amended by the Senate, would make significant changes in our tax laws, raising more than $98 billion over 3 years. The bill, in addition, would make program changes to reduce spending by $17.5 billion over the same period.

This is an unusual procedural step to take, Mr. Speaker, and, as chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, where all revenue-raising measures must originate, I have deep personal misgivings in offering this motion.

But, while this may seem a somewhat extraordinary procedure for House consideration of a major revenue bill, the severe economic distress and volatile political environment at this moment, in the judgment of the committee, dictate that we travel this route. The House has always had and will always have, the power to determine the full scope of its constitutional prerogatives, and the country's protection, under section 7 of article I of the Constitution, the origination clause. Further, H.R. 4961 is a bill which originated in the House and contained a number of amendments to the tax law. Let me note, moreover, that this situation is not without precedent in the House affecting revenue.

In 1968, the Revenue and Expenditure Control Act of 1968 as passed by the House contained an extension of the existing excise tax on communication services and automobiles, and on acceleration of estimated income tax payments by corporations. The Senate added a 10-percent income tax surcharge on corporations and individuals and a $6 billion expenditure cut in the budget proposed for fiscal year 1969. The Committee on Ways and Means instructed the conferees to go directly to conference to develop an expenditure reduction proposal and to raise taxes in an amount equal to that raised by the 10-percent income tax surcharge. The conference report, as approved by the House, reflected the major provisions of the Senate bill.

Chairman Mills stated at the time that the deterioration of the economy—budget deficits, inflation, high interest rates—necessitated extreme and extraordinary measures.

These too are extraordinary times. Soaring deficits, high interest rates, and unemployment are persuasive indications of the need for drastic and immediate action.

Yet conflicting forces are driving the House at this moment. There is the desire to be fiscally responsible, as exemplified by the enactment of the first concurrent budget resolution for fiscal year 1983, setting reconciliation targets for the committees and the House to meet. On the other hand, there appears to be widespread fear that any attempt to craft a tax increase bill in the House would lead to political chaos, severely reducing the chances of its passage. Moreover, the August 1 deadline for reporting a revenue package is fast approaching.

There is an immediate overwhelming need for taxpayers to have the certainty which the enactment of this tax bill will provide, so that they can take the actions necessary to initiate the economic recovery this country so desperately needs.

Therefore, today's action, in light of the unusually serious economic situation we face today, does not create a precedent for judging when in the future the House should, and will, insist on the maximum protection afforded by the origination clause.

Today, I am asking my colleagues to rise to the needs of this moment and support the committee's decision to go directly to conference. I can assure my colleagues that the House conferees will return with an agreement which best seeks to achieve the required revenue and spending targets, but will not be a simple rubber stamp of the Senate bill.

With regard to the spending reductions, the House conferees will have to remain faithful to the overwhelming desire of Members of both sides of the aisle to make reductions in as compassionate a way as possible with the least impact on beneficiaries, particularly in the medicare program. I believe that the spending reductions agreed to last week by the Committee on Ways and Means achieve that end. Those spending reductions are being introduced today by myself and my colleague from Ohio (Mr. GRADISON) and will serve as the blueprint for the House position in conference on the spending reduction issues.

As my colleagues are well aware, the Senate has met the mandate of the first budget resolution, in my view, in a responsible, statesmanlike fashion. H.R. 4961 as amended would repeal or reduce unjustified and inefficient tax preferences and in general encourage voluntary compliance with the tax laws. In fact, many of its provisions are substantially similar to bills and proposals offered by some of the Members of our committee and of the House. But as my ranking minority member, the gentlemen from New York, and I discovered, in reviewing the bill over the past week, a number of areas in the Senate amendment could be improved without in any way deviating from the thrust of the Senate amendment.

There are over 45 special interest provisions in the Senate amendment to H.R. 4961, most of them decreasing, rather than increasing revenue. Clearly, the House conferees would want to eliminate those provisions in the Senate amendment which do not contribute to the ultimate purpose of this bill—that is, to reduce the deficit.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to support this motion and look forward to presenting to this House a responsible conference agreement which will enjoy their support as well.

□ 1910

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. MOORE).

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I know the outcome of this vote that is going to occur today on this motion, but I think before we vote the Members of this House ought to stop and think about and understand what they are about to do, regardless of all the reasons, the expedient reasons they are going to hear about why we ought to be doing what we are going to do.

Regardless of what our leaders are going to tell us and have told us, they know this is a serious, extraordinary, most unusual procedure. They know there are problems with it, regardless of what they may tell us about why we need to take this action.

There are several reasons why I think many of you might decide you want to vote for this motion. Let us explore them.

The first one and the most obvious, the one you are going to have to answer to your constituents for, is the fact that what you essentially saying when you vote to bypass the normal procedures of this body and send a bill straight to conference, is that you think that bill is perfect. It is so perfect that no committee in the House need look at it, no Member need offer an amendment, no hearings need to be held, no examination need be given, and no vote need be taken. As a matter of fact, the bill is not even in print. No Member need even read it because you cannot, so just send it to conference because you think the bill is that good.

Maybe you want to answer for that to the American people. I do not. I do not think that is a good reason.

The second one is the fact that I hear in good conscience from my colleagues who say this is the only way we are going to get a tax bill. We have been writing tax bills in this Congress for 194 years and have never done this before. How can you say this is the only way to write a tax bill when we never had 1 day, nay, not 1 hour of an attempted markup to write one?

How can we claim we failed and it cannot be done when we never tried?

My colleagues, if we cannot write a bill—and I have confidence in my colleagues on the Ways and Means Committee on both sides of the aisle—if we cannot write one, we can always come back with this extraordinary procedure a week or two from now.

The third reason, one that I think is one that I do not like to bring up but I think it is there on both sides of the aisle, that is political expediency. My colleagues on the Democratic side are willing to cast aside their constitutional responsibilities to make this a Republican bill and have no Democratic footprints or fingerprints on it.

My colleagues on the Republican side of the aisle are willing to sacrifice their responsibilities for the political expediency of a popular President of our party.

I do not think either one of those are very good reasons. As a matter of fact, none of these reasons are very good, and the American people expect us to do our job, not play partisan politics, not submit to something that is far for perfect and we know it.

None of these reasons, my colleagues, are good, and we know it. None of them are good.

The bill is not perfect. Partisan politics is not something we should be tolerating on something so serious as this.

I ask you to just listen for a minute and consider what you are about to do. I believe very strongly we are violating the Constitution, article I, section 7. It is very simple, one line: "All bills raising revenues should originate in the House of Representatives."

I repeat: "All bills raising revenues shall originate in the House of Representatives."

There has never been one case in the history of the Federal courts in this country that have ever held a revenue bill can originate in the Senate.

We had a precedent cited by our chairman a moment ago, a very minor thing, and the courts have held in inconsequential things such as that precedent; the courts will look the other way.

Nobody, my colleagues, nobody believes that this bill that came from the other body is inconsequential, that it is minor. It has been labeled the greatest, the largest tax revenue-raising bill in the history of this country.

My colleagues saw how thick it was a moment ago, although it is not even in print yet. There were hundreds of pages, and I have been told over 100 tax changes that significantly change the Tax Code that you have not read nor have I, nor has anybody on this House floor, nor will we be given the opportunity, I might add.

For partisan politics, for political expediency, for a reason that does not hold water, we are saying cast aside the Constitution and let us move on.

Never in the 194-year history of this House have we done this. Never before have we allowed the other body to write a major tax bill and send it to us, and we just docilely send it back to them and go to conference. Never before. We should not now, as there is no reason to do so, and good reasons not to.

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. GRADISON) a member of the committee.

Mr. GRADISON. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, determining the role of the Ways and Means Committee and the House in writing tax laws is not just a question of constitutionality, important as that is. Last year, for whatever reason, the Ways and Means Committee, and indeed this House, had little to do with the final tax bill. This year, for very different reasons, we reach the same result: The House abdicating its responsibility for tax legislation to the Treasury and to the other body. It is not a precedent to be proud of.

We are urged to bypass the Ways and Means Committee and to bypass the House, to go directly to conference. Why? So that a tax bill will pass and so that we will be able to meet our revenue-raising responsibilities under the budget reconciliation process. I want us to pass a tax bill, and I want the budget process to work. This shortcut procedure, in my judgment, will make it harder, not easier, to pass a tax bill, since some Members will now vote against it for procedural as well as substantive and philosophical reasons when it comes back from the conference.

I want to give the Members a specific example of the problems we face. This member is the ranking minority member on the Health Subcommittee. The House said, loud and clear, that we were to hold down medicare spending but protect the beneficiaries. And we did that in the Health Subcommittee, and we did that in the full committee. The other body used a different approach, one which would increase the burden on beneficiaries.

Since there is no House bill, the scope of this conference is between present law and the bill passed by the other body. Our approach, one which is intended to protect the beneficiaries, is outside the scope of conference. If we go directly to conference, there is no assured way to protect medicare beneficiaries. If you want to do so, you have to vote no on this motion.

If you believe the Treasury and the other body are better qualified than this House to write tax legislation, you should vote to go directly to conference. If you believe the Finance Committee of the other body is better qualified than our Ways and Means Committee to write tax legislation, you should vote to go directly to conference.

This Member shares the deep misgivings of our chairman and believes a better bill would result from full participation by this House and by our Committee on Ways and Means; therefore, this Member urges that the motion be rejected.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Florida (Mr. GIBBONS).

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Speaker, like you and like some other Members of this House, I have sat through a number of these debates, and I have always found that if you got a tax raising bill on the floor or a pay raise bill on the floor, there are always a lot of people who will get up here and give you every reason in the Sun why they cannot support it.

Now, I will give you a reason why you ought to vote "aye." All of us have thousands of constitutents who are waiting for an answer. What this country needs is a restoration of confidence. They need to know what direction their leaders are taking them and what their responsibilities are going to be.

We can position ourselves on certain constitutional issues—and I can make as good a speech as any that have been made on that subject, and maybe add a little more to it—but the truth is that unless we go to conference now, there will not be any legislation to vote up or down on until around Christmas time. In the meantime, we will have all gotten off the hook, and gotten our elections out of the way, but all of the people out there who have to make decisions about this economy, what they are going to invest in, what kind of jobs they are going to create, will not know where to go until this Congress acts. That is the bottom line, and that is the responsibility we have here today.

Now, if those who are privileged to go to conference do not do a workmanlike job and do not protect the interest of the House, then when this bill comes back, you will have ample opportunity to vote "no" on it and to kill it right there. But do not delay this until after the election. And there is no way—and you all know that there is no way—that you can draft a bill and get it through the House and get it through conference and get it back here approved or disapproved between now and Christmas time.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIBBONS. I only have 4 minutes, and I want to respond to something the gentleman said. The gentleman said there was no precedent for this. The gentleman makes a real fine speech, but he is not accurate on his facts.

In 1968—the minority leader will remember this—the same event occurred. We had to go to conference then on a bill because the country was in trouble. Mr. Gross' successor, the gentleman from California (Mr. ROUSSELOT) made the same motion. Mr. Gross made it then, and it was killed, just like it was; in fact, Mr. Gross got more votes than Mr. ROUSSELOT did, because he really gave a better argument. But it was turned down, and the courts ignored it when these things came up.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIBBONS. Just a minute. I am trying to answer the gentleman's question.

And then in 1960, the same thing occurred, I say to the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. MOORE) and people got up and made the same speech the gentleman did and the same speech that the gentleman from California (Mr. ROUSSELOT) did and the same speech that Mr. Gross did, and it all got turned down. The country survived it, the House of Representatives survived it. But this country is not going to survive indecision and delay. It is the biggest problem we have. That is what needs to be done.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, now will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIBBONS. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. MOORE. I appreciate the gentleman yielding.

First, the argument that the gentleman makes would apply to any important legislation.

Mr. GIBBONS. No; it would not.

Mr. MOORE. We only have one House of Congress.

And, second, I would say to the gentleman, the 1968 case, according to what I see here in "Deschler's Procedure" was an excise tax bill we sent to the Senate that they put a surtax on. We sent a tax bill there, and they had the right to amend it. That is not the same precedent as what we are doing.

Mr. GIBBONS. I was here and listened to all of the debate. I do not know what "Deschler's Procedures," show on the thing, but that does not worry me about all this. We have got a problem; we must face up to it. We have got to go ahead and get a decision made. The gentleman's constituents down there need to know what the answer is. They need to know whether they are going to have to pay increased taxes or not increased taxes, whether they are going to have to go out and pay higher interest rates or lower interest rates. Those are all questions that we are going to decide.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Florida (Mr. GIBBONS) has expired.

Mr. GIBBONS. If the gentleman will get me some more time, I will be glad to yield.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield 1 additional minute?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Florida (Mr. GIBBONS) has expired.

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, the motion before us would direct the House to go directly to a conference on the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982, which passed the other body late last week. That bill generally satisfies both spending and revenue-raising requirements imposed under the budget resolution approved by this Congress earlier in the year.

This procedure for going to conference is highly unusual. While the Senate has moved with discipline and dispatch, the Committee on Ways and Means has not marked up a bill including revenue-raising provisions and has not officially reported legislation dealing with expenditure reductions. Under budget reconciliation requirements, the revenue-raising target is $20.9 billion for fiscal year 1983 and $98.3 billion for the 3-year period 1983 to 1985.

Despite this unusual procedure, I voted in favor of it in committee and I support it here for several reasons. First, I believe that in a macroeconomic sense it is important that Congress pass a tax bill reducing projected Federal deficits for fiscal year 1983 and beyond. I recognize that some of my colleagues are not with me on that point. The only way that we are going to get a tax bill is through this procedure. They do not want a tax bill, the colleagues I was referring to, so they are opposed to the procedure. I understand their viewpoint, and I cannot agree with it. I do not contend that deficit reduction of the magnitude we are entertaining here will result immediately in an economic upsurge and/or a dramatic drop in interest rates. But I do contend that if we fail to reduce the deficit by a relatively modest amount in the budget resolution, we will badly damage the credibility of the Congress and the environment of economic confidence.

The long and short of it is that if we want to bring down the budget deficit now, we are led inexorably toward a conference with the other body. Neither time nor the majority of this body will allow us to follow another course.

Second, to preserve the integrity of the budget process, it is essential that the Congress follow through on the commitments we made in the first concurrent resolution on the budget.

Third, the President has indicated his strong support of efforts to pass a tax bill which satisfies the commitments made in the budget resolution.

I say to my colleagues on the Republican side that if a bill were to pass the Ways and Means Committee, acceptable to a majority of that committee, we would be right back here on the floor substituting some version of the Senate Finance Committee bill in the same way that we substituted the Conable-Hance bill last year for what came out of the Ways and Means Committee then. It would be preferable, in my view, to get at a revision of the Senate Finance Committee bill through the conference process and to have, if I may say so, the cooperation of the majority in the process.

It should be emphasized that my decision to vote to go directly to conference was contingent on important understandings with the chairman of our committee. One such understanding concerns the approach which the House conferees would take in considering the other body's version of the tax bill. Specifically, my chairman, the gentleman from Illinois, assured me and the other members of the committee that a serious and conscientious effort would be made to improve the other body's legislation. He would not simply agree to it. This is an important point because it is apparent that at least some Members on the other side of the aisle would prefer not to participate in this process and would thus abdicate responsibility totally.

Another understanding has to do with the potential scope of the conference, a subject which already has been addressed through a colloquy with the chairman.

A final point should be noted. Some question has been raised as to whether the procedure we are following is inconsistent with the constitutional mandate that all bills for raising revenue originate in the House. While it is apparent that the procedure is unusual, it should in no way create a precedent for judging when, in the future, the House should, or would, insist on the maximum protection afforded by the origination clause.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I support the motion of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Texas (Mr. PICKLE).

Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Speaker, today, we are faced with an unusual situation that demands extraordinary action if we are to succeed in meeting our ultimate goal. The goal is that of developing and passing a revenue bill that meets the reconciliation instructions imposed on the Committee on Ways and Means by the House. As such, this objective is not one that the House or the committee can now cast aside, if we are serious about the budget process and if we are sincere in our stated desire to reduce the budget deficits that loom ever larger in the next 3 fiscal years.

The action proposed by the Committee on Ways and Means is not unprecedented as Chairman ROSTENKOWSKI explained in his remarks.

It is unusual, but there are other precedents as well. In 1950, the Senate substantially revised a House bill and the Committee on Ways and Means went directly to conference. As a result, the Revenue Act of 1950 was passed by the House and Senate by overwhelming margins. The context of this action was the outbreak of hostilities in Korea. The action taken by Congress to respond to this emergency in 1950 did not undermine the role of the House in initiating revenue measures. Neither did the action taken in 1968 to respond to an economic emergency such as we face today. Extraordinary circumstances demand extraordinary responses by Congress in meeting its responsibilities and do not violate or in any way impair the constitutional role of the House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we all recognize that we must have a tax bill. We are generally agreed that is the best way to try to pull down the deficit. I think we also recognize that if we go back and start over, we will not get a tax bill this year. There may be some who think our Ways and Means Committee could meet and pass a tax bill. But only a week ago the chairman of our committee and the ranking minority member advanced a suggested outline of a bill and their suggestions were met with such a fire storm that it was immediately withdrawn. We recognized almost immediately that the only way we are going to get a tax bill is either take the Senate bill exactly like it is, or write a new bill, or go to conference.

Now, it seems to me that we ought to recognize we have already passed a budget, and now we ought to live up to that budget.

The Senate, when the budget was passed, went into action fast. The ink was not dry on the budget when the Senate Finance Committee had already convened and the other body was fast passing their tax bill. I did not hear a voice over here, or almost anywhere in the Capitol, protesting the rush to pass that revenue bill, or tax bill, because generally we all recognize that it had begun. Only within the last 48 hours suddenly we found some people who wanted to be constitutional Christians and wanted to be saved in this constitutional fight.

Now, this is a bill that was passed by the Senate. It is endorsed by the President. It is a Senate Republican bill. I have to assume, then, if you do not want this bill that you are not supporting your President or you are not supporting the Senate Republicans in their action, that you must say that it is a bad bill.

Now, if you say it is a bad bill, then when it comes back you will have the privilege of voting against it. But we must resolve our impasse by at least moving forward.

I suggest to my colleagues that the conference is the best way that we can do this.

I tell my colleagues if we do go to conference we will have Members of the House, Members of the Senate, who will be working together to try to form the best bill possible with the Senate bill as the base to begin with. I do not know that we can reach a full agreement. But I rather imagine that we can, because in principle many things in the Senate bill are acceptable. It is not nearly as bad a bill as a lot of people indicate. But it is the only chance we have. And I would say to the Members that we will have the voices of the members of the committees involved having some say about what goes into that tax bill. It will be from the Members on the Democratic side, it will be from the Members on the Republican side.

It will not be the full House Members. It will not be the full committee members. But it will be the leadership, I presume, on both sides, who will have a voice in trying to arrive at what is the best answer for us and for the American people.

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. ROUSSELOT) an articulate member of the committee.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, I cannot really believe what I have just heard from some of my colleagues who serve on the Ways and Means Committee. I am genuinely surprised that so many of my colleagues on Ways and Means and other Members of the House wish to just abandon, repeat abandon, their responsibility to write a tax bill. That is right, just abandon, quit, stop, walk away. Absolutely incredible.

Now, one of my colleagues said we want a "restoration of confidence." A comment totally off the wall. How can you have a restoration of confidence when you say, "Well, we will just take whatever the Senate does, shove it back to them and say, 'Hey, this is your tax bill.'"

Absolutely incredible that Members who I know believe in this institution, believe in our responsibility, and now are totally abandoning any opportunity to fashion a tax bill when they know full well that the Constitution says all bills, not some bills, all bills raising revenue must emanate from this body.

Whether you like it or not, if you vote to go to conference right now you are totally abandoning the Constitution of the United States, yes that is total disregard for our Constitution. And also you are saying we do not trust the Ways and Means Committee at all, they are all a bunch of incompetents. That is these members of Ways and Means just do not care—and I see one of my colleagues on the committee shaking his head; I will name the gentleman if he wants me to.

I do not agree with that. I think that is a total copout. And I think we are making a terrible mistake here today to walk away from our sworn responsibility. And if you claim, those of you who say, "Well, it is not our bill, it belongs over there," if you vote to send this to conference, your handprints are all over it. And we are going to make sure your identifiable footprints are on it, too.

Now, one of my colleagues says, "Well, it passed the Senate." It only passed by three votes in the Senate. You want to let the other body decide by that kind of a margin how your constituents are going to be taxed?

Well, then, I sincerely believe you should vote "no" on this motion. If you really uphold the oath of office that you took to uphold the Constitution of the United States, you will vote "no" on this conference report.

We have not touched this bill, very few know what is contained therein. We have not looked at it. It was sent back a few minutes ago. It is a foot and a half thick. Now the original bill (H.R. 4961) went over—look at it here in my hand—31 pages. And our wonderful other body took it and jammed and patched a whole new line of major tax increases on top of this simple bill.

And you are going to go back to your constituents and say, "I know what was in it, it was carefully crafted." Like heck you will.

I want to tell you, you are missing your sense of responsibility, and I mean it with all the sincerity I can muster, if you vote to give up your constitutional responsibility to fashion on our own a tax bill. You have failed to uphold your oath of office.

You are the people's body. That is your responsibility. And I say that any Member here who says, "Well, I will slip around this and say it is the Republicans that did it in the Senate," bunk. You are responsible. You carry that responsibility right here, now. I urge a no vote on the Senate conference request.

□ 1940

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. FOWLER).

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, I think that the gentleman from California in his sound and in his fury is not only crying crocodile tears, but of course in his inimitable manner crocodile shouts as well.

Last year we did not even have a vehicle for the budget bill of three or four pages. The budget bill arrived on this floor from the White House basement, 700 pages long, twice as big as this one, that nobody had ever seen. No cries of unprecedented. No cries of copout, only one partisan question. No economic debate; no fiscal tax policy debate; one partisan question, "Are you for the President of the United States or are you against him?"

"If you dare vote against the bill that you have never seen, then you are an obstructionist, you are unpatriotic, you do not even want to give the man or his economic policy a chance."

There is the copout that led to $140 billion worth of deficits this year and has caused the President of the United States to plead with the House Ways and Means Committee to give us a chance, all of us, not just the committee, but all of us in this body to have a bill on the floor that could possibly bring $20 billion back to offset the $140 billion worth of deficits.

It is unprecedented that a Democratic chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI) who opposed the President's program last year, warned that we could have 10 million people unemployed, warned that we could continue to have high interest rates, warned that in violation of every firm business principle we were giving away our revenue base and would be crawling back in an election year to try to recapture part of the bounty that had been unloosed across corporate America, is seeking to help the President of the United States achieve the $20 billion in tax revenues which be has endorsed.

Do not believe this constitutional obfuscation. It is not true. The precedents are in the record. What will be a copout is if we in this body do not take the only vehicle pragmatically available to allow a debate on whether or not we are going to have a tax bill this year.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 additional seconds to the gentleman.

Mr. FOWLER. Nobody likes all the ingredients, the Baskin-Robbins approach of scooping here and skipping this and scooping there; tobacco, not beer; pensions, not profits; this, not that; but we owe it to the American people to do what we did not do last year and that is to have a debate on the fiscal policy of this Nation, how we got where we are and whether or not we have the courage to bring a tax bill to the floor that has a chance of passing.

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois (Mr. PHILIP M. CRANE).

Mr. PHILIP M. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, first of all let me address a point on this constitutional issue. We had, back on November 8, 1979, a similar kind of debate on this floor and our distinguished colleague from Ohio (Mr. VANIK) because of an amendment that was attached to a bill that had come out of this body, proposed that we pursue the remedy to that that the gentleman from California (Mr. ROUSSELOT) attempted earlier to do.

The gentleman from Ohio (Mr. VANIK) was quite eloquent in preparing his case and my distinguished ranking minority member on the Committee on Ways and Means joined in that battle, along with some of the other colleagues on our side. The gentleman from Michigan (Mr. DINGELL) was equally eloquent in insisting that article I, section 7, of the Constitution be observed, because the Senate had infringed on the prerogatives of the House.

Now, a lot of folks here perhaps do not know the origin of that House prerogative, but I guarantee you that the whole history of liberty in representative governments has rested upon that power being vested in the body of the people, that power to impose self-taxation. The Founding Fathers understood very clearly why they put that power in our hands and we cannot in good conscience abdicate that responsibility.

I am opposed to any taxes, I will admit that freely. I voted against the budget. I am not bound to support any tax bill and I think it is the wrong economic medicine. Moreover, I think the White House is wrong and I think the Senate is wrong. But that is not the issue that is involved here tonight, because what you are being asked to do is to violate the oath of office you took to solemnly uphold that Constitution, so help you God. That language is explicit. All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives.

In article VI of the Constitution it says the Senators and Representatives of the United States shall be bound by oath to support this Constitution.

This is a precious body. Of all the bodies of our National Government, whether you take the White House, the Supreme Court, or the U.S. Senate, this is far and away the most important body and that is why the Founding Fathers wisely vested in this body the power to tax the people. It gives the people the chance to throw all of us out over just such issues as taxes. Self-taxation enabled the people to wrest power, in British history, from monarchs who abused power. We have people in the executive branch today who are abusing power and yet we are passively letting that transpire, when we have a constitutional obligation to uphold the rights of this body.

Thomas Jefferson said, "We will bind the Members down with the chains of the Constitution."

He said that because so frequently people have dealt with vital issues frivolously and lost their freedom in the name of expediency and pragmatism.

I urge all of you to examine your consciences on this question of that solemn oath you took on this most fundamental constitutional issue.

Whether you support taxes or you disagree with taxes, for goodness sakes, at least adhere to what we solemnly took oath to support; namely, the Constitution of the United States. Do it properly.

Do you want to establish the credibility of Members of Congress? Do you want to act in a responsible way? Do you want to build up the confidence of the people? The way you do that is to uphold the oath of office that we all took and we are all morally bound to observe.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHILIP M. CRANE. I am happy to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I certainly agree with the gentleman's arguments, but I would like to ask if the gentleman agrees with one other.

We are always hearing in this body about precedents. We are a very British Government precedent oriented body. What has the House done before?

They talk about precedents. There has never been a precedent of a major tax bill being written by the other body, sent over here and us going to conference. Never.

What does the gentleman think about us establishing that precedent today?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BOLLING). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL).

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, in the Ways and Means Committee, I voted for the motion to go directly to conference with the Senate. I will do so here this afternoon, too.

Good arguments can be made for regular procedures. Normally we should follow established procedures. On those occasions when they are bypassed, there must be a good reason. The burden of proof is properly on the bypasses.

In this case, the principal good reason is that this Congress has passed a budget resolution which calls for $20 billion in increased taxes. We all hate taxes. We all have good reasons for voting against them. But unless we want to risk an additional $20 billion in deficits, higher interest rates, and an aborted recovery, we need a tax bill.

In my judgment, the best chance of passing the least worst tax bill is to go to conference with the Senate, improve the obviously flawed bill, and bring a good conference bill to this House.

If we use the regular procedure, there is no guarantee that any bill will ever pass. As near as I can tell neither the majority, nor minority has either a bill, or a program. I will, of course, be pleased to work on tax bill in the usual way. I will work for success, but I can not predict it.

For Republicans, the unfair 2-to-1 ratio of Democrats on the Ways and Means Committee does not argue well for committee production of a better conference vehicle than the Senate bill. In fact, the committee may accept the Senate bill outright, or it may produce a bill totally different from the Senate bill. The only thing that seems certain is that moving anything through the committee would be a long and arduous process.

The constitutional attacks on the procedure of going direct to conference is a serious one. Nonetheless, when Congress has used this procedure in past, the courts have not been willing to look beyond the H.R. number on the bill even though most of the substance actually originated in the Senate.

More serious still is our own obligation to uphold the Constitution, regardless of what the courts may say. I believe that we can satisfy that obligation even if we shortcut or reroute the regular process. The normal process is most likely to give us two votes, one for a House bill under a closed rule, and one on the conference report. That is just what the abbreviated process will give us, too.

The bottom line for me is the budget resolution and the need to reduce the deficit. I would not favor the Senate bill as is. I would work for a new House bill, but I doubt our ability to pass a good, or, in fact, any, bill. Therefore, I believe our best course is to move directly into conference.

The administration also supports this point of view. I feel confident that the administration has given some thought to this matter, and has done careful investigation of the alternatives.

Again I restate my reluctance to vote for any tax increase bill. That does entail risk. But I believe it is riskier to avoid the tax bill and accept a higher deficit. A vote for the motion to go straight to conference is not a very good choice, nor a happy one, but I think it is the only one. I urge a vote for the Rostenkowski motion.

□ 1950

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENZEL. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. MOORE. I thank my distinguished colleague for yielding to me.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman makes an eloquent argument. The gentleman preceding him, the gentleman from Texas, did also, on the other side of the aisle. But where is the impasse? Where has the impasse occurred? Where did we break down trying to write a bill?

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. MARTIN).

Mr. MARTIN of North Carolina. I thank the chairman and the ranking member for the graciousness of their remarks by which they have introduced me here.

Members have heard a lot about constitutional issues, issues so serious that they deeply concern the professional staff of the Committee on Ways and Means. Members have heard questions raised about the political issues, about the fingerprints, about the footprints. Maybe we will hear about the body prints and the lip prints that are all over this bill.

Well, let me say to my colleagues that there are also some important issues about the legislative merit of the particular bill that has been sent over here. I am sure that every Member in this House, by virtue of what they have read in the news accounts and seen, there are some things that they like in the bill that came here from the other body.

I expect Members have seen some things in there that they do not like. The problem is not with the things that Members know they like and the things that Members know they do not like; the legislative problem is with all of the things in that bill that Members have not even heard about yet.

There are only 107 changes in the Tax Code in this bill that was sent back to us from the other body, 107 changes in the Tax Code.

Maybe my colleagues are familiar with 10 or 12 of them, but what about the other 95? There are literally dozens and dozens that have not been examined yet by the Committee on Ways and Means. The legislative problem is all those cute, all those clumsy or punitive or sweetening provisions that are salted away in this bill that Members do not even know about yet. And how could we know, considering the rush by which they want to grease this bill through the House of Representatives before anybody is alert to what is in it? These 107 changes are about to zip through here like greased lightning.

And speaking of grease, have my colleagues heard yet about the grease payment provisions? That does not have anything to do with bartering with tallow; I am talking about the grease payment provision.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of North Carolina. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Grease payment for what?

Mr. MARTIN of North Carolina. The gentleman's question is appreciated.

The grease payment provision would allow business deductions—listen to this—for the cost, for the business deductions cost of greasing foreign officials, for the cost of greasing foreign officials.

Now, maybe Members think it should be legal to bribe a foreign customs official; maybe Members think it ought to be legal, but does it have to be tax deductible? Is it fair to make other taxpayers pay for it? Are we going to grease them, too?

Maybe Members believe that the Congress ought to disrupt the careful balance between rival kinds of insurance companies, stock companies versus mutual companies and their consumers. But we do not even know yet which way it shifts the burden. Who loses? And who wins? And why?

Maybe Members believe that families should be punished for trying to settle an estate to keep it in the family after Uncle Charley's demise.

The interesting thing is, the other body did not intend that, but that is one of the unintended consequences.

What else lurks in this bill that is before us? There are other secrets that are deeply shrouded in mystery. Many of the fall guys are just now discovering that they are "it"; that they have been tagged as the fall guy. How many other fall guys are there in this bill?

One more argument I want to make about legislative issues.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. MARTIN) has expired.

Mr. MARTIN of North Carolina. I am sure the gentleman will allow me another 30 seconds.

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Speaker, I yield another 30 seconds to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. MARTIN of North Carolina. We have been told the only way to get a tax bill is to go this unprecedented, unwise, unconstitutional route. Who says so?

In the 8 years I have served on the Ways and Means Committee, when has it ever failed to muster out a tax bill? Never. It has never failed to bring out tax bills.

If it cannot bring out a tax bill, should we consider one that has not even been considered and talked about by them? How can you say that Ways and Means will not bring out a bill? We have not even tried yet.

Do consider this: If we grease this through, there will be a careful study of what is in that bill. The first and only careful study to examine this will be done by enterprising, investigative reporters who will report to us what is in the bill and then we will have to answer.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. JENKINS).

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, this is an unusual proceeding and I know it is very difficult for all of us in this particular situation in which we find ourselves. It is always easy to drink from the cup when we are reducing taxes; it is always popular.

I stood here slightly over a year ago and said at that time that in my opinion when the President found himself in a situation of huge deficits down the road, because of that unwise course of action, that I would not shirk my responsibility, that I would attempt at that time—which is now—to try to help the President of the United States redress the wrong direction that in my opinion he did take at that time and certainly history has shown that to be correct.

I have heard a great deal about political expediency. It was politically expedient a year ago to take the course that we took as a body. That is unfortunate.

But today, and in the next few days, the President of the United States, who has already asked the Senate—and it has been a straight party-line vote there, every single person who voted for that bill that we are going to consider in conference was a member of the Republican side. So the administration has had an input into that. Certainly the Republican Party has because every inch of the way they have guided this bill through the Senate.

All of these things that some of my colleagues say are so unwise, I simply want them to know that they did not come from the Democratic side.

I intend to try to help the House when we get to the final vote because I think it is desperately needed. But I say to my colleagues in all sincerity that, as our colleague from Minnesota said, this is an issue that is the only course if we are to try to address deficits that are skyrocketing day by day. It is not an easy choice and I urge your support.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. DOWNEY).

□ 2000

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with remarkable entertainment to our Federalist/Republicans tell us about our oath of office and the sanctity of the Constitution. One will be amazed to hear what they have to say when they attempt to amend the Constitution for the budget balancing or on their arguments on the other ways in which they intend to amend that sacred document.

The reason we are here is because the economic game plan of the President is failing. Now, it has not had enough time to go supernova, and that is the reason why we are here, to try and staunch the flow of deficits—$140 billion.

None of us—none of us like the prospect of telling our constituents, whomever they may be, that they have to pay more in taxes, but the irreparable harm that will be done to this economy if we do not face the difficult music and do something about the deficit will be far more devastating. So, we are here out of necessity; not because we want to, not because we want to violate the Constitution, but because the economic game plan of this President is failing. It is failing, and it started to fail very soon.

As a member of the Budget Committee and the Ways and Means Committee, I had the opportunity to listen to Mr. Reagan and Mr. Stockman tell me that the expectation or effect of putting this program in place would be enough to let loose the investment across our country. Real investment is down in 1981, and it will be down in 1982. It is down because interest rates are high, and interest rates are at their historic highest level because of the lack of faith that people have in the ability of this Congress to do something about the deficit; not the figleaf of a balanced budget, but raising revenues when it needs to be raised. That is what we are here to do, and responsible legislators will do it, will swallow the very bitter pill of this bill and get on with the process of trying to save the American economy.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Hawaii (Mr. HEFTEL).

Mr. HEFTEL. Mr. Speaker, as a Democrat I want to make it clear that my handprints and my footprints will be on this tax measure, which increases taxes. I wish, though, that I could have had my handprints and footprints on the tax measure of a year ago which decreased taxes, increased the deficit, and put us in the position we are in today.

There is no way that we are going to bring down interest rates, stop the flow of unemployment and bankruptcies if we do not do something about the Federal deficit. This tax measure may only be a first step in bringing sanity to our economic policies.

There are many in welfare lines, unemployment lines, filing bankruptcies in courts across America because of what we did a year ago. We can undo a little bit of its today. I hope we do.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. SHANNON).

Mr. SHANNON. Mr. Speaker, I find myself in the uncomfortable position today of agreeing with many of my Republican colleagues on the Ways and Means Committee; uncomfortable not because disagreement with them on major issues is inevitable, but uncomfortable because I know that behind all the code words about the Constitution, the process, the procedure, we have the basic reality that many of these people just are not going to vote for any tax bill this year. When they say to us that they do not like this process, they do not like the way it is going, they do not like the fact that the Constitution or the spirit of the Constitution might be violated, what they are really saying to us is that they are not voting for tax increases no matter how big the budget deficit is this year.

Are you not the same Members who swallowed whole the Gramm-Latta budget last year, not knowing what was in it?

Are you not the same Members who swallowed the tax reduction last year, not knowing what was in that? You are not concerned about the process; you are not concerned about the procedure. You are concerned about what is going to happen in November.

I am concerned about what we are going to do with this tax bill. I think we should not go to conference because I think the people who elected us to Congress have a right to have some input into this tax bill. They have a right to have us, each of us, take a stand on this tax bill in committee, on the floor, before it is voted on, and not just on a conference report. We are not going to be able to escape responsibility for it. We are not going to be able to walk away from this bill as if it were some stepchild left here on the floor of the House of Representatives by persons unknown.

This is a major piece of legislation. We were elected to Congress not to avoid responsibility, but to face up to it. Today, with our economy in as bad shape as it has been in the last 40 years, I think the American people want to see us face up to it. I do not think they want to see us playing political games. I think that many on my side of the aisle feel that the best way to get this tax bill through and the best interests of the economy is to go this route. I cannot agree. Now is the time, not for Republican solutions, not for Democractic solutions, but for American solutions.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as I have remaining to the gentleman from Arkansas (Mr. ANTHONY).

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I thank the chairman for yielding me time. Probably the reason he is having a little difficulty in remembering the State I am from is because I am the newest member of the Ways and Means Committee.

I must tell the Members that it pains me from two or three different directions. No. 1, I come here today to say that I did not have the privilege of giving away all the taxes last year. I was only put on the committee after that show was over with. I must now face up to my responsibilities and go home and only talk to my constituents about raising taxes. I can tell the Members that that puts one in an unpleasant and an uncomfortable situation.

As the newest member of the committee and as any Member of this body would do, the constitutional issue was something that gravely concerned me, so what did I do? I went and checked it out. Not one single court case in the U.S. Supreme Court has been cited, can be cited, to show that we are violating any article of the U.S. Constitution. That settles that issue, and if you can cite it, cite it.

Mr. MOORE. What does the language of the Constitution say, I say to the gentleman? We do not need a court case.

Mr. ANTHONY. We are legislators, we are not judges. It is up to the court to decide that.

So what else would you take a look at? You take a look at the legislative history to make sure your actions today follow legislative precedent. The one that has been talked about was in 1968. Well, when I grew up in Arkansas the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee then was a very important political figure because he was from the State of Arkansas. That came under his leadership. But I went back and looked at another one, and to my colleague from Louisiana, I wish he would listen to this because he raised this point about the amount of revenue.

In 1950 the identical situation occurred, but on a reduction of a bill that cut excise taxes, basically the situation we have here. The Senate passed a bill that had 192 amendments in all that raised $3 billion. That is in 1951. I queried what is the equivalent to $3 billion in 1982? Is it $21 billion?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas (Mr. ANTHONY) has expired.

All the time of the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI) has expired.

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Speaker, I now yield such time as I have remaining to the distinguished minority leader, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MICHEL).

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MICHEL) is recognized for 5½ minutes.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker and my colleagues, I rise in support of this motion. I have come to this position by a brief review of what brought us here. I am reminded of those months—tortuous months—of wrestling with the budget resolution, first because the one sent down from the White House by our President was unacceptable to Members on both sides of the aisle.

What was everybody crying about at that time? The size of the deficit. A high deficit is intolerable, we cannot stand it, we have got to do something about it. So, some of us, through long, long months of turmoil and argument back and forth did our best to fashion a budget resolution that was accepted by a very narrow margin on a bipartisan basis by this House. There were those of us who would like to have cut much deeper on the expenditure side, much deeper in entitlement areas, but the votes simply were not there. Yes, you could get 50 votes for such and such a proposition, but you could not get 218.

I am reminded, when the gentleman from California and this Member were 2 of 12 voting on the minimum benefits question on social security, so I know how tough it is to get expenditure reductions, including entitlements, of meaningful proportions around here when the chips are down.

So then you come to the conclusion that you cannot cut anymore in expenditures or entitlements and you do not want a bigger deficit. What do you do? You have to be responsible and say maybe we have to come up with some revenue, at least some correction from what we did in our overzealous attitude of last year.

So that is why we are here today to implement the $20 billion of revenue that is required by the 1983 budget resolution.

The other body has acted on its own. There is no good or perfect way to raise taxes. That feeling is felt by most Members on either side of the aisle or on either side of the Capitol.

What we wanted to do on our side of the aisle particularly was to preserve the main thrust of the President's initial program, straight rate reductions for individuals across the board. We have been able to do that up to this point.

We also have more rapid cost recovery and excelerated depreciation for business and industry. We want to preserve those two basic tenets of what the President was initially talking about.

A lot of these other things that got added to the tax bill last year were not necessarily proposed by the President. They were done collectively by this Congress. So there is plenty of blame to go around on whether or not it was too big a tax cut.

But I have to say to my Members, you do not want to give away a third year of the individual tax rate for individuals. That is the only way the average individual gets to catch up with everybody else. That is a good principle. We want to hold on to it.

But we know there are Members on the other side who would like to change that, because there is a big chunk of revenue there if you want to get it in one place. Yes, I think we did not want to turn away from indexing, from that very sound principle, but there were those, oh, I remember, too who said there is another big chunk of revenue so let us do away with indexing.

Then there were those who did not want to enact a broad energy tax. I do not. There were those who were raising the specter of that.

Now, when you think about what the alternatives are, and what one of the other body has done you had better think a little bit beyond the end of your nose on how do you get $20 billion in additional revenues in an election year.

Half of the bill of the other body is in the enforcement area. It could be called in some respects reform.

Here in the House I cannot ignore the makeup of the ratio of the Ways and Means Committee. My colleagues know how we argued against that 23 to 12 ratio at the beginning of this Congress. I have to point that out to Members on my side. Some of our Members, as the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. CRANE) said, did not vote for the budget resolution and would not vote for any tax bill whatsoever.

And I have to remind my friends on the other side of the aisle, several of your budget resolutions called for revenue considerably more than what we talked about in our budget resolution. You were wanting to raise taxes by $37 billion the first year, $147 billion all told. I recognize the Senate bill is not perfect, but it is highly unlikely that our House Ways and Means Committee action on its own would report a bill that could pass this House. That is the way I look at it.

By the same token, we would not want to embrace the Senate bill in total as we would have nothing to compromise with.

I do not like the choices we have. No one does.

But I have to come down on the side of moving ahead to get something done, so I have to support the motion here to go to conference.

By supporting the move to go to conference on a tax bill I want to make it abundantly clear, too, that I want to see some positive action to implement the spending cuts of the budget resolution before our final approval of a conference report on a tax bill. I would like to give ample notice of that at this time.

Notwithstanding the negatives in the Senate passed revenue measure, I want to remind those who want to achieve some meaningful expenditures and entitlements cuts that you get a lot more in a Senate-passed bill than you would ever get in a bill reported out of the House Ways and Means Committee.

Finally, while the Democratic majority may like to keep its fingerprints off this tax bill, I would like to remind you again that each of your budget resolutions and substitutes that I saw offered at one time or another carried higher revenue figures.

I remember my dear friend from Illinois, Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI, who came to me and said, "Bob, you know, I have to support the resolutions from my side. But privately, in view of those revenue requirements, I hope your resolution passes, because there is no way that we are going to be able to come up with revenue in excess of $20 billion."

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MICHEL) has expired.

Mr. MICHEL. That is too bad, Mr. Speaker. I had something especially complimentary to say about you, but I will leave it at that and hope that you will support the motion.

The SPEAKER. Did not the gentleman ask to revise and extend?

● Mr. SANTINI. Mr. Speaker, as the House appoints its conferees to meet with the other body on H.R. 4961, I wanted to take this opportunity to express my concern about a very harmful provision of that legislation which was added at the last moment by the other body. I am referring to the limitation on deductibility of business meal deductions.

The issue has been examined in the past by the Committee on Ways and Means and has been rejected after a close examination of the facts. Now I fear that in attempting to achieve a package which the House can support, this critical matter will not receive the attention it deserves. The impact of this Senate provision could have a dramatic impact on employment in the food services, accommodations, and related industries. The provision would cost Americans over 135,000 jobs at a time when unemployment is as high as 9.4 percent.

The experience of the French Government, which imposed similar taxes on business meals and entertainment, is instructive. The French restaurant business declined 12 percent as a result.

As chairman of the House Travel and Tourism Caucus, I am concerned about the impact on the employees in the travel and tourism industry. The tourism industry employs a large number of women and minorities, two groups which are disproportionately suffering from unemployment. We can ill afford to add to their employment problems by hurting the industry which provides opportunities to them.

The deductions for business meals in the current law are permissible only for legitimate business meals. I do not believe it is sensible to deny a deduction for a legitimate business expense. If there are abuses, the Internal Revenue Service should enforce the requirement that these expenditures are for business purposes. Legitimate expenditures should not be unfairly taxed.

Another provision which concerns me is the possible addition of an unworkable scheme for reporting tip income. This proposal was defeated in the other body, but could be resurrected in conference. The proposal which was formerly in the Senate measure would have required employers to assume that tipped employees received a fixed percentage in gratuities. It would also have made the employer designate which employees received tips and allocate among employees the percentage of receipts from restaurant operations.

The restaurant and accommodations industries do not need the increased burden of serving as the tax collector. Current law already requires employees to report their tip income to their employers each month. The added paperwork and potential labor-management problems resulting from such a new provision would lead to higher costs for customers, and lower productivity for restaurants as well as unfair taxation for restaurant workers.

In summary, I believe these issues deserve a thorough examination before any action to impose new burdens is contemplated. I urge the conferees to carefully consider the impact of these unwise ideas.●

● Mrs. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the motion to send H.R. 4961 to conference. I do not support every aspect of the bill, but I certainly do enthusiastically embrace the 75 percent of it which represents tax reform and loophole-closing. There is little question that an important part of balancing the budget is insuring that all sectors pay a fair share of taxes. I believe that the reforms contained in this bill will insure that we move closer to insuring that the tax burden is shared equitably.

There are two points I would like to note, Mr. Speaker, for the RECORD. These are, first, the wide editorial support for this bill from all persuasions. Second, I would like to take exception to the committee majority's inability to accept reform of taxes on oil companies. Clearly, if the committee leadership had permitted, revenues could have been raised from oil as opposed to telephone taxes and changes in medical deductions. Unfortunately, the 23-to-12 ratio, Democratic-to-Republican committee majority, refused to favor consumers over oil companies in this instance.

In the main, however, this represents the first real reform of loopholes in some time. I note the overwhelming support from both sides of the aisle for this bill and, with the reservations noted, will support the motion to send it to conference.●

● Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this motion to go to conference on the Senate tax bill.

I believe this bill will aid our efforts to reduce the unprecedented deficits, which are helping to keep interest rates so devastatingly high. It also will go a long way toward initiating meaningful tax reform to benefit the general taxpayer. Included in the bill are provisions to strengthen the minimum tax so that all wealthy individuals and corporations will pay at least some taxes; to reform the investment tax credit; to restrict and to repeal in 1985 the safe harbor leasing provision allowing the buying and selling of tax breaks; and to reform some of the abusive provisions of corporate pension plans which allow some participants to shelter from taxes an inordinate amount of income.

Mr. Speaker, I applaud these efforts to bring a measure of fairness and equity to our very complicated Tax Code. I believe the average taxpayer is often forgotten in the consideration of tax legislation, and I am pleased to note that on the whole this bill closes some loopholes available only to special interests.

However, I take strong exception to one of the bill's provisions: The institution of a withholding tax on interest and dividends. I am cosponsoring several resolutions opposed to this withholding tax because it will provide a disincentive to productive saving and investing precisely at the time when our country needs to increase these activities, which are imperative to economic revival and expansion. Additionally, it seems this provision will prove to be an onerous administrative and regulatory burden to the financial institutions paying the interest and dividends—a burden at odds with the President's efforts to provide regulatory relief.●

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks on the matter currently under consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, assuming that the House rules are constitutional, does this motion violate the House rules in any way?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Let me say in response to the gentleman that there was a bill that passed this House that was reported out of the Committee on Ways and Means and was sent to the Senate. The Senate added an amendment to that bill and returned it to the House, so we are acting on an original bill that passed this House as amended by the other body.

There is a motion to go to conference on a House bill with a Senate amendment, so consequently, the House is acting within the rules.

On the issue of constitutionality, the Chair never responds to a constitutional question.

Mr. JACOBS. I made the assumption that the House would not violate the constitutional rules.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI).

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. MARTIN of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, on that, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device and there were—yeas 208, nays 197, not voting 29, as follows:

The Clerk announced the following pair:

On this vote:

Mr. O'Brien for, with Mr. Beard against.

Mr. FARY changed his vote from "nay" to "yea."

So the motion was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MOTION TO INSTRUCT CONFEREES

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged motion.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CONABLE moves that the managers on the part of the House, at the conference on the disagreeing vote of the two Houses on the bill H.R. 4961, be instructed to insist that the conference report result in attainment of expenditure reduction levels no lower than those required by the conference report on the first concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1983, and revenue raising levels equal to those required for fiscal year 1983 by the conference report on the first concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1983.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York (Mr. CONABLE) is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to reassure my colleagues I will not take the full hour explaining this comparatively simple motion to instruct.

It is my intention that the conferees should have ringing in their ears as they go to conference the instructions of the House that they comply with the requirements of the budget in their deliberations.

It is going to be a difficult conference at best and it would be easy to simply back off the expenditure reduction requirements which are involved in the Senate bill, and which have been generally met by the Senate, or to back off the revenue raising requirements of the budget also.

It seems to me that it would be a good idea for everyone to understand from the start that we take our responsibilities seriously in this conference.

Mr. Speaker, obviously the conference is a controversial institution, as we can judge from the last vote, and it should be an exemplary effort on the part of the conferees to achieve the goals of the Budget Act.

Mr. Speaker, I yield, for purposes other than for amendment, to the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI).

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I have consistently found objectionable instructing conferees to be bound by instructions. However, in this unusual instance I think that in the spirit of cooperation that we could very well stay within the constraints of the budget resolutions, and I find no objection to the gentleman's motion to instruct.

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to instruct offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. CONABLE).

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 299, nays 89, not voting 46, as follows:

Messrs. DANNEMEYER, SOLOMON, PHILIP M. CRANE, DANIEL B. CRANE, ANDERSON, and FOUNTAIN changed their votes from "aye" to "no."

So the motion to instruct was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints the following conferees:

From the Committee on Ways and Means for the entire bill and the Senate amendment and modifications committed to conference, with the exception of subtitle B (medicaid) of title I and title IV (Airport and Airway System Development) except for section 406 (e) of that title and with the exception of section 395 of the Senate amendment and modifications committed to conference: Messrs. ROSTENKOWSKI, GIBBONS, PICKLE, RANGEL, STARK, CONABLE, DUNCAN, and ARCHER.

THE 60TH ANNIVERSARY OF U.S. RECOGNITION OF THE BALTIC STATES

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SEIBERLING). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. DOUGHERTY) is recognized for 60 minutes.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. DOUGHERTY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks, and include therein extraneous material, on the subject of my special order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. Mr. Speaker, 60 years ago on this date, the U.S. Government officially recognized the three Baltic Republics of Estonia, Lithuania, and Latvia. These Baltic States had been independent for approximately 4 years, and the United States felt in 1922 that it was time to welcome Estonia, Lithuania, and Latvia into the international arena. From that moment in 1922, these new nations achieved even greater legitimacy and established a firm basis for their right to exist.

These small countries, when grouped together, occupy about the same amount of territory as New England. Yet, they have given the world much through their culture and knowledge, and will continue to do so in the future.

When the Baltic States first became independent, they were constantly under pressure from their two powerful and aggressive neighbors, Germany and Russia. Estonia, Lithuania, and Latvia were the object of many political quarrels between the two huge countries nearby, who fought over the natural resources available in the area.

Eventually, as everyone here tonight knows, the Russians entered the Baltic States and took control of the governments. At that time, the many Balts who protested were arrested, sent out of the country, or killed.

Here in the United States, it is difficult to realize how hard the struggle for freedom has been for the Baltic people. But we cannot forget that not long ago, we Americans were oppressed by colonial overlords. However, with some assistance from friendly nations, we carried through a revolution and established our freedom as the United States of America. Thus it is incumbent on us to vocally support those people whose nations have been forcibly invaded and occupied. The inhumane actions of the Soviet Union cannot be legitimized simply by waiting for the nations of the West to forget all about the Baltic States.

For that reason, we have introduced a resolution in the House, House Resolution 526, which reaffirms the U.S. recognition of the Baltic States in 1922. Forty-four Members of the House have cosponsored this resolution, and I am confident that many more will do so in the near future. When this measure is passed by the House of Representatives, it will send a strong signal to the Soviet Union that we have not forgotten the plight of the Baltic nations. I would like to enter the text of the resolution into the RECORD.

H. RES. 526

Whereas the Baltic States of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania gained their independence and were officially recognized by the United States in 1922;

Whereas the Soviet Union has illegally occupied the Baltic States since 1941, thereby denying Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania their rightful independent status;

Whereas the Soviet Government has refused to allow the freedom of the Baltic people and has violated the human rights of those people;

Whereas the people of the United States have consistently supported a free Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania through their elected representatives in Congress; and

Whereas July 28, 1982, marks the sixtieth anniversary of diplomatic recognition of the Baltic governments; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the House of Representatives reaffirms its commitment to the freedom and independence of the Baltic governments of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania and supports the continued recognition of such governments by the United States.

In the meantime, we in the United States will officially designate the Baltic States as independent countries on American maps. Earlier today, I introduced an amendment to the Department of Defense authorization bill calling on the Defense Mapping Agency to specifically label the Baltic nations as independent countries, not as territories of the Soviet Union. I would like to enter the text of the amendment in the RECORD as well:

AMENDMENT TO H.R. 6030, AS REPORTED OFFERED BY MR. DOUGHERTY OF PENNSYLVANIA

At the end of the bill, add the following new section:

DESIGNATION OF ESTONIA, LATVIA, AND LITHUANIA ON DEFENSE MAPS

SEC. 902. None of the funds appropriated pursuant to an authorization of appropriations in this Act may be used to prepare, produce or purchase any map showing the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics that does not—

(1) show the geographic boundaries of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania and designate those areas by those names;

(2) include the designation "Soviet Occupied" in parenthesis under each of those names; and

(3) include in close proximity to the area of the Baltic countries the following statement: "The United States Government does not recognize the incorporation of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania into the Soviet Union".

Mr. Speaker, with my colleague and cochairman BRIAN DONNELLY, the Ad Hoc Congressional Committee on the Baltic States and Ukraine has been working to gain the support of the House for these amendments, resolutions, and letters for Baltic freedom. We will continue to work in this regard every year until the Baltic States are independent once again.

● Mr. HERTEL. Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleagues Mr. DOUGHERTY and Mr. DONNELLY for calling a special order for, today, the 60th anniversary of this Nation's continuing diplomatic recognition of the Baltic States.

On June 14, 1940, during the early days of World War II the Soviet Union fulfilled its end of the bargain struck in the infamous Molotov-Ribbentrop act of August 1939. The Soviet Army marched into the Baltic Republics, violating the neutrality of these nations, and effectively sealed the nations of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania off from the prying eyes of Western media and the governments of the West. In Lithuania alone the Soviets used more than 300,000 troops along with armor and aircraft; that is one soldier for every 12 inhabitants of the country. The Soviets immediately formed a puppet regime and called it the Lithuanian People's Government. The legislature, now dominated by Communist Party members, petitioned the Supreme Soviet of the U.S.S.R. to incorporate Lithuania, and the Soviets were ready to comply—on August 3, 1940, Lithuania was designated a Soviet republic. Estonia and Latvia were also summarily dealt with and became Soviet republics. I am proud that the United States Government has consistently refused to recognize such a blatant violation of international law. It is not just a matter of principle, but also a matter of public education that we continue our diplomatic recognition of the Baltic States.

It has been 42 years since the Soviet Union perpetrated this great fraud against their neighbors. An entire generation has been born and grown up without any first hand experience or memory of World War II. It is, therefore, essential that the public be reacquainted with the events of the last European war. Time has not altered the basic principle that a great injustice was committed and remains unsettled. Although we cannot bring about a resolution now, a time will come when the Baltic States will be able to rejoin the family of independent nations. This latest period of foreign occupation and domination is just an interlude in the long history of the Estonians, Latvians, and Lithuanians. During some centuries the Baltic peoples lived freely and during some they suffered the iron hands of foreign tyrants. It is interesting to note that Lithuania has in the past enjoyed a longer period of freedom and independence than our Nation has existed. Fiercely independent in their thinking and very stubborn, I have no doubt that the Baltic nations will see an end to Soviet repression.

In the meantime, the United States must do its share to keep the issue of Baltic independence on the agenda of world politics. The people of the Baltic nations are doing their part in resisting sovietization and russification of their national character, their belief systems, their democratic spirit.

Nations made up of small industrious farmers, the Baltic States before the outbreak of World War II would have seemed familiar and comfortable societies for Thomas Jefferson and John Adams. Everyone had a stake and interest in developing their societies and raising their standard of living. As soon as the Soviet army arrived and the incorporation was declared, the Soviets began a systematic campaign of violence against the populations of these nations. The Soviets needed to wipe out any opposition to the new order and to consolidate their position in the newly acquired territories. By way of note, we know from Soviet maps captured during World War II that the Soviets had designs on the Baltic States long before they actually invaded those countries. Over 665,000 Estonians, Latvians and Lithuanians were deported to Siberia and thousands more killed in the war with the Baltic guerrillas who took to the forests to establish a network of armed opposition to the Soviets. Of course, more people were killed when the front changed and Nazi Germany invaded her old ally the Soviet Union. So many people were lost during the war that the Baltic countries are only now regaining the population figures they had before the war. Of course, the population mix has changed and the nations are in threat of being swamped by settlers from other Soviet territories.

When the Soviets returned the second time in 1944, they were determined to stay and began a brutal plan of collectivizing the countryside. Farmers were forcibly evicted and deported, more troops than ever were brought in to destroy the guerrilla movement. Even so, the partisans continued their struggle until the early 1950's when isolated by numerous divsions many in the resistance movement gave up their arms in an amnesty program offered by the Soviets.

Over the years the Baltic peoples have found their own ways to resist the Soviet plan to alter their historic paths of economic and social development. One of the institutions which has grown up to be a real thorn in the side of Soviet rule has been the chronicle of the Catholic Church in Lithuania and the Church of the Catacombs which it represents. The Chronicle has managed to publish a record of Soviet violations of religious freedoms for 10 years now. It is true samizdat literature, being copied by hand or on typewriters and circulated to whoever will risk wrath of the Soviets. As the ranks of the leadership are thinned by KGB arrests and prison sentences, new people step forward to carry on the work of the Chronicle.

The Helsinki watchdog committees in the Baltic also attest to the gutsiness of their peoples. There are presently over a thousand Batlic political prisoners known to Western sources. We cannot abandon these people; they have already demonstrated their determination for freedom and their willingness to do what is necessary to keep their national characters intact. The least we can do is remind the world that there once were free and independent states on the eastern coast of the Baltic Sea.●

● Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, I commend my colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, for calling today's special order on the anniversary of a unique American diplomatic tradition that has remained in force over the past 60 years, that being our recognition of the free, legitimate governments of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania in office at the time of the brutal Soviet annexation of those nations. Many of our colleagues in the House and the Senate have signed a letter to Soviet President Brezhnev on this occasion, calling for an immediate end to the illegal occupation of the Baltic States.

I insert the text of the Congressional letter to Soviet President Brezhnev at this point in the RECORD.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., July 28, 1982.

Chairman LEONID BREZHNEV,
The Presidium, The Kremlin,
Moscow, U.S.S.R.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Today, the United States marks the 60th anniversary of its continuous recognition of the free governments of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania. For the past 41 years, through each administration, this tie has been maintained in the face of the illegal occupation of the Baltic States by the Soviet Union. This occupation by force has prevented the Estonians, Latvians and Lithuanians from exercising their internationally-guaranteed right to self-determination.

The people of the United States, through the efforts of their Representatives in the House and Senate, have consistently supported a free Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania. In successive Congresses, through individual statements and resolutions, representatives from both political parties have risen to demand a restoration of the Baltic States' rightful place in the international community. We in the United States are committed to an international community based on the principle of justice and grounded in respect for human dignity.

We, the undersigned members of the House of Representatives and the Senate, firmly support our government's continued recognition of the free and legitimate governments of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania. The ties that bind the American people to the Baltic States are strong and lasting. We reissue the call on this 60th anniversary for an immediate end to the illegal occupation of the Baltic States by the Soviet Union, and we look forward to the restoration of freedom in the Baltic States.●

● Mr. PEYSER. Mr. Speaker, we cannot take for granted the importance of our support for the Baltic States. In our own country, we cherish freedom and, most importantly, enjoy its rewards and benefits. However, the people of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania can only dream of freedom in their current situation of Soviet occupation. Their day-to-day struggle to keep their linguistic, ethnic, and religious identities prevent them from experiencing true liberty. At this time I wish to commemorate the 60th anniversary of our country's recognition of the free Baltic States. The people of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania desire freedom and have prospered under its abilities and values in the past.

Between World War I and II, the three Baltic States surpassed their pre-1914 standards of living through hard work and a dedication to democratic principles. Their belief in individual freedom promoted a cultural renaissance and allowed them to independently assume the obligations of a sovereign state in the international community with the exchange of diplomatic representatives. The rush of Hitler's army brought the end of independence for the three Baltic nations. The German army defeat allowed the Soviet power to establish their own preferred system of government.

The people of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania have not forgotten the value of democracy, despite a Soviet campaign of massive deportation to replace Baltic citizens with Russian stock. Their personal desire for genuine freedom fuels their current struggle for independence. We must continue to demonstrate our resounding disapproval of the Soviet Union's policies in Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania, and increase the pressure on the Soviet Union until the same inalienable rights that we are devoted to in the United States also become the source of satisfaction for the Baltic people.●

● Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, July is traditionally a month of festive celebration of the virtues of liberty and freedom. Of course, every July 4 we in the United States mark the signing of the Declaration of Independence. For the people of France, July 4 is Bastille Day, an asserting of their independence from tyrannical and autocratic rule. While fortunate people who possess liberty and freedom celebrate the month of July, countless others find that July brings no relief from the dark cloud of oppression that lingers over their heads. Today, we focus our attention upon the people of Estonia Latvia, and Lithuania, who, like too many people in our world, must continually suffer under brutal repression and injustice.

The suppression of the Baltic States is an occurrence which has become all to common in today's world. The people of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania are denied their most basic human rights, including the right to express their beliefs, the right to participate in self-government, the right to freely travel, and the right to worship, free of degradation and fear. However, in spite of hardship, the Baltic people continue to strive for liberty and freedom.

Today, on the 60th anniversary of the United States' recognition of the Baltic governments of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania, it is appropriate that we salute the bold people of these nations. This recognition is a fitting tribute to their valiant attempts to secure liberty and justice in their respective countries.

Mr. Speaker, we are a proud Nation, one with a long-standing heritage of democratic and humanitarian principles and values. Given this tradition, we hold a special place in our hearts for the people of the Baltic States. Through their perserverence, they lend credence and meaning in the very concept of human rights—dignity, decency, and freedom from tyranny.●

● Ms. FERRARO. Mr. Speaker, today the United States marks the 60th anniversary of its continuous recognition of the free Baltic governments of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania.

The U.S. Government has never recognized the occupation of the Baltic States by the Soviet Union. The United States has never given up the principles of political freedom and self-determination for Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania. American support for Baltic causes is traditionally important and right.

Over 40 years of oppression has not destroyed the strength of the Balts.

Although Soviet tyranny over Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania continues today, it has not succeeded in crushing the independent spirit of their citizens, who stubbornly resist the attempted obliteration of their linguistic, ethnic, and religious identities.

The Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and the events in Poland, as well as the campaigns against dissidents, have shown time and again Soviet brutalities in the treatment of the peoples they have invaded. The time has come for an end to the Soviet occupation of Baltic soil. I, therefore, urge my colleagues to join with other freedom-loving peoples throughout the world in support of a restoration of the Baltic States' rightful place in the international community.

Mr. Speaker, we must all support the struggle of the Baltic people to reachieve independence. The Estonian, Latvian, and Lithuanian cultures go back for thousands of years, and deserve not to be ignored—or forgotten.●

● Mr. McHUGH. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to salute the brave and freedom-loving people of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania today, and to join in observing the 60th anniversary of U.S. recognition of the free and independent life these nations attained after the First World War.

These three nations—ancient in their history and languages and of critical significance in the shaping of modern Europe—flourished in the period of independence that followed the First World War. The United States brought honor on itself by the cordial and productive relationship it enjoyed with the Baltic States, and was enriched by its friendship with the Baltic peoples.

As a free man, I am proud of my country for its unbroken record of support for the right of the Baltic States to territorial sovereignty, political self-determination, and fully independent life. Ever since the Soviet Union forcibly absorbed the three countries in a naked act of aggression in 1940, the United States has refused to recognize the validity of the Soviet aggression and has continued to recognize the legitimate governments of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania through their diplomatic representatives in our country.

The people of the Baltic republics continue to demonstrate that, even under the Soviet subjugation that persists to this day, they thirst for liberty and continue to make dramatic sacrifices in pursuit of freedom. The United States is itself honored when it honors the people of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania for their bravery and supports the right of these nations to full and vital membership in the family of free nations. The example of their dedication to liberty inspires our own efforts to dedicate ourselves to the preservation and survival of liberty for all those who aspire to it.●

● Mr. RUSSO. Mr. Speaker, it is with a sense of both privilege and concern that I call your attention to an occasion which deserves our special consciousness. For today marks the passing of six decades since the United States first recognized the Baltic governments, of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania.

In one sense it is a somber moment, an occasion for sober reflection. For a survey of Baltic history recalls years of struggle; it recalls the inestimable hardship which scars the Baltic past. But today is also a celebration of our commitment to freedom and the brave Baltic people.

Baltic peoples have known the brutality of two wars, and of two aggressors whose ruthlessness remains unparalleled in human experience. There have been the deportations, the uprooting of people whose fierce nationalism proved a threat to those who would attempt to subjugate them.

The Estonian, Latvian, and Lithuanian peoples have borne a suffering unknown and perhaps incomprehensible to most Americans. Their sorrow has been the denial of freedom, the cold abrogation of the right to determine their nations' destinies. Sadly enough, even today the right to freedom, to self-determination remains unacknowledged by a powerful Soviet state.

It is a situation which outrages, which frustrates, and one which can lead to despair. Yet the anguish suffered does not undermine the strength of our commitment. That commitment can remain strong because of the indestructible human qualities of hope, courage, and fierce determination. Today we celebrate those qualities which compel us to pursue justice.

Today, on the 60th anniversary of the U.S. recognition of the Baltic States, I join my colleagues in renewing our commitment to freedom. Twenty years of Baltic independence will not slip quietly into the past. The identities of Latvian, Estonian, and Lithuanian peoples will never be submerged and we demand the justice so deserved by these proud and courageous peoples.●

● Mr. GUARINI. Mr. Speaker, today marks the 60th anniversary of our country's recognition of the Baltic governments of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania. The commemoration of this anniversary reflects two noteworthy achievements, the continued U.S. policy of refusing to legitimate the forceful and violent Soviet occupation of these once independent nations and the continued quest for freedom by the people of these Baltic countries.

The world must never forget that the independent nations of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania were invaded by the Soviet Union in 1940 and soon thereafter annexed into the Soviet Union. Over the last 40 years citizens of these countries have had to endure tremendous hardship as the U.S.S.R. crushed the economic, religious, and political life of these societies. As if matters were not bad enough, the Soviet Union has been engaged for several years in trying to smother the cultural heritage indigenous to these areas.

By continuing to recognize the legations of the governments of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania as being the legal representatives of these Baltic nations, the United States is helping to keep alive the flame of freedom for these countries. We are also honoring the dedication and determination of those citizens in these countries who cherish liberty and freedom, and work to keep the hope alive in the face of overwhelming oppression.

I would like to thank both CHARLES DOUGHERTY and BRIAN DONNELLY, the cochairmen of the Ad Hoc Congressional Committee on the Baltic States and Ukraine for calling this special order today.●

● Mr. BENJAMIN. Mr. Speaker, years of forced incorporation into the Soviet Union have not extinguished the fire of national commitment nor eroded the proud national identification of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania.

Only briefly enjoying independence in a long history of subjugation, the Baltic nations still manage to retain their native languages and customs. Recognizing the fiercely independent nature of the Baltic people, the Soviet Union tried to russify the Baltics to dilute the outstanding characteristics of the native population.

Yet the people of the Baltic States have succeeded in retaining their national identity and religion in spite of a long history of adversity.

Both Estonia and Latvia lived under the Teutonic Order of the Sword before being taken over by the Soviet Union. Their culture is Germanic and the vast majority of Estonians and a considerable majority of Latvians are Lutherans.

Lithuania, which almost extended to the Black Sea once, is the most populous Baltic State. It is a Catholic country and was united for centuries to Poland.

The strong sense of hope for independence is fostered by the strong desire of these people to once again shed the yoke of domination. The refusal of the United States and other NATO nations to legally accept Russian authority over the Baltic States is another reason for hope.

I look forward to and pray for the day when the Baltic peoples' hope becomes a reality. Our recognition of the 60th anniversary of U.S. recognition of the Baltic governments of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania is important as a reminder of our commitment to these people. We will continue in our recognition of the Baltic States until they can once again assert their independence and their people can be free of fear and endowed with the right to worship, assemble, speak and govern as they desire.●

● Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, today marks the 60th anniversary of continuous recognition of Lithuania, Lativia, and Estonia by the United States. The people of the Baltic States have over the years fought an ongoing battle against the tyranny of the Soviet Union in trying to maintain their national identity while also trying to illuminate to the free world the atrocities of Soviet communism. Although small countries, the perseverance and dedication of the people must be commended; as should their determination to keep alive the traditions and language of their homeland; especially, as the Soviet Union continues its cultural genocide in its ongoing attempts of russification of these small countries.

The United States has never recognized the illegal annexation of Lithuania, Lativa, and Estonia by the Soviet Union, and continues to voice its opposition to the Soviet Union. However, in international forums, such as the Helsinki Accords and the Madrid Conference, the Soviets masterfully spin their intricate webs of deceit, openly ignoring their promises to human rights, while continuing to harass and imprison those who voice their dissent of Soviet communism.

It is the United States which has allowed the Baltic people a voice through which it can appeal to other free nations of the world; to bring pressure on the U.S.S.R.; and to relinquish its terroristic treatment of Baltic dissidents. Therefore, it is necessary for the United States to continue its policy of nonrecognition, and to further demand the release of political prisoners of Estonian, Latvian, and Lithuanian nationalities from Soviet incarceration and return the right of self-determination and territorial integrity to the Baltic nations.

In commemorating this anniversary, we must recognize the responsibility of the United States to continue to support the cause of the Baltic people seeking to escape the clutches of Soviet communism. Only with the end of political repression, religious persecution, and cultural genocide in these nations can the legitimate aspirations of the Baltic people be fulfulled.

Today with President Reagan in the White House, the Soviets must deal with a new American tact in foreign policy. President Reagan is towing a line that is much tougher than those of his predecessors, and he understands the way in which the U.S.S.R. does business. President Reagan recently deomonstrated his support of the Baltic nations and all other oppressed nations in the Rose Garden signing of the Captive Nations Week Proclamation, a first in its history. The people of Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia can rest assured that with President Reagan in the White House their message will be heard and that the Soviet Union will hear it also.

Baltic Americans have for many years carried the fight outside of the Baltic States. Their battle has been effective because of the unity and backing of traditional and legitimate exiled organizations. It is these organizations who fully represent the exiled people of the Baltic States and should be so treated. The danger arises when unnecessary factions spring up and break the traditional channels and unity of past gains. Let us hope that the unity of all Baltic people is maintained legitimately and in the direction of continued progress.●

● Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, today marks the 60th anniversary of the U.S.' recognition of the Baltic governments of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania. We in the United States will continue to recognize these governments even as they are immorally and illegally represented by foreign tyrants.

When the Free World was reeling under the onslaught of Hitler and his Nazi armies, Soviet imperialism took advantage of this diversion to invade and occupy the small, neighboring states of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania. However, to the Communists' embarrassment, the remaining free peoples of the world did not overlook this unprovoked and heinous act of aggression.

Communist tyranny is no better than Fascist tyranny, and Americans shall never forget nor accept the Soviet occupation and oppression of these countries.

I congratulate my colleagues CHARLES F. DOUGHERTY and BRIAN DONNELLY for their conscientious efforts as cochairmen of the Ad Hoc Congressional Committee on the Baltic States and the Ukraine. The attention that we in America and especially Members of Congress give to the plight of these occupied countries is vitally important. We must diligently press the indictment of the Soviets for this outrageous crime against the people of the Baltic nations. We must keep constantly before the eyes of the world this grave violation of the rights and liberty of men until finally they are free again.●

● Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join with my colleagues in commemorating the 60th anniversary of the United States extending full recognition to Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania as sovereign nations. On this historic anniversary, I also take time to commend the people of the Baltic States for their bravery and courage in resisting the Soviet subjugation of their lands. We must continually remind ourselves that the blessings of liberty which we enjoy so much, are still not guaranteed to all peoples of the world.

On July 23, 1922, Acting Secretary of State Welles said, "The people of the United States are opposed to predatory activities * * * carried out by force." Indeed, we are opposed to any such activities carried against the Baltic States. This belief has been reaffirmed again and again by both Congress and the executive branch.

Mr. Speaker, today, our words and thoughts demonstrate to the captive people of the Baltic States that they are not forgotten; that we are not reconciled to their fate; and above all, that we live and pray for the day when all people are free of oppression and live in peace.●

● Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, I join with my colleagues in commemorating the 60th anniversary of the U.S. recognition of the Baltic governments of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania. It is important that we as a nation reiterate our support for the legitimate independent governments of these captive nations, which by alien aggression and armed force, have been denied the right of self-determination. There is no question that until the rightful claims of the Baltic States and their courageous people are fully recognized, mankind's freedom and peace stand in jeopardy. I voice these concerns in an effort to focus world attention on this enduring problem.●

● Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Ad Hoc Congressional Committee on the Baltic States and Ukraine, I am proud to join my colleagues in commemorating the 60th anniversary of American recognition of the Baltic States, which include the nations of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania.

I cosponsored legislation to designate June 14, 1982, as "Baltic Freedom Day," and similar legislation was passed in the House of Representatives and is now Public Law 97-196. A copy of my resolution follows:

JOINT RESOLUTION DESIGNATING BALTIC FREEDOM DAY

Whereas the people of the Baltic Republics of Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia have cherished the principles of religious and political freedom and independence; and

Whereas the Baltic Republics have existed as independent, sovereign nations, belonging to and fully recognized by the League of Nations; and

Whereas the people of the Baltic Republics have individual and separate cultures, national traditions, and languages distinctively foreign to those of Russia; and

Whereas the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (U.S.S.R.) in 1940 did illegally seize and occupy the Baltic Republics and by force incorporate them against their national will and contrary to their desire for independence and sovereignty into the U.S.S.R.; and

Whereas the U.S.S.R. since 1940 has systematically removed native Baltic peoples from their homelands by deporting them to Siberia and caused great masses of Russians to relocate in the Republics, thus threatening the Baltic cultures with extinction; and

Whereas the U.S.S.R. has imposed upon the captive people of the Baltic Republics an oppressive political system which has destroyed every vestige of democracy, civil liberties, and religious freedom; and

Whereas the people of Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia find themselves today subjugated by the U.S.S.R., locked into a union they deplore, denied basic human rights and persecuted for daring to protest; and

Whereas the United States stands as a champion of liberty, dedicated to the principles of national self-determination, human rights, and religious freedom, and opposed to oppression and imperialism; and

Whereas the United States, as a member of the United Nations, has repeatedly voted with a majority of that international body to uphold the right of other countries of the world, including those in Africa and Asia, to determine their fates and be free of foreign domination; and

Whereas the U.S.S.R. has steadfastly refused to return to the people of the Baltic States the right to exist as independent republics separate and apart from the U.S.S.R. or permit a return of personal, political, and religious freedoms: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Congress of the United States recognizes the continuing desire and the right of the people of Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia for freedom and independent from the domination of the U.S.S.R. and deplores the refusal of the U.S.S.R. to recognize the sovereignty of the Baltic Republics and to yield to their rightful demands for independence from foreign domination and oppression and that the fourteenth day of June, the anniversary of the mass deportation of Baltic peoples from their homelands in 1941, be designated "Baltic Freedom Day" as a symbol of the solidarity of the American people with the aspirations of the enslaved Baltic people and that the President of the United States be authorized and requested to issue a proclamation for the annual observance of Baltic Freedom Day with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

The U.S. Government refuses to acknowledge the Soviet occupation of the Baltic States, and the House of Representatives unanimously reaffirmed this position in 1975 with the passage of my bill to put the House on record that there has been no change in the longstanding policy of the United States on nonrecognition of the illegal seizure of the Baltic States. But beyond this, the United States must continue to call attention to the issue of Baltic independence in every available forum.

Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to join with Americans of Latvian, Lithuanian, and Estonian descent in the 11th Congressional District, which I am honored to represent, in the city of Chicago, and all over this Nation, in the commemoration of the 60th anniversary of United States recognition of the Baltic States.●

● Mr. DWYER. Mr. Speaker, for 60 years, the United States has recognized the self-determined governments of the Baltic States of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania.

Correspondingly, we have refused to acknowledge any legitimate Soviet presence in these now captive nations.

The Soviet Union took these nations by force in 1940 and a massive arrest of Estonians, Latvians, and Lithuanians took place by Soviet authorities, triggering more than 40 years of Soviet persecution of these valiant peoples.

Our Baltic compatriots are living under a Soviet yoke that includes economic exploitation, denial of religious freedom and total suppression of human rights and liberties.

Baltic recognition is among the most crucial and significant ways our Nation can thwart this Soviet totalitarianism.

Our commitment to the principles of liberty and self-determination requires no less. The people of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania have suffered Soviet domination for more than 40 years. A whole new generation has grown to maturity since these Republics were robbed of their independence.

This new generation, however, has not forgotten the dreams of its forefathers and nor should we, as we continue to recognize and strive for a free and self-determined Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania.●

● Mr. FARY. Mr. Speaker, it is with a deep sense of humility that I join with my colleagues on this 60th anniversary of the U.S. recognition of the Governments of Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania. On this day we are again reminded of the plight of the Baltic States and the realities of Soviet domination. Like the other Eastern European States, Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania have had their sovereignty violated and their freedom suppressed by the Soviet Union. Their domination has been carried beyond that of such nations as Poland and Czechoslovakia, however, for they have been incorporated into the Soviet Union. This Communist regime did not come into power by legal or democratic means, but by Soviet invasion and occupation of the Baltic States. The U.S. Government and her people have refused to recognize the seizure and forced "incorporation" of Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania by the Communists into the Union of the Soviet Socialist Republics. Diplomatic relations continue between the United States and these countries as the United States continues to recognize the legations of those governments as being the legal representatives of the Baltic Nations.

On this historically significant date, Americans must be aware of the tragedy of the Baltic Nations, aware enough to move beyond the tragedy in full and uncompromising support for these entire nations in search of dignity, freedom and self-determination. We must rise as a symbol of hope to help nourish the dreams of dignity where there is degradation, truth where there is violation of conscience, and freedom where there is fear.

There is but one standard of freedom, and its denial in any size or form, in any country in the world, is intolerable. The people of Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania tasted this freedom, and although a whole generation has grown to maturity since the Baltic Nations were robbed of their independence, they have not forgotten the dreams of their forefathers. We must not forget the dreams of ours. The Baltic Nations' struggle is a testimony of strength and courage that our forefathers too shared. The strivings of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania provide us with a daily appreciation for the sovereign rights and government by consent which we Americans exercise daily. We must continue to provide these States with inspiration to continue to struggle for these very freedoms which we enjoy.●

● Mrs. FENWICK. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to commemorate the fact that 60 years ago on this date the United States recognized the independence of the Baltic countries of Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania. This was, and continues to be, an important expression of our commitment to freedom and autonomy for all people of the world. Unfortunately, however, the Government of the Soviet Union does not share this commitment, and continues to dominate the political, economic, and social structures of these nations.

The dominance of the Soviet Union over the Baltic countries has occurred for much of the past 60 years, despite the opposition of the citizens of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania. The United States is well known as a strong supporter of human rights throughout the world. The situation in the Baltic countries provides another opportunity to demonstrate that we do not turn our backs on those people in need of our aid. It is, therefore, important that President Reagan, Secretary of State Shultz and Assistant Secretary of State for Human Rights Elliott Abrams do all they can to express to the Soviet Government our outrage at its insensitivity to the rights and wishes of the citizens of these Baltic countries.

It would be bad enough if the Soviet activity in Eastern Europe were solely a violation of the principle of fairness and common decency. However, the Helsinki agreements, signed in 1975, guarantee the human rights of world citizens. The Soviet Union's flagrant violation of this important piece of international law, signed by the Soviet leaders themselves, must not be allowed to go uncriticized and unchallenged. The people of the world have a right to expect the United States to speak out on these matters, we must take every opportunity to do so.

I commend the efforts of my colleagues, Mr. DOUGHERTY of Pennsylvania and Mr. DONNELLY of Massachusetts for their efforts to focus attention on this tragic situation. I hope that other officials of the U.S. Government will follow and express their views to the Government of the Soviet Union.●

● Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Speaker, for 60 years our Nation has refused to recognize the Soviet occupation of the Baltic nations, and today we reaffirm our support for the brave people of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania who continue to live a life deprived of freedom and liberty.

Generations of Baltic citizens have had to live with the nightmare of Soviet tyranny. Many live today who still remember the brutal onslaught and mass killings that resulted in the imposition of the Communist doctrine in these freedom-loving countries. For the younger Baltic people, the overthrow of their country is only a story that has been passed down from generation to generation, but the reality of continuing Soviet human rights violations is a very real and terrifying reminder of their situation.

While my colleagues, the cochairmen of our committee established to monitor the events in the Baltic area, have requested this time to reaffirm our support for the Baltic States, I want to express my thanks to the people of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania for being a source of inspiration to me personally and to all of the American people. Their continued quest for freedom in the face of oppressive Communist rule reminds us of the true value of freedom, which is all too often taken for granted in our own great country.

It is my hope that our continued support for these people will someday result in the cessation of Soviet rule in the Baltic lands so that these special friends of ours can fully enjoy the freedom and rights they have fought so hard to gain for the past 60 years.●

● Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, today marks the 60th anniversary of the U.S. recognition of the Baltic governments of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania. Even though these countries lived in freedom for only 22 years until they were brutally invaded and suppressed by the Soviet Union, the United States continues to recognize the legations of these governments as the legal representatives of the Baltic nations.

As a member of the Ad Hoc Committee on the Baltic States and the Ukraine, I have been making statements on the plight of the people of Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia for many years. I would like to again take this opportunity to express my deep concern that the Soviet Union live up to its international agreements on behalf of human rights and permit the free expression of culture, religion, and language by the people of the Baltic States. The Soviet Union continues to repress the nationalistic fervor of the Baltic peoples, who have shown great spirit and an irrepressible will to again be citizens of independent nations.

The United States has never recognized the illegal annexation of the Baltic States. Our Government has consistently voiced its opposition to the tyrannical conditions foisted upon the Baltic peoples. It is our continuing responsibility to encourage and foster the principles of freedom, independence, and self-determination which have inspired the people of the Baltic States to continue their struggle for fundamental human rights. I will continue to lend my support to this effort.●

● Mr. CARNEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in rememberance of the 60th anniversary of the U.S. recognition of the independent Baltic Governments of Estonia, Lithuania, and Latvia. We mark this day to remind the world of the independence of the Baltic nations that was brutally taken away by the Soviet Union.

The Baltic nations were free and independent states from 1918 until 1940 when the Soviet Union began its brutal occupation and complete annexation of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania. To its credit, the United States has maintained a consistent policy of nonrecognition of the Soviet annexation. This anniversary provides an opportunity for us to reaffirm our commitment to freedom and independence for the Baltic States. The Soviet annexation was illegal and barbaric and this repression of the Baltic peoples continues today. However, this continued repression has not crushed the spirit and determination of these strong people to preserve their identity and regain their right to self-determination.

This occasion has a special meaning for me because many of my constitutents have come to the United States from the Baltic nations. They were forced to flee their homelands when the Soviets began their violent occupation. I recently had the honor and pleasure of attending a Baltic festival on Long Island. The day I shared with these fine people reinforced the importance of this issue. The Latvians, Estonians, and Lithuanians suffered greatly under Soviet repression and they came to the United States to be free. However, many of their loved ones continue to suffer in their homelands today. The people of Estonia, Lithuania, and Latvia have maintained a commitment to freedom that should inspire us all. Today is an opportunity for all of us to express our support for them and to renew our commitment to the complete independence of the Baltic nations and an end to the Soviet occupation.●

● Mr. DAUB. Mr. Speaker, once again I rise to call to our attention to plight of the people of Latvia, Estonia, and Lithuania.

These valiant people continue their struggle against Soviet domination, and set a bold example for all oppressed people of the world. Today, July 28, 1982, marks the anniversary of our country's recognition of the Governments of Latvia, Estonia, and Lithuania, and presents us with an excellent opportunity to remind the Soviet Government that we will not cease, nor will the Baltic people, efforts to gain political and religious freedom for all individuals.

I ask my colleagues and all Americans to join me on this occasion to express our support for the struggle of the Baltic people; to let them know that we will continue to work for an end to their oppression, and for a new beginning to their independence and self-determination.●

PENNSYLVANIA TOWN MEETING TRADITION SUFFERS SERIOUS BLOW

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. ERTEL) is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. ERTEL. Mr. Speaker, last Saturday the town meeting tradition which many of us find so valuable in communicating with the residents of our congressional districts suffered a serious blow. This bedrock of democratic government normally allows our constituents to come forward without fear of retribution to offer their views, to air their grievances, and to seek assistance.

But during this particular town meeting in the Harrisburg, Pa., area, this spirit of free exchange was violated. Without anyone's knowledge or permission, a campaign operative of my opponent, Pennsylvania Gov. Richard Thornburgh, secretly taped a portion of the exchanges between those in attendance and myself.

This secret taping—taping without the consent of the parties involved—is in most instances a violation of Pennsylvania law. An attached opinion of the American Law Division of the Library of Congress affirms that this particular secret taping could be a criminal offense. According to this opinion, and I quote:

> Under Pennsylvania law the interception, disclosure, or use of wire or oral communications is a felony offense.

And—

A person is guilty of a felony in the third degree if he: Willfully intercepts, endeavors to intercept, or procures any other person to intercept or endeavor to intercept any wire or oral communication . . . an exception to these provisions is provided for interceptions of wire or oral communications "where all parties to the communication have given prior consent to such interception."

In accordance with the CRS opinion, I believe that the action in this instance is a violation of that law. Yet, this violation of the law is nothing compared to the chilling effect this incident will have on my future town meetings, and in all likelihood, the future town meetings of other Pennsylvania Congressmen and other elected public officials. The publicity of this secret taping easily could discourage those constituents who sometimes talk with us on a very personal basis during these meetings. Local residents come to their Congressmen looking for help. They do not come expecting a representative of the Governor, the chief executive of the State, to be recording their remarks for reasons unknown to them.

At this particular meeting, which began at 8:30 on Saturday morning, July 24, a small group of people had gathered to talk with me, just as in the hundreds of other town meetings I have held during my past 6 years in office. One man, a Mr. Bill Bisset of New Cumberland, Pa., came to the meeting with his young boy. They sat in the very front row. Mr. Bisset began to explain to me about a problem he had with a muzzle-loader gun; one apparently had somehow resulted in an injury to his son.

At first, I mistakenly thought Mr. Bisset was leading up to a question about disability insurance, since he had a cast on his arm. When I asked about this, Mr. Bisset said no, and moved closer to me even though he already was in the front row. He was talking to me directly in a low tone of voice. His son moved closer to me, too.

In the meantime, another man, subsequently identified as Gov. Richard Thornburgh's campaign press secretary, came into the room. This gentleman kept his head down as he entered and took a seat to the side of the room and he began diligently to peer into a newspaper where his face remained hidden.

As Mr. Bisset continued to talk about the muzzle-loader issue, my aide came forward and addressed Mr. Bisset and said, "Sir, I think you are being taped."

My aide pointed toward the gentleman whom I had seen enter the room and who had kept his face hidden from me.

Mr. Bisset was very upset, and apparently thought I was taping the meeting and our conversation. When I assured him I was not, both Mr. Bisset and I confronted the man doing the taping.

At this point I thought I recognized the man as being from the Governor's office. He denied it. I then asked if he was with the Governor's campaign office. He said yes. I asked if he was taping the town meeting and, of course, he had to say yes because we had the tape recorder there.

□ 2110

At that point, Mr. Bisset became even more upset. But we did nothing, except I instructed my aide to call the police.

Because I had prosecuted a similiar case several years ago, I knew, and informed the Governor's press secretary that he was committing a possible crime. While we waited for the police, I tried to continue the meeting. The tape recorder was turned off at that point, or at least I thought so.

As the meeting resumed, the Governor's press secretary got up and began to leave. Mr. Bisset, who had returned to talking to me about the muzzle loader incident with his son, got up, followed the Governor's press secretary and tried to stop him from leaving the premises. As he stopped the man told him he resented being taped without his permission.

Mr. Bisset had pursued the Governor's press secretary into the parking lot, and I proceeded to police headquarters, which was in the same building.

I with a police officer, went to the parking lot to stop the Governor's press secretary from leaving. He did stop his car, at which point we requested that the tape be surrendered as evidence.

He refused to give up the tape and said that he had some reason for keeping it. At that point the police officer asked him to erase the tape and turned to me and asked if the erasure would satisfy me? I told him I had no right to compromise a criminal proceeding.

At some point, Mr. Bisset, who had been visibly upset by the incident wanted to take physical possession of this man. I told him not to do so. However, Mr. Bisset said he would go with the police officer and the defendant to the police station, which was back inside the same building.

I went back to my town meeting. As I said, Mr. Bisset and the Governor's press secretary accompanied the policemen into the police station.

I do not know exactly what happened at the police station, except that I had the occasion to call Mr. Bisset after I was able to identify him by name, because we had never really finished our conversation about the muzzle loader. The story was interrupted because of this incident. When I contacted him, Mr. Bisset told me that when they went back into the police station the Governor's press secretary fooled around with a bunch of buttons on the tape recorder. He heard the tape and he believes that his own voice was on it. And he is not sure to this day whether the tape was erased.

He also indicated again that he had been upset by this incident, because on a previous occasion, just a couple of days earlier, he had gone to Pennsylvania State office to ask about his problem. Someone in the State government had referred him to me. He had subsequently called my office and learned I was having a town meeting.

He was upset because he thought he may have been deliberately sent to the town meeting for purposes other than getting information.

He accosted the Governor's man about this, asking if he knew that he was going to be at this town meeting. Of course, the Governor's press secretary denied it, at which point Mr. Bisset indicated that he had a problem with the Thornburgh administration. The press secretary held up the tape recorder and he told him to speak into it so Thornburg could hear it.

I only point out these facts to give a summary as to what I understand happened in the police station.

Because of this taping incident, Mr. Bisset is the first victim of the chilling effect on my constituents of this kind of activity. Mr. Bisset had approached the State game commission about his problem relating to muzzle loaders, and he is, I have been told, in litigation with the State over this matter. So, he was certainly concerned about the secret taping by the Governor's press secretary. One can understand the content and the context of Mr. Bisset's concern.

I would like to point out that this is the first time, to my knowledge, that one of my town meetings was secretly taped. My town meetings have been recorded by the news media from time to time during my 6 years in the House. News media taping, however, has never been secret and his always been preceded by making an announcement asking if anyone in attendance objected to the press being available to record and take photographs. So the people were always on notice if the press or others were taping the meeting.

But in this most recent incident, the Governor's representative did not announce or ask permission to tape. Apparently he purposely tried to hide his tape recorder in his newspaper.

One of my constituents evidently had seen the tape recorder in the newspaper but never said anything at the time. After the incident took place, that constituent told me of his observation.

This devious activity raises certain questions about how those elected to public office should conduct themselves with the powers with which they have been entrusted.

At town meetings, I prefer to discuss issues with my constituents and other interested persons in an informal atmosphere, without fear of government retribution. This informality between myself and my constituents has now been damaged and suspicion of government has been increased because of the underhanded and illegal actions that took place at this town meeting.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I will insert in the RECORD a copy of the report of the Congressional Research Service of the Library of Congress relating to this event.

The opinion referred to follows:

CONGRESSIONAL RESEARCH SERVICE,
Washington, D.C., July 28, 1982.

To: Honorable Allen E. Ertel. Attention: Phillip Rotondi.

From: American Law Division.

Subject: Surreptitious Recording of a Public Meeting as a Possible Violation of Pennsylvania Law.

This will respond to your request for a brief memorandum outlining our conversation of July 28, 1982, on the above subject. During that conversation it was related that an individual had secretly tape-recorded conversations which took place at a recent "town meeting" in Pennsylvania. Specifically you ask whether such conduct might constitute a violation of Pennsylvania wiretapping and electronic surveillance statutes.

Under Pennsylvania law the interception, disclosure, or use of wire or oral communications is a felony offense. Section 5703 of the Pennsylvania Criminal Code provides as follows:

Except as otherwise provided in this chapter, a person is guilty of a felony of the third degree if he:

(1) willfully intercepts, endeavors to intercept, or procures any other person to intercept or endeavor to intercept any wire or oral communication;

(2) willfully discloses or endeavors to disclose to any other person the contents of any wire or oral communication, or evidence derived therefrom, knowing or having reason to know that the information was obtained through the interception of a wire or oral communication; or

(3) willfully uses or endeavors to use the contents of any wire or oral communications, or evidence derived therefrom, knowing or having reason to know, that the information was obtained through the interception of a wire or oral communication. (18 Pa. Cons. Stat. Ann. § 5703 (Purdon 1982-1983)).

An exception to these provisions is provided for interceptions of wire or oral communications "Where all parties to the communication have given prior consent to such interception." (18 Pa. Cons. Stat. Ann. § 5704(4) (Purdon 1982-83)). Under Federal wiretap laws a "one party consent" exception applies to interceptions which are otherwise legal and noninjurious. (18 U.S.C. 2511(2)(d)). However, under Pennsylvania law the consent of just one party to a conversation will only constitute an exception to wiretap prohibitions in law enforcement or investigative matters involving suspected criminal activities. (18 Pa. Cons. Stat. Ann. §5704(2) (Purdon 1982-83)).

The Pennsylvania wiretap statute defines "intercept" as "aural acquisition of the contents of any wire or oral communication through the use of any electronic, mechanical or other device." But while this definition is a broad one, the nature of the "oral communications" protected is restricted. "Oral communication" is defined as "any oral communications uttered by a person possessing an expectation that such communication is not subject to interception under circumstances justifying such expectation." (18 Pa. Cons. Stat. Ann. §5702 (Purdon 1982-83)). (Italics supplied.)

While the taping of conversations at the meeting in question may constitute an "interception" under Pennsylvania law, it is unclear whether the nature of the meeting and assurances given or not given would result in the creation of the requisite expectation. No attempt can fruitfully be made here to assess the likelihood of criminal liability in this case without further details as to the circumstances surrounding the recording. But the absence of a blanket "one party consent" provision in Pennsylvania law creates at least the possibility that criminal liability could attach to the surreptitious taping of conversations intended to have limited circulation.

KENT M. RONHOVDE,
Legislative Attorney.

Mr. ERTEL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to conclude by saying that I will be forwarding a copy of my comments to the attorney general of the State of Pennsylvania for appropriate action. I believe that if we are to have a free society in which people can exchange views with their government they ought to have that opportunity without fear, without the possibility of repercussions and further, without hearing their words come back to them on a tape that they had no idea was being made or used.

Good government requires no less.

I would like to say one additional word about this incident; 8 years ago I prosecuted a mayor of the city of Williamsport and a director of public safety for having engaged in similar activity. At that time I was a prosecutor. I spent 2 years of my life prosecuting that case because I believed it was wrong to take a tape recording misinterpret it, and use it to spread mistrust among people in the community. That particular taping incident caused dissension in that community for years.

Now, I have no idea nor do my constituents how many taping incidents like this have occurred. This particular incident, one that, like the one 8 years ago, is one where the culprits were caught. How many have gone undetected?

I am sending this statement to the Attorney General, and I believe that action should be taken. This kind of conduct is not the kind of conduct that we condone in a free society.

A VICTORY OUT OF DEFEAT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. WEBER) is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. WEBER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to the courage and determination of a young man—a 20-year-old named John Muenzer, a student at the University of Toledo who lives with his parents in Maumee, Ohio.

There are people today who say that courage and determination are missing in America's youth. They say that today's youth are not willing to sacrifice or commit themselves to a cause. These people ought to meet John Muenzer.

John Muenzer's cause was to be the first person ever to swim across Lake Erie at its widest point, a distance of 53 miles. Last year he tried but was beaten by stormy waters after 20 miles of swimming against the waves.

Undaunted, this year John Muenzer rigorously trained again, by swimming 8 hours every day, in order to conquer these same waters. Once again last Thursday, with the people of northwestern Ohio anxiously pulling for him, he set out to do what had never been done.

At 3:35 in the afternoon on the Canadian shore at Rondeau Harbor in Erieau, Ontario, John Muenzer waded once again into the formidable waters of our Lake Erie. And for 26 hours and 35 miles he pulled his 6-foot 4-inch body through the waters of Lake Erie. But at the end of that grueling 26 hours he was still 18 miles from his goal and was defeated mostly by the chill temperatures of the Lake Erie water, which his lean body could no longer withstand. So at 5:40 on Friday afternoon his doctor decided to pull him into the boat.

John Muenzer knows and feels the deep disappointment of defeat; but in defeat he has won victory. For John's victory has been won in the admiration and pride that the watching people of northwestern Ohio feel toward this young man. John disappointed us only because his own faith and dedication inspired us to believe that he would succeed—for until John Muenzer said he could do it, no one thought it was possible.

John's victory was won in the hearts of people not in the record books. And for that reason it is a much sweeter prize than record books can ever confer. For records are made and broken often, but few are the times when an athlete wins the hearts of the people of the community that is his home.

John Muenzer won that victory because he is an aquatic pioneer. He has shown us the awesome power of Lake Erie. But more, much more than that, he has shown us dedication, determination, faith, and courage. He has shown us the capabilities and the limitations of the human body and the human spirit. He has vicariously taken us to the outer limit of human endurance. And to me and my constituents—the people of northwestern Ohio and the students of the University of Toledo, where John attends—he has made us proud that we can call him ours.

John is the first to say that the accolades for him need to be shared with those whose support and advice carried him through. His parents, Ray and Florence Muenzer; his good friend Mary Dillon; his teammate on the UT swim team, John Geisler; his coach, Bob Fountain; and his doctor, John Lombardo along with others all made the journey with him aboard the boat which was continually at his side for those 35 miles.

I'm proud that we have young people and young athletes such as John Muenzer, an exceptional person who proved that striving to succeed, rather than fearing failure, is its own vitrue.

Congratulations, John.

TO TARGET DEFENSE CONTRACTS TO LABOR SURPLUS AREAS

Mr. WEBER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of the Stratton amendment to continue the experimental job targeting program of the Defense Logistics Agency, which Congress began in 1981.

If you believe that a strong economy is essential for a strong defense; if you believe that a targeted jobs program such as this, to hold onto jobs in 1,170 areas of high unemployment, strengthens our economy; then my colleagues, you should support this amendment.

I favor a free-market approach to Government, other things being equal. But today we have special circumstances which justify special efforts. I refer to our high unemployment a national problem. Unemployment is not localized; it is dispersed throughout the country. We now have 1,170 areas in 47 different States where unemployment is 20 percent above the national average.

In this amendment we are continuing a program to attack joblessness in a way that President Harry Truman first put into effect in 1952 by Executive order. Until 1981, however, Congress exempted the Department of Defense from this program.

According to data reported by the Defense Logistics Agency for the year 1981, this program is working in the way Congress intended. Out of a total of 5,584 contracts awarded, labor surplus areas received 1,181 of these. Only 248 of these contracts required the payment of any cost differential, and the total differential was only $556,000, or less than 2 percent of the total contracts awarded—$30 million. Add to this cost $174,000 of governmental administrative expense.

These contracts saved or created 1,732 jobs in high unemployment areas. Simple arithmetic shows that the cost per job was only $421 per job.

When we consider what the taxpayers of America pay for some of the other job programs Congress has created, $421 to create or hold onto a job is real leverage. That alone would be reason enough to support this program, but consider also that each person out of work for a year costs the Government $16,000 in unemployment assistance and loss of tax revenue.

Mr. Speaker, I urge support for this jobs program because it is:

First, a cost-effective way to assist the parts of the country which are impacted by high unemployment;

Second, it provides a wider distribution of defense dollars; and

Third, it strengthens our economic base, as we help keep business alive which may otherwise fail.

I urge its passage.

A SALUTE TO THE BALTIC PEOPLES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. GOODLING) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Speaker, for over 40 years the Soviet Union has occupied and oppressed the three Baltic States of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania. Each of these countries had its customs, language, and religious traditions ruthlessly attacked in the Soviets' drive to extinguish the flame of nationalism and freedom which despite all odds still burns brightly in the hearts of all the Baltic peoples.

These countries only briefly enjoyed liberty and independence during modern times. Prior to 1917 they were under occupation of the Russian Empire. Since 1940 they have been under the occupation of the Soviet Empire. Whether under tzar or under commissar, the oppression remains the same, and it is an offense to human dignity the world over.

In these present times of potential upheaval, there are many who would have us trust the Soviet Union. The survival of the world is at stake, they claim. Let us not forget, however, that each of the Baltic States had placed its trust in the Soviet Union, signing nonaggression pacts with the mighty Soviet. And now, as a result of Soviet nonaggression those poor countries are held in thrall as they never were under the tzars. Let us not forget all the numbers of Estonians, Latvians, and Lithuanians who were sent to work camps in Siberia, there to work and freeze to death, unclad and undernourished. Let us remember those unfortunate souls and their children when we go to the bargaining table with the mighty Soviet. Let us remember how good his word is. We meet here today to pay tribute to the brave and admirable people of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania. We meet to salute their courage. Let us not later act in such a way as to make this salute to the brave Baltic peoples devoid of meaning.●

O'NEIL FORD, ARCHITECT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. GONZALEZ) is recognized for 15 minutes.

● Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, O'Neil Ford was beyond doubt one of the finest architects in America, or for that matter, the world. I count it among my greatest blessings to have known O'Neil Ford, to see some of his work, and to live in a community that was deeply touched by his spirit. Now he is gone, and I want to offer a few words in honor of his life and legacy.

O'Neil Ford had a passion for architecture. He was self-trained. No one can say from whence his inspired genius came, but I like to think that it was his lack of inhibition that drove him to create the special style that unmistakably graces a building he designed. A more inhibited man might have lacked the drive to follow the private vision, the inspiration that was Ford's. A more inhibited architect might have given in to the temptation of following convention. Not O'Neil Ford. He knew what he liked, and did what he wanted.

A building by O'Neil Ford is uniquely suited to its place, and to the people who see and use it. A building by O'Neil Ford is not daring, not flamboyant, not startling. Instead, it is comfortable, one that makes you glad you came. A building by O'Neil Ford is likely to have a quiet garden. It is likely to have a special kind of lighting fixture—one made to his specifications, and one that as often as not will be ceramic, one that somehow both fits into and dramatizes the place where it is set. There is a unity about buildings designed by Ford. Whether the building is a classroom, a home, a factory, or a monument, it will have lines that are simple, yet clearly unique. It will have materials that fit the place—that make the building complement its setting. A building by O'Neil Ford is one that makes you comfortable, proud. It makes you know that this is a good place, that it is a design that you won't see just around the corner.

After a while, those of us who live in San Antonio can go to any place in the country and pick out a building that bears the signature of O'Neil Ford. His work is that distinctive, that good.

O'Neil Ford had an absolute passion for his work. Bad architecture was a pain to him, and he never ceased to inveigh against work that was thoughtless, shoddy, intrusive, flashy, or just plain inefficient. He was a man whose buildings were meant to be efficient, workable, livable.

O'Neil Ford was what we would today call an environmentalist. He was realistic enough to know that anything built by human beings would disturb the earth, but his crusade was against thoughtless and needlessly destructive building. He believed in parks, he believed in cities that have openness and color, places that would enable people to be happy. If something was merely elegant, that would offend Ford. What he wanted was places for people, places that people would understand, accept, places that just plain fit. To Ford, this meant that wholesale destruction of trees and parks in the name of some greater urban good was an inexcusable sin. People need parks, and people need trees. Ford passionately opposed buildings and cities that denied people some kind of feeling for the earth and for each other.

O'Neil Ford probably believed that architects are very much like Antony's Caesar, but with a special difference. The evil architects do most assuredly live after them—but so does the good. The good that O'Neil Ford did is his monument. I do not know of any bad work he ever did. His greatness is not only in the buildings he designed, and they are many. It is in the spirit that he inspired, in the students that he taught, in the people whose lives he enriched. O'Neil Ford left a legacy of strength, of inspiration, of style. It will last as long as there are people who love cities, who appreciate and understand the necessity for buildings that are more than boxes, more than monuments, more than unique. What O'Neil Ford gave us was a passion for buildings that fit, buildings that work, buildings that are so good that you can always tell at a glance which one is a Ford design, which one is from his inspiration, and invariably, that building is the best one for miles around.

O'Neil Ford was a man with a powerful gift and a deep passion for using that gift. I will miss him, his profession will miss him, and his community will miss him. His passing grieves me deeply, but there is comfort in this: I had the pleasure to know him for a while, and his work and style will last always, and his spirit will be multiplied by his students, his gift has been given to us all, and for all time.●

LEGISLATION FOR NEEDED REPAIRS TO CAPE HATTERAS NATIONAL SEASHORE RECREATIONAL AREA

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. JONES) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. JONES of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing legislation that will authorize the Department of the Interior to assist the State of North Carolina in providing much needed repair and improvements to the main artery of transportation within the Cape Hatteras National Seashore Recreational Area. Approximately 46 miles of road within this park are in poor condition and some stretches of the road have deteriorated to critical levels. Many depressions in the road and crumbling asphalt along the shoulders have made driving through the national seashore a difficult and dangerous experience for seashore visitors.

I must point out that the road which is the subject of this bill, North Carolina Highway No. 12, is under the jurisdiction of the State of North Carolina. The State maintains a right-of-way within the park to insure that the relatively small number of residents who live on the barrier islands that comprise the national seashore can travel to and from the mainland. However, this road is used primarily by park visitors—not residents. The North Carolina Department of Transportation has computed that 85 percent of the yearly traffic on the road is attributable to park visitors.

I would like to emphasize to my colleagues the uniqueness of this situation. The Cape Hatteras National Seashore encompasses some 75 miles of barrier islands off the coast of North Carolina. The State donated part of this land to the Federal Government for use as a national seashore. Before the State did so, it constructed a paved road that ran the length of the islands in order to provide access for residents and recreational visitors alike. The State continued to repair and maintain the road even after the park Service took over the seashore. Thus, the Park Service has not been required to make expenditures for the construction and maintenance of a separate park road, except for a short, 5-mile section of road at the entrance to the park. Again, 73 miles of road through the park have been constructed and are being maintained by the State of North Carolina, even though the vast majority of traffic on the road has been, for the last 20 years, park traffic.

The National Park Service, within the U.S. Department of the Interior, is in charge of the Cape Hatteras National Seashore. I feel certain that the Park Service and the Department of the Interior share my concern over the condition of North Carolina Highway No. 12, a road which all of their park visitors must use to see the park. Present law, however, would prevent the Interior Department from expending funds for an improvement of the road because the road is technically owned by the State. Simply put, my bill would authorize the Department of the Interior to financially assist the State of North Carolina in the much needed improvement of Highway No. 12. My bill suggests that this be done, but it does not require it. Any terms and conditions of an agreement with the State on this matter would have to be acceptable to the Interior Department.

Many visitors, while they enjoy Cape Hatteras National Seashore, come away distressed at the poor condition of the road within the park. It affects the whole texture of their experience within the park. When the road is wet, depressions fill with water and create serious safety hazards. Without some help from the Interior Department, the situation can only deteriorate. I would, therefore, expect the Interior Department to give a high priority to obtaining an agreement with the State concerning the repair and improvement of this road and requesting funds to do this. The actual appropriations for such a project would be provided no sooner than fiscal year 1984.

The State of North Carolina has done more than its part to improve the road serving this national seashore. It has constructed the road and maintained it for many years. It also provides ferry service for visitors to the park. Park traffic has increased drastically in the last 20 years while resident traffic has remained stable. Even without the assistance of the Department of the Interior, the State of North Carolina in 1980 alone did some $5.3 million worth of repairs and reconstruction on the road. Given that the traffic wear on the road is 85 percent due to park traffic, I believe, that it is only fair to now ask the Interior Department to assist the State in further improving this road.

I ask my colleagues for their strong support of this bill.●

THE PURGE OF JOY SIMONSON

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. FRANK) is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, I am here because I think it would be a very grave error if we allowed to pass unlamented on the floor of this House the decision by the Reagan administration last week to purge Joy Simonson. Joy Simonson was appointed by President Ford, or in the Ford administration, to be Executive Director of the Advisory Council on Women's Education Programs.

We have made an effort in recent years to overcome the discrimination against women that has been endemic in all too many parts of American life. One area where that has been essential has been in education. The inequality that has existed in education clearly has had responsibility for much of the later inequality that continued.

The Advisory Council on Women's Education Programs, indeed the whole complex of organizations and people who work to try and provide equality within education, were all not simply attacked, but I think profoundly repudiated by the Reagan administration last week when a new Advisory Committee was sworn in, with no notice, with an obvious prearranged, orchestrated effort, changed the rules, fired Joy Simonson and hired in her place Rosemary Thomson, whose support for true equality for women is shown by her position as a high-ranking official of Phyllis Schlafly's Eagle Forum.

The administration was careful not simply to fire Joy Simonson for no cause, to repudiate in a very brutal way a woman who has worked hard under both a Republican and a Democratic administration for equality, gave her no chance to respond to any charges against her, but they replaced her with an ally of Phyllis Schlafly, obviously because Phyllis Schlafly has made herself the symbol of the opposition of efforts to provide true equality for women.

Now, this administration says, according to the President, that he is for equal rights, he is simply not for the equal rights amendment. That statement is clearly, flatly, blatantly at odds with the policies of the Reagan administration.

It is not an accident that for the first time in American history every public opinion poll that we have shows a strong disparity in political views between men and women, because the women of this country are not unaware of the extent to which the Reagan administration has tried to turn back the clock on the drive to equality. And the women in this country, by a much greater margin than the men of this country, disapprove of administration policies. It is partly, of course, because of efforts such as the President's effort to explain away unemployment by pointing to what appears to him to be the unfortunate whim of a lot of "ladies" to traipse off to the job market, apparently on a lark, as far as he can see. It is because there has been a systematic retreat from efforts to provide true equality.

To replace a dedicated, able, hardworking woman from the position of executive director of the Advisory Council on Women's Educational Programs with an assistant to Phyllis Schafly, who announced that women who were sexually harassed are themselves at fault for having invited it, is not simply to disrupt the execution of an important program, it is literally to add insult to injury. It is literally to add insult to injury to fire Ms. Simonson in so brutal and political a fashion and to replace her with a representative of the Eagle Forum. And that is, unfortunately, symptomatic of what this administration has done. It is of a piece with the recent removal, for no reason, of Leslie Wolfe, who was transferred away from her position of directing the Women's Educational Equity Act program. Enough pressure was generated so that she was brought back. But it is this kind of consistent assault on the programs and the entities that exist to provide true equality that accounts, in part, for the fact that women are so unhappy with this administration.

Mr. Speaker, the President has got to learn that it is pretty late in the game to try to kid people about something as fundamental as education.

I understand that he has got a political constituency on the far right which resents the notion that women should be equal. I understand that these people on the far right have made things like the Women's Education Equity Act and the agencies that administer it their target. The President has simply got to decide. He can continue to appease them. He can continue to allow a Joyce Simonson to be fired for no reason, a Leslie Wolfe's work to be disrupted by a transfer away from her position, the Eagle Forum to take control of this operation. He can continue to do that. Or he can argue that he seriously is interested in true equality for women. He simply cannot do both. And people understand that.

To date the President has sadly decided that appeasing his far right, appeasing those for whom the notion of human equality without regard to sex before the law is an offense, he has chosen to go with them. He ought not then to be surprised that he finds the women of this country unhappy.

Very few things have more demoralized those people committed to the difficult job of fighting to provide true equality in the educational area, and it is difficult, because at a time when there are cutbacks, as this administration has engineered, when funds for education at the elementary, secondary, and higher education level are being cut back, efforts to equalize become more difficult.

When people are being fired, when programs are being cut back, it is much harder than in an area of expansion to provide equality.

What the President has done has enormously complicated and made more difficult this task. And it simply makes a mockery of his protestations that he is for the equality and the rights but not for the amendment.

What he has done is once again sacrificed the cause of women's equality on the far-right-wing's political altar, and that may serve his political purposes, but it does not serve the needs of women of this country for education.

Mr. Speaker, I would like at this point to insert in the RECORD, along with my remarks, articles from the Chronicle of Higher Education, Judy Mann, Charles Babcock from the Washington Post, which not only described what happened, but which quote a number of important leaders in the movement for educational equity for women—Bernice Sandler and Barbara Stein, along with Willard McGuire, president of the National Education Association.

REAGAN "POLITICIZING" EDUCATION PANELS, CRITICS CHARGE

(By Cheryl M. Fields)

WASHINGTON.—Within 36 hours of being sworn in last week, the new members of the National Advisory Council on Women's Educational Programs changed the panel's rules, fired its executive director, and chose a new one from among candidates referred by the White House.

Critics charged that the actions were the latest in the Reagan Administration's campaign to "politicize" the supposedly independent councils that advise the Education Department on various issues.

The new executive director of the women's advisory council, Rosemary Thomson, has been a Republican Party campaign worker, has written books on the International Women's Year and the White House Conference on the Family, and since 1975 has been state director in Illinois of the Eagle Forum, an organization founded by the conservative activist Phyllis Schlafly during her campaign against the Equal Rights Amendment.

About an hour after they were sworn in last week, members of the women's advisory council voted to amend its procedures so that its executive director, Joy R. Simonson, could be fired by a majority vote of the members. The original rules called for a written notice and provided an opportunity to appeal. The members, who were appointed by President Reagan in April, then voted 13 to 4 to oust her.

Ms. Simonson said that no "cause" for the firing had been given. "One member said that she couldn't understand how the council could act when the members had never met me," said Ms. Simonson, "but another said she felt that she was familiar with my work since we had sent the new appointees copies of all our reports. She said she doubted that I could carry out the policies or implement the directives that this council would want."

"There was no further substantive discussion," she said.

After the vote to fire Ms. Simonson, the council members appointed a search committee, which spent the afternoon interviewing six candidates to replace her.

In fact, sources at the council meeting said, one candidate for the job appeared at the offices where the council was meeting even before it had voted to fire Ms. Simonson.

The candidates were referred to the council by Wendy Borcherdt, who handles women's issues for Elizabeth H. Dole, assistant to the President for public liaison.

Ms. Simonson was associate director of the Federal Women's Program at the Civil Service Commission and president of the National Association of Commissions for Women before becoming executive director of the women's advisory council.

The day after the search committee interviewed candidates, the council voted to hire Ms. Thomson as executive director and named Betty Ann Cordoba, an elementary school teacher from Woodland Hills, Cal., chairman.

The council was established by the Women's Educational Equity Act of 1974 to advise federal education officials on ways to achieve educational equity for women. It gives advice not only on the Women's Educational Equity Act program, but also on all federal policies and progams affecting the education of women.

SOME LEADERS ANGERED

Some women's leaders here were angered by the involvement of the White House and by what they viewed as orchestration of the council members' moves. Bernice R. Sandler, the first chairman of the women's advisory council after it was created and director of the Association of American Colleges' Project on the Status and Education of Women, said the actions "demonstrate a politicization that undermines and contaminates the work of the council."

"Presidents Ford and Carter appointed both Republicans and Democrats as members of the council, but I think President Reagan's appointees are all Republicans. After naming the members, the President is supposed to keep hands off, so the panels can function independently," she said.

"If the White House is involved in naming the executive director, you don't have an independent, autonomous council."

Before Ms. Simonson was hired, Ms. Sandler added, members of the women's council conducted a nationwide search for candidates for the job. "Joy was hired during the Ford Administration without regard to politics. I don't know what her politics are. To fire her summarily indicates a lack of concern and commitment about women's issues and a lack of understanding of the role advisory committees are supposed to play."

Said Barabara Stein, head of the Coalition for Women and Girls in Education: "We don't dispute the fact that the new council has the prerogative to fire the executive director, but the manner of the dismissal suggests that its members don't take women's issues or educational organizations very seriously."

"Joy Simonson knows a lot about sex equity in education," she added. "I don't think any of the groups that work on substantive issues that should be of concern to the council were ever consulted on Joy's record or what they should be looking for in an executive director. It is just one more of the many, many, many examples of the Administration's thumbing its nose to women."

A spokesman for the Education Department, when asked to respond to the criticism, said that "the department has a policy of not commenting on personnel matters."

Even before the latest moves, the appointments to the women's advisory council generated controversy. Susan Phillips, a researcher at the Conservative Caucus Foundation, originally was nominated to be a member of the advisory council.

Her nomination was withdrawn, however, because she also had been hired as a full-time consultant to the department to study ways to eliminate waste and abuse in the agency's grant programs.

Ms. Phillips, though, was one of the candidates interviewed to replace Ms. Simonson, but she withdrew her name from consideration before the council chose Ms. Thomson.

In another development, Education Secretary Terrel H. Bell ordered Leslie R. Wolfe, who formerly directed the Women's Education Equity Act program, transferred from a temporary assignment back to her old post. Women's-rights and education groups, as well as members of the Congressional Caucus for Women's Issues, had criticized department officials for shifting her to a 90-day assignment in the department's office of managment in May, just as officials of the women's equity program had begun reviewing applications for grants.

LATEST OF SEVERAL UPHEAVALS

The transfer came a few weeks after an article appeared in the Conservative Digest criticizing the program for supporting projects with allegedly "extreme feminist ideology" and calling for Ms. Wolfe's removal.

The controversy over the women's advisory council is the latest in a series of upheavals that began in January, when President Reagan began replacing the members of several education advisory councils, including those who still had one or two more years of their designated terms to serve. The Administration has insisted the President has the prerogative to do so. But some Congressional education leaders contend that their intent in passing laws establishing the councils was that members should serve set terms and not be changed automatically when a new President was elected.

Besides Ms. Simonson, the executive director of the National Advisory Council on Vocational Education, Raymond C. Parrott, was suspended after he refused to resign his post when requested to do so by President Reagan's new appointees to the panel.

The National Advisory Council on Adult Education voted to hire a new executive director recommended by the White House just one day after the old director, Gary A. Eyre, resigned to take a job outside the government.

SHE GAVELS NEW GROUP TO ORDER AND THEY FIRE HER

(By Charles R. Babcock)

Joy Simonson didn't expect to stay around long as executive director of the National Advisory Council on Women's Educational Programs after the Reagan administration installed new members. But she said she was surprised that the new council's first order of business Monday morning was to fire her.

And waiting in the wings, "even before the body was cooling," as Simonson put it, were applicants for her $57,500-a-year job. The winner was Rosemary R. Thomson, a Reagan election-campaign worker and Illinois state director of Phyllis Schafly's Eagle Forum. She had filled out an application for the job July 6, nearly two weeks before it became available.

The administration and conservative groups have targeted the $6 million-a-year Women's Education Equity Act (WEAA) program for extinction, but Congress has continued to appropriate funds. A Conservative Digest magazine article earlier this year on "defunding the Left" focused on the program and attacked grants it had made to feminist groups. The director, Leslie Wolfe, was transferred to another position after the article ran.

The 20-member advisory council makes policy recommendations to the program officials and reports to Congress on progress in women's education.

Thomson said in a telephone interview from her home outside Peoria yesterday that she had applied for the advisory council job after getting a call from an Education Department official "suggesting there may be a vacancy." She said she was a little surprised herself that she was hired so fast.

In her application, Thomson said she was a substitute schoolteacher in Morton, Ill. In an attachment covering her political experience, she said, "My suggestion for a huge banner 'Reagan Plays Well in Peoria,' captured the attention of the national media and was used again for the final campaign media event in Peoria the day before the Nov. 4th election."

Her volunteer work also has included being state director of the Eagle Forum since 1975 and publicity chairman for the local Chamber of Commerce's annual fundraiser, the Morton Pumpkin Festival.

Thomson said in the interview that she recently helped review applications for WEEA grants and testified in Congress against what she called "excesses" in awarding funds. Citing a $95,000 grant to a Berkeley, Calif., studio that made three half-hour films on how teenage boys could become babysitters and housekeepers, she said:

"That doesn't benefit education. That benefits a film maker. We don't need things like this at a time when people are begging for jobs and going hungry."

She said she opposes the Equal Rights Amendment and sees her new job as examining the program "and trying to get the most out of the taxpayer's money."

Simonson said she was disappointed at what appeared to be the orchestration of her dismissal. New council members read prepared amendments to the rules adding personnel matters to the agenda and deleting notices and appeals of terminations, she said.

"Previous councils have prided themselves on their independence and bipartisanship," she said. "I regret that it appears this council lacks independence."

Some women's and education groups already are protesting the firing.

Barbara A. Stein, chair of the National Coalition for Women and Girls in Education, wrote White House women's adviser Wendy Borcherdt yesterday that the abrupt firing of Simonson "is one more demonstration of the administration's lack of concern for the women of this nation."

Willard McGuire, president of the National Education Association, issued a statement saying that the quick action against Simonson "demonstrates this firing was organized and orchestrated by the administration."

WHAT IS RIGHT

(By Judy Mann)

Where else but in America can a substitute teacher from Peoria become one of the highest paid women in the Reagan administration?

This is precisely what has happened with the appointment of Rosemary Thomson as executive director of the National Advisory Council on Women's Educational Programs. But Thomson, who will earn $57,000 a year as the senior staff person advising Congress and the president on equity for women in education, is not just a substitute teacher. She is, according to her resume, a supporter of Ronald Reagan, a longtime activist in conservative women's causes and the author of two books, one of which, it turns out, was published by a Christian publishing house and the other by herself. She also has been chairman since 1975 of Eagle Forum, a right-wing organization founded by Phyllis Schlafly, which has militated against the Equal Rights Amendment and what Schlafly calls "the libbers," and has lately gotten involved in book banning.

While the Far Right, which has been lobbying on and off the airwaves for administration jobs, ought to be delighted to see yet another activist off the political unemployment rolls, leaders of organizations that have worked to promote equity for women in education see this as nothing less than putting the fox in charge of the chicken coop.

It is, at best, peculiar politics for an administration that is trailing badly with women voters in an election year.

The Advisory Council on Women's Educational Programs, and the Women's Educational Equity Act program, were created by Congress to further equality for women in education. WEEA has come under virulent attack from the New Right and was targeted for abolition in Reagan's budget last year. Congress rescued it, but the administration is again requesting no money. Holly Knox, executive director of the Project on Equal Education Rights, calls Thomson's appointment "the most direct subversion of the law" other than killing the program.

"It's not just a matter of somebody coming in with different political views," Knox said. "This woman represents an organization which is opposed to the very purpose of what this advisory council is supposed to do."

Dr. Bernice Sandler, who was appointed to the advisory council by both Presidents Ford and Carter and was its first chair, warned that the advisory board would no longer be independent, with its executive director beholden to the White House for her job. She was also critical of the way Joy Simonson, the panel's highly respected executive director, was fired.

Simonson says the Reagan-appointed panel met for the first time Monday and one of its first acts was to remove job protections for the executive director. Then it promptly voted to fire her. During a recess, Simonson said, she was told a candidate for her job had shown up to be interviewed by the "search committee." It was the first she had heard of a search committee, which, it turns out, was headed by a woman who is the head of Ohio's Eagle Forum.

"The significant thing is not the fact that a holdover employee was bounced . . . in an abrupt, crude way," Simonson says. "The significance is that it was so preplanned and from the White House and not a spontaneous decision of the advisory council members. The most important thing a council can do is choose a staff director. That they chose an Eagle Forum representative seems to be the antithesis of what the women's equity act and the council were set up for."

Thomson says one of her goals is to get school counselors to channel students into subjects that will lead to jobs. "I call that improving the academics for both men and women." While this makes sense, it has little to do with equity issues that have looked, for example, at how women are treated in sports programs and in textbooks, and the special problems that handicapped female students encounter.

Educational equity can improve the ability of tomorrow's generation of mothers to be able to support their families. Why it has become such a target for the New Right is something that probably only New Right fund-raisers know for sure. But clearly the Reagan administration is willing to hand over one of the few federal programs that assist women to people who have limited experience in the field and who have been closely associated with movements whose vision of tomorrow is a vision of the past.

Thomson's claim to fame is that she suggested the banner "Reagan Plays Well in Peoria." It was a clever idea at the time. But Reagan may find in this election year that Peoria is one of the few places her appointment plays well.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that these articles be inserted here because it is important to understand the depth of demoralization which is occurring as a result of these actions.

We have people across the political spectrum, people who represent Republican and Democratic administrations, all sorts of political views, who were appalled, appalled at what the Reagan administration did, and appalled at the prospect of an advisory council which in the future will simply not be able to perform the function it was established to perform, because it has been given over to those who regard the drive for equality, for reasons that have never been clear to me, as an assault on American values.

Trying to bring about true equality is in fact one of the things we ought to be doing to make the American constitutional dream a reality. Instead we have people now put in charge of that effort who are in fact its most determined opponents.

● Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. Speaker, the Reagan administration has once again demonstrated its desire to politicize a traditionally bipartisan, independent body within the Government. The National Advisory Council on Women's Educational Programs was established to set policy for programs developed under the Women's Educational Equity Act, and to make periodic reports to Congress on the status of women's education.

Recently, under the apparent direction of the administration, this body has unilaterally fired a very competent director, Ms. Joy Simonson, and replaced her with a director who has been associated with organizations whose purpose is diametrically opposed to the goals of this program. This action comes on top of the administration's recent attempt to eliminate funding for this valuable and successful program, and their transfer of the former Director of WEAA to another position. These actions are deplorable, and show us again, what lengths this administration will go to attempt to keep women out of the educational and economic mainstream of America.

When it comes to the equal rights amendment, the President says he is all for equal protection for women, he just does not want it written down, especially in the Constitution. He pays the same kind of lipservice to equal opportunity in education for women. He mouths support for it, while explicitly and implicitly denying that support, and attempting to dismantle them.

We are saying to you Mr. Reagan, the women of America are watching you, and we will not stand idly by while you launch a vicious attack on all the gains we have worked so hard to achieve—and we will not forget what you have tried to do.●

● Ms. FERRARO. Mr. Speaker, the firing of Joy Simonson is just the latest example of the ways in which women's rights can be undercut in the absence of an equal rights amendment to our Constitution.

Until women's rights are constitutionally guaranteed, any President could do what this administration has done. Any President could turn progressive programs for women inside out, using the weapons of funding elimination, staff firings and transfers and failure to enforce the laws on the books.

Joy Simonson, until her rude removal last week, was Executive Director of the National Advisory Council on Women's Educational Programs.

The Council provides policy recommendations for a successful Federal program, WEAA, the Women's Educational Equity Act. Thanks to WEAA, boys and girls, and young men and women in educational institutions all over the country have been exposed to life options never available to them before. Girls have had a chance to learn skills needed for well-paying jobs and boys have learned that women can be effective leaders.

Apparently, the Reagan administration, and its allies in Phyllis Schlafly's Eagle Forum do not believe in increased opportunities for our young people. To choose a woman to head the WEAA advisory board who is opposed to the very programs it is meant to foster is worse than placing a fox in charge of the chicken coop. It is a cynical and callous effort to turn back the clock on women's rights. The President says he is for the E and the R in ERA but not the A. But without the A, the E and R are in daily peril.●

● Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to just briefly comment today on my amazement at the steps recently taken at the National Advisory Council on Women's Educational Programs.

As we all know, the Advisory Council serves to make policy recommendations regarding the Women's Educational Equity Act programs. The Council, in addition to the Equity Act it advises, was established by Congress to support and distribute new materials and techniques that promote equal education for boys and girls. The Equity Act enjoys strong bipartisan support, as well as a reputation for one of the most successful education programs funded by the Federal Government.

In light of this, I was alarmed and extremely disappointed when I learned this past year that the administration was intent on dismantling the Equity Act. My alarm turned into astonishment when I learned recently that the Reagan administration engineered the firing of the Executive Director of the National Advisory Council on Women's Educational Programs, Joy Simonson, and replaced her with the Illinois director of Phyllis Schlafly's Eagle Forum, Rosemary Thomson. I believe Holly Knox, director of the Project on Equal Education Rights, has aptly stated my own views on this matter when she said, and I quote, "It's not just a matter of somebody coming in with different political views, this woman represents an organization which is opposed to the very purpose of what this advisory council is supposed to do." It makes me wonder if the President has some confusion as to the roles of the executive branch versus the legislative branch—who writes the laws and who is elected to administer those laws.

I believe that Congress either deserves a strongly worded assurance from Ms. Thomson that she is an adamant supporter of the programs she has been appointed to direct or steps from the administration to rectify this obvious error.●

● Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Speaker, I join my colleagues in expressing my extreme concern regarding the recent firing of the Executive Director of the National Advisory Council on Women's Educational Programs. I seriously question the administration's intent in firing Ms. Simonson and replacing her with Rosemary Thomson, the former director of Phyllis Schlafly's Eagle Forum chapter in Illinois.

The National Advisory Council is an extremely valuable body that makes policy recommendations regarding the programs of the Women's Educational Equity Act. The Women's Educational Equity Act was created by Congress in 1974 to provide educational equity for women in the United States at all educational levels, and is only one of two Federal education programs designed to open up opportunities for women and girls in schools and colleges. Through the awarding of grants and contracts, the Women's Educational Equity Act has become one of the most successful Federal education programs and has made incredible progress in overcoming formidable barriers to educational equity. The administration has already made clear its opinion of the Women's Educational Equity Act by attempting to eliminate its funding, and I fear that the replacing of Ms. Simonson is only another effort to undermine this congressionally and publicly supported program.

I remind my colleagues that the firing of Ms. Simonson is not the first example of staff shifting in the Women's Educational Programs offices. Recently, the administration transferred the former Director of the Women's Educational Equity Act itself, Leslie Wolfe, to another position, following an unsubstantiated attack on Ms. Wolfe's policies in the Conservative Digest. The appointment of Ms. Thomson—who has openly criticized the Women's Educational Equity Act program grants—to Ms. Simonson's position should alert us further as to the precarious future of women's educational programs under this administration.

Women's educational programs at the Federal level were created by Congress and continue to be strongly supported by the Congress. I am deeply concerned that the will of the Congress is being compromised—if not subverted—by these recent staff changes in the Women's Educational Equity Act offices.●

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. Speaker, Joy Simonson has served as the first Executive Director of the National Advisory Council on Women's Education Programs since its inception in 1975. She has served capably under Presidents Ford, Carter, and Reagan in administering the policy and research activities of the Council, which evaluates the status of women and girls in education. The Council was established by Congress in 1974 with the declaration, > Educational programs in the United States * * * are frequently inequitable as such programs relate to women and frequently limit the full participation of all individuals in American society.

Through the able efforts of Simonson and Council members appointed by Presidents Ford and Carter, the National Advisory Council has focused on the progress and problems of women in education. In the fall of 1981, the Council produced a comprehensive review of women in education entitled "Title IX; The Half Full, Half Empty Glass." This report is just one example of the important role the Council and its staff have played in advising and informing both the executive branch and Congress. It has been a nonpartisan effort focused on what I hope remains a nonpartisan issue: equity in education.

Earlier this month, Joy Simonson was removed from her position as Executive Director of the Council by newly appointed Council members. Through her continuous service under both Republican and Democratic administrations, her competency and professionalism have never been questioned. Her advocacy of equity in education is also not in doubt. As chairman of the Postsecondary Education Subcommittee, I know Congress and those who agree that opportunity is an issue for all people, have lost a resource at the Advisory Council. I hope the Council continues in the thoughtful and balanced direction set by earlier members and by its first Executive Director, Joy Simonson.

I have known Joy Simonson and worked with her. She represents ability, commonsense, dedication—all the things we should want in public service, and she has been rewarded with dismissal. Her dismissal is not a reflection on her, but on those small-minded individuals who chose to ignore the record.●

● Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, on July 26, 1982, Rosemary Thomson was hired as the executive director of the National Advisory Council on Women's Educational Programs. What qualifies her for the job? Well, she was once a substitute teacher. She has also chaired the Eagle Forum since 1975. Of course, the Eagle Forum's position on educational equity for women is that all educational material and programs should reflect and encourage the traditional roles of women in the home as wives and mothers. Ms. Thomson also wrote a couple of books—one of which is entitled "Withstanding Humanism's Challenge to Families." And, of course, she is against the equal rights amendment.

Whom does Rosemary Thomson replace? Until July 26, Joy Simonson was the executive director of the council. Ms. Simonson was appointed under the Republican administration of President Ford and she also served under the Democratic administration of President Carter. Ms. Simonson comes from a seemingly endless background of volunteer work in sex equity. She was the president of the National Association of Commissions for Women; she was the head of the D.C. Commission for Women; she was Associate Director of the Federal Women's Programs at the Civil Service Commission. She worked tirelessly with women's groups on matters of education for many, many years. Ms. Simonson was very effective in monitoring progress on girls and women in education and, under her leadership, the National Advisory Council on Women's Educational Programs published several serious, thoughtful, and valuable studies on sex equity issues. As director of the council, Ms. Simonson demonstrated over and over again her serious commitment to the mandate of the Women's Educational Equity Act. With all due respect to America's substitute teachers who do a fine job in furthering our young people's education, it is clear that Ms. Thomson and Ms. Simonson are not in the same league.

The Congress has a responsibility to encourage girls and young women to plan realistically for a world in which they will probably have to work for a substantial portion of their lives. Congress designed the Women's Educational Equity Act to promote sex equity in education so that they would have equal opportunity. But even today they are leaving schools and colleges without the skills they need to earn a decent wage because WEEA has not been in place long enough. I remind my colleagues that women today still make 59 cents to a man's dollar and that 51 percent of all women over 16 work outside the home. And I am tired of arguing whether it is because they have to or because they want to work. If President Reagan's economic policies continue going the way they are, most young women are going to have to work outside the home, whether they want to or not.

Since the 1980 election, the Reagan administration has been trying to eliminate the women's educational equity program, a program legislated into being by Congress in the first place. The Reagan administration repeatedly zero-funded the program and Congress repeatedly refused to allow this. With Ms. Thomson as director of the council, they apparently hope to defy Congress wishes and accomplish a de facto abolition of the program. This is consistent with Reagan's policy toward women. It is only the legislative mandate of the National Advisory Council on Women's Educational Programs under WEAA that has saved it from the fate of the President's Advisory Committee for Women—which under Reagan has no budget and no staff—and the Advisory Committee on the Rights and Responsibilities of Women, in the Department of Health and Human Services, which has not been heard from since Reagan took office. The appointment of Ms. Thomson is just one more slap in the face to American women by the Reagan administration.●

● Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, I am alarmed that the Reagan administration is continuing its campaign against equal opportunity for women with another attack on the Educational Equity Act program. The replacement of the program's advisory council director with an outspoken critic of the program is an outrage that has become only too common under this administration. It should be a priority for us to break this pattern in which congressionally mandated programs are subverted simply because they do not fit into a narrow partisan viewpoint.

A close look at the educational equity program reveals that it is not political in nature, unless there is a party that puts discrimination into its platform. The educational equity grants support the development and distribution of educational products to reduce discrimination in our schools and colleges. Its materials have included assistance for disabled female students, programs to reduce math anxiety and manuals for training in nonsexist teaching methods. One need only visit a classroom or open a textbook to know that sex role stereotyping is still common in lectures, illustrations, and other forms of education.

Opponents of the program apparently believe that by perpetuating these stereotypes, we will somehow return to a time when women were limited to subservient roles. In this view of the world, women who take on traditional male roles are stealing power and jobs from men.

A deeper analysis shows that our changing society urgently needs the talents and skills of all its citizens. The labor market has a growing shortage of workers with scientific and mathematical aptitude. Families can no longer make ends meet with just one wage earner. Individual men and women are recognizing that they have a fuller range of opportunities to explore than they did in the past. Some men want to be nurses or homemakers. Some women want to be engineers or auto mechanics.

Undermining a program that seeks to open the doors of opportunity is damaging not only to individuals but to society as a whole. Enacted in 1974, the program was expanded in 1978 because of its outstanding success. Last year, Congress rejected the administration's attempt to include this program in a block grant. Despite these clear signals of support from Congress, the administration continues its assaults on educational equity. We must make clear that we will tolerate neither this inappropriate appointment nor any further efforts to flout congressional intent in this program.●

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on my special order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

PROVIDING A LEGAL REMEDY FOR VIOLATIONS OF FIFRA

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California (Mr. PANETTA) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, pesticide regulation in this country is a Federal matter. In the amendments to the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide and Rodenticide Act (H.R. 5203), which will be considered by the House this week, the Federal Government's authority over pesticide regulation in this country is broader than ever before. Why is it true, then, that an individual citizen claiming to be injured by a violation of FIFRA cannot go to a Federal court to protect his or her rights?

The law as currently written does not permit private citizens to bring suits under FIFRA in Federal courts. I plan to introduce an amendment to H.R. 5203 which would provide a private right of action to individuals to challenge violations of FIFRA in the Federal courts.

Currently, enforcement under FIFRA is left to the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency and its State agency counterparts. Enforcement under current law, however, has been sorely inadequate. As the General Accounting Office determined in its recent report, the EPA and States "do not always properly investigate cases and sometimes take questionable enforcement actions." In these times of reduced spending at both the Federal and State levels, we cannot force citizens to rely on governmental protection only.

Second, simple justice requires that if chemical companies and pesticide producers are given a right to sue persons who violate FIFRA, private citizens should be given the same right. H.R. 5203 gives chemical companies and pesticide producers the right to sue in Federal courts for treble, and even punitive, damages for violations of their property rights under the data disclosure provisions of the act. Allowing such an expansive, private right of action to companies, while denying equal access to Federal courts to individuals, is unconscionable. Individuals, like corporations, must be allowed their day in Federal courts as well.

Additionally, a private right of action provision in FIFRA will not result in uncontrollable numbers of nuisance suits against farmers. These types of suits can be brought in State courts under State common law. Challenges to the emergency Medfly spraying done in California, for instance, were based on the State tort law of nuisance, and not pursuant to any State or Federal pesticide law. My amendment would provide a private right of action to challenge statutory violations of the Federal Pesticide Act. The correct forum for these challenges is logically in the Federal courts.

Finally, the amendment I propose is restricted to avoid legal actions that are unfounded or based on harassment only. It is limited to equitable actions and does not allow for damages or attorney's fees. This would limit the right of action solely to injunctions for actions shown to be in violation of the act.

For these reasons, I urge your support of a private right of action amendment to H.R. 5203. Pesticide injuries in this country number about 800,000 annually, close to 800 of those resulting in pesticide-related deaths. Effective enforcement of the Federal pesticide law is imperative. Providing a private right of action under FIFRA is critical to insuring adequate enforcement of citizens' rights under the law. I have included the text of the amendment below:

JUDICIAL REVIEW

Section 16 of the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act is amended by adding at the end thereof of new subsection as follows:

"(e) Any person claiming to be injured by a violation of this Act may bring suit in the appropriate United States District Court for equitable relief but not for damages or attorney's fees. This subsection shall not be construed to permit class action suits as defined under Rule 23 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedures."●

MILITARY AID TO EL SALVADOR—THE JULY 28 CERTIFICATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WILLIAM J. COYNE) is recognized for 10 minutes.

● Mr. WILLIAM J. COYNE. Mr. Speaker, yesterday, despite overwhelming evidence to the contrary, the Reagan administration certified that the Government of El Salvador has met the conditions which were laid down by the International Security and Development Act of 1981 and, therefore, could continue to receive military and economic aid from the United States. This represents not only a serious distortion of reality in El Salvador, but also further encourages the government of that country to continue a policy of repression.

When Congress passed the International Security and Development Act of 1981, it placed certain conditions on the continuance of aid to El Salvador. The Salvadoran Government was required to demonstrate that it was:

Making a concerted effort to comply with internationally recognized human rights. The administration, in a report which accompanied the certification, points to a downward trend in the monthly total of deaths attributable to political violence in the past 6 months. However, human rights organizations report no such evidence of progress in this area. A recent report by America's Watch Committee and the American Civil Liberties Union attributes the lower body counts to a geographical shift in repression from urban areas to the countryside. Attacks on journalists and human rights monitors, which have largely confined both groups to the capital city of San Salvador, have made it more difficult to verify atrocities outside of the city.

Bringing an end to the torture and murder of Salvadoran citizens by the armed forces. Amnesty International and various other human rights organizations indicate that they have seen no significant government effort to end either the murders or the torture. A recent tale of terror in the Washington Post describes a May incident in which a "Green Cross" volunteer was subjected to torture by the national police. According to that account, the volunteer was strapped to a chair similar to a medieval rack, beaten and forced to inhale lime. The military leadership of El Salvador was not altered as a result of the March 28 elections.

Making progress in implementing essential economic and agrarian reforms. The new Minister of Agriculture in El Salvador is an avowed critic of the land reform program. Since the March elections Decree 14, which permitted expropriation and provided the legal basis for land, banking, and trade reforms, has been repealed. Decree 6, which was recently passed, suspends from 1 to 4 years important parts of the land reform program. The program continues to be poorly managed and the repeal of Decree 14 has reportedly resulted in violence in the countryside.

Making continued progress to find and implement an equitable political solution. Viewing the March elections in El Salvador as an alternative to negotiations among the various political factions, as the administration appears to be doing, is, in my view, counterproductive. Those elections effectively excluded the opposition and no viable solution to the conflict in El Salvador is possible without the participation of that opposition.

Additionally, House Joint Resolution 494 required that the administration certify again that the Government of El Salvador had demonstrated that it has made a good faith effort to investigate and bring to justice those responsible for the 1980 murders of six U.S. churchwomen and agrarian reform workers. While evidence gathered in the investigation strongly points to the involvement of the security forces, after a year and a half no trial has been held. Nor has any date been set for a trial in this matter.

Unless, I am missing a dramatic new development in these areas, it is abundantly clear to me that these conditions have not been met. Further, the tunnel vision which has shaped the Reagan administration's policy towards El Salvador, namely its insistence on regarding the strife there strictly as a contest of East versus West, will continue to undermine a political solution to the conflict and insure that the aforementioned conditions will never be met. Moreover, certification under these conditions could also have broad ramifications. Certification at this time could clearly undermine our international credibility as a champion of human rights and democracy. It is essential that the Reagan administration reevaluate its policies towards El Salvador.●

A THREAT TO NURSING HOME RESIDENTS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York (Mr. WEISS) is recognized for 15 minutes.

● Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, the administration has recently proposed regulations which pose a serious threat to the health and well-being of our Nation's 1.3 million nursing home residents. In a major policy reversal, the President intends to relax Federal nursing home inspection and certification requirements which are currently designed to insure minimum standards of care and decency in these facilities. By choosing to ignore the history and circumstances which led to the implementation of our Federal enforcement system, the administration would risk a tragic return to the days when injury, abuse, and death were all too prevalent in nursing homes.

This is one more example of the administration's callous disregard for the rights of those most vulnerable in our society, the aged, the sick, and the disabled. Rather than abdicating responsibility for these individuals, I believe that the Federal Government should reaffirm and strengthen its commitment to providing basic protections for nursing home residents.

Several days ago, Mr. Edward J. Kuriansky, the New York State Deputy Attorney General for Medicaid Fraud Control and Special Prosecutor for Nursing Homes, Health and Social Services, testified before the Senate Special Committee on Aging on this important issue. In his compelling statement, the Deputy Attorney General outlines the findings of his Office's 5-year patient abuse investigation and his concerns about the administration's plan to deregulate nursing homes. Mr. Kuriansky's office has long been recognized as the national leader in the fight to combat medicaid fraud. The House Select Committee on Aging, in a recent report, described New York as being "the most effective State in terms of medicaid (fraud) detection and prosecution," and found that it had "provided the Nation with a model of State enforcement effort."

I strongly encourage my colleagues to review Mr. Kuriansky's testimony, which I request to be reprinted in the RECORD, as follows:

TESTIMONY OF EDWARD J. KURIANSKY

Mr. Chairman, Members of the Committee: I am very pleased to appear before you today and to be given the opportunity to speak on the newly proposed federal survey and certification regulations for long-term care facilities. In the past, this Committee has contributed mightily not only to the battle against fraud and abuse in the health care industry, but perhaps even more importantly, to the fight for quality care for our elderly citizens—the subject which I believe is at issue in these hearings. My Office is extremely grateful for your Committee's support in recent years, and I hope that we, in turn can be of some assistance to you today.

Before discussing the proposed regulations from the vantage point of our experience as a statewide investigatory and prosecutorial agency, I would like briefly to set our work in historical context. My office was established by Governor Carey in 1975, in the wake of a terrible and highly publicized nursing home scandal in New York State. Initially, we were known as the Office of the Special Prosecutor for Nursing Homes, and given authority to investigate nursing homes, health related facilities, patient abuse and official misconduct. Charles J. Hynes, who testified before this Committee four years ago this month, was the first Special Prosecutor and Deputy Attorney General in charge. When Mr. Haynes, whom I had the privilege to serve as Chief Assistant for over two years, was named New York City's Fire Commissioner some 18 months ago, Attorney General Abrams appointed me to succeed Mr. Hynes. Since the creation of our office in 1975, our jurisdiction has gradually expanded to include adult homes, hospitals, individual providers, and a Civil Division to sue for the recovery of Medicaid funds improperly taken.

Additionally, as this Committee is well aware, Public Law 95-142 was passed by Congress and signed into law in October 1977. This legislation established a program of long-term control of fraud in the health care industry and provided substantial federal reimbursement to my Office and the 30 or more other state Medicaid Fraud Control Units now established across the country. We were proud to have been cited by both houses of Congress as the model for other states to follow in their anti-fraud efforts.

Our Office is based in seven regional locations throughout New York State, and we currently have on staff some 340 employees, including approximately 50 attorneys, 100 investigators and 100 auditors. We utilize a team concept approach to the audit/investigation of health care fraud—in that attorneys, auditors and investigators are assigned to cases at their inception and work together through to completion. Today, we are responsible for investigating and prosecuting the entire spectrum of provider fraud in New York's $4 billion-plus Medicaid program, the largest in the nation.

The area in which our Office has brought the greatest number of criminal prosecutions and probably received the most public attention is, or course, that of Medicaid fraud. We have become well-versed over these past seven years in the variety of schemes conceived by man and woman to defraud the Medicaid program. To date, we have arrested more than 560 defendants and convicted 90 percent of those we have prosecuted. Actual restitution paid to federal, state and local governments as a result of this Office's cases amounts to approximately $20 million, and there are over $21 million in civil lawsuits currently pending against health care providers for the recovery of additional Medicaid overpayments.

But beyond the investigation of fraud and corruption, and, I think, even more essential, is the work of our Patient Abuse Program. Indeed, it is the findings of this investigation that prompt my comments today and make me fearful that we are now being asked to turn back the clock, and to turn our back, on the bitterly learned lessons of the last 15 years.

I am submitting two documents along with my testimony today. The first is a report issued by my Office in December 1981 entitled "Nursing Home Patient Abuse: Realities and Remedies." This report summarizes the findings of five years' investigation of more than 1100 cases of patient abuse and neglect in New York's nursing homes. This report also details our recommendations for new criminal statutes and regulatory change aimed specifically at curbing mistreatment and neglect in nursing homes, and discusses our efforts, in conjunction with New York consumer groups, such as the Ad Hoc Coalition for a Single Standard Code, to achieve better care in these institutions.

The second document is a report of the August 1978 Queens County Grand Jury, and although my Office will, in several days, submit a more detailed analysis of the proposed federal regulations in response to HCFA's request for public comment, I want to direct my remarks today to several of the more disturbing proposals which I believe are brought painfully into focus by the Queens County Grand Jury report. Ironically, as you will see, the grand jury's findings stand in stark contrast to the naive and potentially dangerous proposals under discussion today.

Let me briefly tell you what the grand jury found. In July of 1978, during an oppressive heat wave in New York, the air conditioning system in a Queens County nursing home broke down. Two of the home's patients died and 17 others required emergency hospitalization for heat stroke and dehydration. Almost 70 of the home's patients suffered heat-related fevers. The grand jury conducted a four month investigation into these deaths and heat-induced injuries. It heard testimony from more than 90 witnesses, whose descriptions of the conditions existing in the home were in sharp contrast to one's ideal image of a health care facility. For example, emergency service technicians found cardiac patients with 106° and 107° fevers living in rooms with closed windows. Another patient was discovered under a blanket and quilt wearing a flannel nightgown, stockings, and a bonnet. In addition, the emergency medical teams found a patient whose fecal impaction was literally choking off her ability to breathe, as well as other patients with multiple bedsores and urinary tract infections.

The evidence before the grand jury revealed that the care rendered to the elderly patients of this nursing home by its administrative, medical and nursing staff was ineffective to meet the crisis conditions brought about by the heat wave. While many factors—including a lack of sufficient and adequately trained staff, an absence of emergency procedures, a failure of leadership, and, in some cases, an inexplicable insensitivity to human suffering—may have contributed to this terrible tragedy, the grand jury concluded that no particular individual or entity could properly be charged with criminal conduct. It did however, recommend immediate reforms to prevent such a tragedy from ever happening again, and it is these recommendations which bear heavily on our discussion today.

(1) The grand jury urged, for example, that staffing reports containing an assessment of patient nursing needs be submitted every four months. In New York, these assessments classify patients as needing "partial care" or "total care" and calculate the number of required staff for each nursing home. The last staff assessment at the Queens nursing home had been completed nine months before the July heat emergency. While the State Health Department had set the required number of nursing staff at 61, the home consistently operated with only 57. More significantly, however, the staff assessment was based on only 39 "total care" patients, whereas on July 23, 1978—nine months later and in the midst of this killing heat wave—almost 140 of the home's patients were in need of total care. I must emphasize that such an increase in "total care" patients is not at all uncommon in nursing homes where patients and their conditions change with striking rapidity.

The newly proposed federal regulations would remove the current requirement of quarterly staffing reports. It has been our experience, however, that maintaining sufficient, competently-trained staff is a critical problem in nursing homes. Often, as a consequence of severe staff shortages, facilities find themselves forced to hire per-diem employees who are unfamiliar with the patients and their needs, and frequently become involved in incidents of abuse and neglect. Staffing reports, which review a week at random each quarter, are potentially an excellent source of information without being an excessive burden to the facility. Any inconvenience, I would submit, is more than offset by the fact that the quality of life in long-term care facilities is in large measure determined by its staff. Personnel shortages or rapid turnover can have a disastrous effect on patients in a very short time. Two years is simply too long to wait to determine that staff levels are inadequate, particularly when the average resident remains in a nursing home for only two years. If our State Health Department had known about the staff shortage at the Queens nursing home before the heat wave, the situation might well not have reached crisis proportions. Had more staff been available, they could have prevented patient deterioration by forcing fluids, removing unnecessary clothing, bathing patients and taking vital signs at frequent intervals.

(2) The Queens Grand Jury also recommended that an unannounced inspection schedule of at least three visits per year be instituted for each mursing home.

By contrast, the proposed federal regulations would eliminate the requirement that a facility be inspected annually and provide instead that a facility be surveyed once every two years and "as often as necessary to ensure compliance." In addition, the new regulations would remove the requirement of a mandatory resurvey after 90 days and require an on-site revisit only when there is no other way to verify corrections. These proposals are at direct odds with the grand jury's finding that it is only through a system of frequent, unannounced and presumably unpredictable inspections that the day to day functioning of a facility can be properly observed. Regular inspections at the Queens nursing home would have revealed that the home did not have an air conditioning maintenace contract or a viable emergency back-up system. Unfortunately, as the grand jury found, reliance is all too often inappropriately placed on affidavits of compliance from nursing home operators and the air conditioner service companies with which they do business. The grand jury concluded that without visual verification, there is no way to ascertain whether a home is in compliance with all applicable regulations.

Relying on the good faith of providers to telephone or send a letter confirming that deficiencies have been corrected is simply not good enough. It was precisely this kind of blind reliance on the preposterous and unverified Medicaid reimbursement claims of providers in the early '70s that led to fiscal fraud on a massive scale and resulted, in New York alone, in indictments touching one third of our state's proprietary nursing homes.

It is similarly naive to expect that a facility operator no longer under the threat of automatic cancellation for failure to correct deficiencies by a date certain, would have any real incentive to bring his home up to code. Curiously enough, HCFA acknowledges that in 90% of the cases, deficiencies are corrected before the provider agreement is cancelled. This figure alone would appear to demonstrate, quite graphically, the efficacy of the current cancellation policy.

It is a tragic footnote to the report of the Queens County Grand Jury that none of their recommendations were adopted, and that two years later, in July of 1980, 15 more patients died in a Bronx nursing home during another blistering summer heat wave. And now yet another long hot summer—with its own potential for human tragedy—is once again upon us.

The Queens County Grand Jury investigation is but one of over 1100 cases of abuse and neglect that we have investigated since the dark days of New York's nursing home scandal.

Our recent report, "Nursing Home Patient Abuse: Realities and Remedies," based on this five year investigative experience, provides persuasive proof that nursing home patients are not capable of speaking out on their own behalf. For example, the process of investigating abuse cases in New York was immeasureably aided by the enactment in 1978 of a patient abuse reporting law, which requires facility employees to report incidents of abuse, neglect and mistreatment. Prior to this time, incidents of abuse and neglect frequently went unreported. The fundamental explanation for this phenomenon goes to the very nature of the nursing home patient/employee relationship; namely, a nursing home patient depends totally on staff to respond to his or her basic needs. Patients and their families deeply fear retaliation and may endure abuse or poor conditions rather than risk the consequences, real or imagined, of reporting such conduct. The physical and mental condition of patients also contributes to the low rate of reporting. Many patients, afflicted with varying degrees of senility, are altogether unaware that they have been abused or of the conditions around them. Other patients do not report because they are blind of deaf and unable to identify an abuser. In addition, even if patients know to whom they should address a complaint, the mechanics of reporting often prove too taxing. Few patients have telephones in their rooms, and public telephones located in hallways afford only minimal privacy. A complaint by letter can be even more difficult for an elderly patient who can no longer write or who fears interception of the letter. All these barriers to the reporting of patient abuse apply with equal force to the reporting of poor facility conditions.

The summary comments to the proposed regulations note that ICF/MRs will be surveyed at least annually because "most of the patients in these facilities (many of whom are children) lack the necessary experience or capability to bring quality of care problems to the attention of outside authorities." Although this is a persuasive justification for frequent inspections of ICF/MRs, the distinction between these facilities and nursing homes is a distinction without a meaningful difference. For the typical nursing home patient is no more capable or experienced than the ICF/MR patient, and, accordingly, the same standard for facility inspection should apply. Indeed, it is precisely because the vast majority of nursing home residents lack the ability to bring their problems to the attention of outside authorities that nursing homes need more, rather than less surveillance.

In sum, Mr. Chairman, I must confess to a certain uneasiness about a set of regulations which substantially abdicate surveillance responsibility to a privately controlled industry watchdog, which tell us that a once-every-two-year check-up is good enough to protect the vital interests of our increasingly helpless nursing home population, and which blithely accept the proposition that nursing home operators can be trusted not to capitalize on an advance-warning inspection policy, and that if they are ever caught misbehaving, we can count on them to advise us forthrightly as soon as they have cleaned up their act.

The thrust—indeed, the underlying assumption—of these regulations is that the nursing home industry in this country can police itself. With all due respect, Mr. Chairman, one need not be too much of a cynic to suggest that this unstated assumption runs directly contrary to our history, our experience and our common sense.

Improvements in fraud control and quality care did not spring forth spontaneously in the late 1970s. Rather, these recent advances are precisely traceable to the imposition of strict governmental regulation and the creation of independent enforcement and review mechanisms such as the MFCU program.

In my view, we cannot afford to repeat the monumental miscalculation of the original Medicaid/Medicare program, wherein millions of dollars were appropriated to fund a noble and needed program, and not 5 cents was allocated to safeguard the moral and fiscal integrity of that very same program. Left unsurveilled, uninvestigated and inadequately regulated, nursing home profiteers literaly riddled the Medicaid system with fraud and abuse. What we must have learned from the scandals of the 1970s is that this is an industry and a program which require rigorous public and governmental scrutiny. We also learned that there are no cheap or easy shortcuts. And while fiscal chicanery is one thing, the assurance of quality care for our old people is quite another. For while we may be able, belatedly, to recoup the ill-gotten gains of corrupt operators, and even on occasion send them to jail, I am much less sanguine about our ability, after the fact, to right the wrongs inflicted upon our institutionalized elderly by substandard conditions that go uncorrected in facilities that are insufficently inspected.

In closing, Mr. Chairman, I would only say that although cost containment and the elimination of unneceassary regulations are unquestionably laudable goals, the findings of our patient abuse investigation over the past five years demonstrate unequivocally the critical importance not only of preserving, but of strengthening, those regulations that directly impact on patient care and patients' rights. Any reduction of federal standards (and, particularly, of federal reimbursement) in these essential areas would only serve as a dangerously tempting precedent for financially strapped state governments and as an ominous signal to our vulnerable elderly of a possible return to the scandal-scarred, unenlightened days of the recent past.

Some years ago, the French writer Simone de Beauvoir was prompted to observe, astutely and not without a certain degree of cynicism: "By the way in which a society behaves toward its old people, it uncovers the naked, and often carefully hidden truths about its real principles and aims." I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the generosity and swiftness of our response today to the fundamental needs of thousands of our dependent fellow citizens will surely be the measure by which future generations judge us.●

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to:

Mr. MCKINNEY (at the request of Mr. MICHEL), for today, on account of attending a funeral.

Mr. SMITH of Pennsylvania (at the request of Mr. WRIGHT), for today and July 29, on account of a death in the family.

Mr. YATES (at the request of Mr. WRIGHT), after 2 p.m. today, on account of illness in the family.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

By unanimous consent, permission to address the House, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered, was granted to:

Mr. ERTEL, for 30 minutes, today.

Mr. ADDABBO, for 60 minutes, August 10, 1982.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

CAPTIVE NATIONS

HON. EDWARD J. DERWINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, the observance of the 24th anniversary of Captive Nations last week by all reports was a success. Events which took place here and abroad clearly expressed the theme of the Captive Nations Week, and its vital importance to the security of the free world.

The emphasis on the denial of freedom of human rights to the over 100 million non-Russians held captive by Communist rule was shown in the proclamations issued by Governors and mayors from across the country. I wish to insert the proclamations from the Governor of the State of Wyoming, the Honorable Ed Herschler; the Governor of the State of Kansas, the Honorable John Carlin; and the Governor of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, the Honorable Dick Thornburgh. In addition, many mayors showed their interest in Captive Nations Week by issuing proclamations and I wish to include them: The first from the mayor of the city of Chicago, Ill., the Honorable Jane M. Byrne; the mayor of the city of Omaha, Nebr., the Honorable Michael Boyle; and the mayor of the city of Tacoma, Wash., the Honorable Doug Sutherland. These proclamations follow:

PROCLAMATION—STATE OF WYOMING

Whereas, the imperialistic politics of Russian Communists have led, through direct and indirect aggression, to the subjugation and enslavement of the peoples of Poland, Hungary, Lithuania, Ukraine, Czecho-Slovakia, Latvia, Estonia, Byelorussia, Romania, East Germany, Bulgaria, Mainland China, Armenia, Azerbaijan, Georgia, North Korea, Albania, Idel-Ural, Servia, Croatia, Slovenia, Tibet, Cossakia, Turkestan, North Vietnam, Cuba, Cambodia, South Vietnam, Laos, Afghanistan, and others; and

Whereas, the desire for liberty and independence by the overwhelming majority of peoples in these conquered nations constitutes a powerful deterrent to any ambitions of Communist leaders to initiate a major war; and

Whereas, the freedom loving people of the captive nations look to the United States as the citadel of human freedom and human rights and to the people of the United States as the leaders in bringing about their freedom and independence; and

Whereas, the Congress of the United States by unanimous vote passed Public Law 86-90 establishing the third week in July each year as Captive Nations Week and inviting the people of the United States to observe such week with appropriate prayer, ceremonies, and activities, expressing their sympathy with and support for the just aspirations of the captive nations;

Now, therefore, I, Ed Herschler, Governor of the State of Wyoming, do hereby proclaim the week of July 18 through 24, 1982, as "Captive Nations Week" in Wyoming, and call upon our citizens to join with others in observing this week by offering prayers and dedicating their efforts for the peaceful liberation of oppressed and subjugated peoples all over the world.

PROCLAMATION—STATE OF KANSAS

Whereas, the imperialistic policies of Russian Communists have led, through direct and indirect aggression, to the subjugation and enslavement of the peoples of many nations; and

Whereas, the desire for liberty and independence by the overwhelming majority of peoples in these conquered nations constitutes a powerful deterrent to any ambitions of Communist leaders to initiate a major war; and

Whereas, the freedom-loving peoples of the captive nations look to the United States as the citadel of human freedom and to the people of the United States as leaders in bringing about their freedom and independence; and

Whereas, the Congress of the United States by unanimous vote passed Public Law 86-90 establishing the third week in July each year as Captive Nations Week and inviting the people of the United States to observe such week with appropriate prayers, ceremonies and activities, expressing their sympathy with and support for the just aspirations of captive peoples:

Now, therefore, I, John Carlin, Governor of the State of Kansas, do hereby proclaim the week of July 18 through 24, 1982, as "Captive Nations Week" in Kansas, and call upon the citizens of the State to join with others in observing this week by offering prayers and dedicating their efforts for the peaceful liberation of oppressed and subjugated peoples all over the world.

PROCLAMATION—CITY OF CHICAGO

Whereas, the Congress of the United States by unanimous vote passed Public Law 86-90 establishing the third week in July each year as Captive Nations Week; and

Whereas, all people of the United States are invited to observe the week with appropriate prayer ceremonies and activities expressing their sympathy for the just aspiration of the captive nations; and

Whereas, it is the consensus of geopolitical observers that the spirit of freedom is now more evident in the countries dominated by communism than at any time in many years; and

Whereas, friends of the captive nations are determined that all possible moral support will be given to people of the enslaved nations:

Now, therefore, I, Jane M. Byrne, Mayor of the City of Chicago, do hereby proclaim July 18-24 1982 to be "Captive Nations Week" in Chicago and urge all citizens to be cognizant of the events arranged for this time.

PROCLAMATION—COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA

The quest for freedom has been a source of fierce struggle and determination for people throughout the world. Fueled by a burning desire to live, work and worship without fear of retribution, many brave men and women have sacrificed their lives to create a society of justice and a world of peace and goodwill. As Americans, we are fortunate recipients of the realization of that dream. Yet in many countries, the flame of liberty continues to be tainted by the oppression and degradation characteristic of intolerant governments.

We who enjoy the fruits of freedom must recognize that the rights we hold to be self-evident do not exist in all countries. We cannot and must not forget that some people are continually denied their most basic human rights in their homelands, and they are forced to live in silence, hunger and fear. We must not ignore those who are held in bondage by totalitarian governments and are imprisoned for their dreams and beliefs. As we witness the distressing turn of events in countries throughout the world, we must strive to ensure that America's legacy of liberty is preserved and promoted for future generations, in the hope that one day all people will be free.

In recognition of the efforts of all brave men and women who are working for freedom and justice in their own lands, I, Dick Thornburgh, Governor of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, do hereby proclaim July 18-24, 1982 as "Captive Nations Week" in Pennsylvania. I urge all Pennsylvanians to join with all freedom-loving people in support of the ideals of freedom of conscience, movement and speech.

PROCLAMATION—CITY OF OMAHA, NEBRASKA

Russian Communism has led, through direct and indirect aggression, to the subjugation and enslavement of the peoples of Poland, Hungary, Lithuania, Ukraine, Czecho-Slovakia, Latvia, Estonia, Byelorussia, Romania, East Germany, Bulgaria, Mainland China, Armenia, Azerbaijan, Georgia, North Korea, Albania, Idel-Ural, Servia, Croatia, Slovenia, Tibet, Cossakia, Turkestan, North Vietnam, Cuba, Cambodia, South Vietnam, Laos, Afghanistan, and others.

The desire for liberty and independence by the overwhelming majority of peoples in these conquered nations constitutes a powerful deterrent to any ambitions of Communist Leaders to initiate a major war.

Captive nations look to the United States as the citadel of human freedom and human rights and to the people of the United States as the leaders in bringing about their freedom and independence.

The Congress of the United States by unanimous vote passed Public Law 86-90 establishing the third week in July each year as Captive Nations Week and inviting the people of the United States to observe such week with appropriate prayer, ceremonies and activities; expressing their sympathy with and support for the just aspirations of the captive nations.

Now therefore, I Michael Boyle, Mayor of the City of Omaha, do hereby proclaim the

Now, therefore, I, Doug Sutherland, Mayor of the city of Tacoma, Washington Do Hereby Proclaim the Week of July 18-24, 1982 to be "Captive Nations Week" in the City of Tacoma, and I call upon our citizens to join with others in observing this week by offering prayers and dedicating their efforts for the peaceful liberation of oppressed and subjugated peoples all over the world.●

SENATOR ANNE LINDEMAN—LEGISLATOR OF THE YEAR

HON. BOB STUMP

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. STUMP. Mr. Speaker, Arizona State Senator Anne Lindeman, who represents legislative district 17 in northwestern Maricopa County, is today being named "National Republican Legislator of the Year" by the National Republican Legislators Association.

Senator Lindeman's Arizona colleagues also have voted her most influential senator and most-effective senate committee chairman. Having served with her, I can testify to Anne's outstanding work in the Arizona Legislature. She always gives the extra measure, and her constituents are extremely fortunate.

The National Conference of State Legislatures has benefited from her dynamic leadership as chairman of their education committee. She also represents Arizona on the Presidential Advisory Committee on Federalism.

The official presentation, Legislator of the Year, is being made today at the Hyatt Regency in Chicago at the annual National Republican Legislator's Association luncheon.

With justified pride as a friend, and on behalf of the constituents we share, I want to thank Senator Lindeman for the great honor she brings to us and to the State of Arizona with her achievements.●

THE BANKRUPTCY OF REAGANOMICS

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, the Reagan recession continues to envelope New Jersey and the Nation in the most severe economic disaster since the Great Depression. Between April and May of this year another 9,000 New Jerseyans lost their jobs. Overall, joblessness in New Jersey has doubled since July of 1981, leaving about 285,000 people unemployed. Plant closings and reduced production schedules have caused factory employment to drop for 10 consecutive months. An estimated 46,300 manufacturing jobs were lost in New Jersey between last July and this May. Those still employed have been forced to work shorter hours.

The article which follows provides sound reasoning that Reaganomics, from its inception, was a prescription for deindustrialization and economic policies incompatible with economic development.

I commend this article to the attention of my colleagues.

[From the Philadelphia Inquirer, July 2, 1982]

REAGANOMICS: FAILED MAGIC

(By Edward S. Herman)

President Reagan's economic policies have been aimed, purportedly, at reducing inflation and unemployment, and stimulating productivity and economic growth. Only the inflation goal has been even approximately met. Business investment, productivity, and growth have stagnated at best, while unemployment is at a new post-Great Depression high, with official rates now approaching 10 percent.

Neither during the election campaign nor thereafter did Reagan ever suggest that his real anti-inflation plan was to use extremely tight money and massive unemployment to get prices down. On the contrary, he chided Jimmy Carter for the "despair" of the eight million who were then without work through no fault of their own, and he implied that his method of solving the problem would be supply-side magic—a flood of new investment and output based on a reduced government burden, tax incentives to business and consumers and an interest rate decline reflecting investor expectations of happy events to come.

Whether Reagan and his advisers ever really believed in this magic is debatable. The administration put forward a highly expansionary budget, with tax reductions and military spending increases outweighing cuts in other (mainly social) expenditures. This budget would have accelerated inflation, barring a supply-side surge of output or tight money. But a surge in output would have choked off the expansion.

The contradiction in Reaganomics was that it imposed severe monetary restraint and high interest rates from the beginning, which led to completely predictable shortfalls from administration forecasts regarding unemployment and output expansion. It is very possible that this was a planned recession with the supply-side surge a public relations cover for an unpalatable but intended reality.

Some argue that Reaganomics should not be evaluated within a short time horizon. I agree, although the initial Reagan promises and optimistic projections for 1981 and 1982 did imply quick results.

But the longer term effects of Reagan's policies look even more ominous than their immediate impact. The looming military buildup and huge deficits, and the absence of any administration initiatives that get at the roots of inflation, suggest that if prosperity returns we will witness a quick renewal of inflationary pressures. That is what the bond market says in its refusal to shake off the inflation premium in long-term bond rates.

In April 1981, I argued on this page that Reaganomics is a recipe for deindustrialization rather than reindustrialization. Ensuing developments have strengthened that case.

High interest rates and declining sales have reduced business pre-tax profitability by more than the Reagan tax bonanzas have increased after-tax profitability. The ratio of the market value to the replacement value of corporate assets continues to fall (from 0.67 in 1976-78 to 0.55 in 1979-81), encouraging the transfer of profits into the acquisition of under-valued companies rather than new investment.

The cash flow needed to sustain renovation has dwindled and investment in both research and new equipment has been cut back. In steel, with operating rates for May down to 43 percent, 7 of 10 companies are losing money, and industry members are struggling just to survive. Business investments in durable equipment fell by more than 10 percent between 1980 and 1981, and is probably declining further with continued high interest rates and excess capacity in 1982. These all add up to technological and productivity stagnation.

High administration officials are now expressing the hope that much of the increase in take-home pay from the imminent tax cuts will go into consumption expenditures to help bolster rates of utilization. It will be recalled that the central justification for regressive tax cuts was the importance of increasing saving. The turnabout reflects, at best, serious incompetence, at worst, the possibility that the original rationale was a cover for class greed, without any redeeming economic logic.

I stressed in the April, 1981, column that Reagan's "new federalism" amounted to an abandonment of the U.S. infrastructure, and was incompatible with economic development in the long term. Our roads, railroads, bridges, port facilities, water, sewage disposal and urban transport systems—essential to a productive and expanding economy—have been undermaintained for years, and accelerated neglect will severely impair national economic viability.

The deliberate gutting of the Environmental Protection Agency and other essential efforts to deal rationally with matters like the disposal of toxic wastes, show Reaganomics to be oriented to the demands of special interests in the short-run. The liquidation of manpower training programs and job and security support for the underclass is in the same mode. To abandon the poor in an environment of slackening growth is not only inhumane, it is shortsighted in terms of a workable society and economy for the future. Many street muggers of the future will be a fallout of Reaganomics.

Finally, Reaganomics is transferring the bulk of the shrinking social surplus into military spending. This is being done with a lavishness that contrasts sharply with the ruthless penny-pinching applied to programs for people without political clout.

The most significant relationship between government expenditures and productivity decline since 1945 does not involve social outlays at all—it is the negative impact of large military budgets on productivity (as in Great Britain and the United States, versus Japan and West Germany.) The huge technological drain into exotic overkill and large naval sitting ducks, which Reagan is pressing upon us, regrettably will further the task he has begun so well in his first two years of rendering American business noncompetitive.

EXPORT TRADE LEGISLATION

HON. SID MORRISON

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to express my support for the Export Trading Company Act, H.R. 1977, and the Bank Export Services Act, H.R. 6016—legislation essential to the development and expansion of domestic export trading companies. I was pleased to join efforts yesterday to pass this important legislation to allow the United States to effectively compete with foreign export trading companies for export markets.

While reducing our serious export trade deficit by maximizing our impact on the world market, this legislation will strengthen our efforts to spur economic recovery in the Northwest. Access to capital and financing for domestic export trading companies will mean jobs and increased productivity for the small- and medium-sized businesses not currently involved in export trade due to restrictions inhibiting export activity. The Northwest has unlimited potential on the world market, and we can compete successfully if the necessary resources and opportunities are in place. This legislation will provide the economic incentives and mechanisms to facilitate the promotion of export trade so vital to the economic health of the Northwest and the Nation. I thank the committees who worked diligently to fashion this legislation and congratulate the full House of Representatives for its long-delayed consideration and approval of these measures.●

UKRAINIAN HUMAN RIGHTS AWARENESS WEEK

HON. LAWRENCE COUGHLIN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. COUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in recognition of Ukrainian Human Rights Awareness Week and to honor the Ukrainian American community for its unyielding efforts to end the repressions suffered in the Ukraine.

Since the 1920's the Ukraine has been held captive by Soviet agressors. Nevertheless, the destruction of Ukrainian churches, the numerous arrests of the intellectual elite, and the forced resettlement of Ukrainian citizens have only served to strengthen and intensify the determination of the Ukrainian people to rid themselves of Soviet domination and regain their status as an independent Nation.

In 1975 the Soviet Government agreed to honor and uphold certain basic rights for all citizens under the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and other such human rights provisions of the Helsinki accords. In an effort to monitor and insure Soviet compliance on these humanitarian issues, the Ukrainian Helsinki Monitoring Group was established. Without regard for the intentions of the monitoring group, however, and in direct violation of the Soviet pledge, all founding members of the Ukrainian Monitoring Group subsequently have been subjected to unwarranted imprisonment exile, and continued harassment by Soviet authorities.

At this time, I would like to reiterate my deep concern about the sad predicament faced by the founder of the Ukrainian Helsinki Group, Mykola Rudenko, who is now serving a maximum 12-year prison sentence in a Soviet labor camp. For his efforts on behalf of his homeland, Rudenko was charged with anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda. Last year, it was brought to our attention that Rudenko's wife, Raisa, was reported missing from her home in Kiev. Mrs. Rudenko had, in fact, been arrested for smuggling several of her husband's poems out of prison and for this she, too, is serving a prison sentence.

Blatant violations of human rights such as those experienced by the Rudenkos must not be allowed to continue. Indeed, we must reaffirm our commitment to freedom and human rights worldwide by continuing to support the courage and the determination of the Rudenkos and so many other Ukrainian citizens who have been silenced by Soviet repression.●

THE PUBLIC'S RIGHT TO COMMENT

HON. DENNIS E. ECKART

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. ECKART. Mr. Speaker, the Department of Health and Human Services proposes to have the option of shutting the door to the public's right to comment and participation in its more controversial making of rules and regulations. I strongly oppose any restrictions on the public's right to know, review and comment on proposed rules and regulations. What the Department espouses is anathema to openness in Government. I suspect this proposal amounts to sneaky, back door method by the administration to reshape social security, medicare, medicaid, and other social program regulations to suit the administration's ends. I commend to the attention of my colleagues an editorial from the Plain Dealer. The editorial concludes correctly that what the Department proposes is a terrible idea.

The article follows:

[From the Plain Dealer, July 26, 1982]

HIDING FROM THE PUBLIC

Given its druthers, the federal Department of Health and Human Services would just as soon make its regulations in a secret, dimly lit back room and spring them full-blown and relatively impregnable from public uproar.

Ironically enough, a proposal to eliminate public comment is passing through the very procedure it would modify. The department's procedure has been to publish proposed regulations in the Federal Register and allow 30 days for public comment before finalizing and implementing them. Officials claim this causes delays of up to a year in putting new rules and regulations into effect. We are not certain how 30 days for public comment translates into a full year of bureaucratic delay, if indeed it does.

What officials seem to mean is that when they issue regulations that don't sit well with the public, it results in nasty editorials, harsh letters, angry speeches and noisy brouhaha, and they are forced to sit down and rework the offending rules. That, we agree, certainly takes more time, but it is time well spent, from the public's point of view.

Without the public comment procedure the department so heartily deplores, Americans would have found that catsup and pickle relish had been actually declared to be servings of vegetables on the plates of schoolchildren. Public comment, not to mention public derision, killed that ridiculous proposed regulation.

Health and Human Services deals with most of the basic social service functions of government; its regulations touch the poor, the elderly, the handicapped and sick. Children, minorities and consumers have all been affected by the department, whether they have known it or not. HHS is presently working on changes in the regulations for Medicaid, Medicare, Social Security and Head Start, among other programs.

Department officials have noted they would continue to use the "notice and comment" procedures in most instances, but would, if the procedure is changed, have the option to suspend notice and comment if alerting the public would "impair the attainment of program objectives or would have other disadvantages that would outweigh the benefits" of public comment.

That sounds fairly easy to interpret: Regulations about which there would be little public comment would continue to be presented for comment. Regulations that would likely raise a tumult, thus delaying implementation, would not be made public until after the fact.

Even HHS officials admit that rules have often been improved as a result of comments from other governmental agencies, from business and industrial interests, civic and consumer groups and private citizens.

Public participation has become firmly entrenched in the national consciousness over the last decade or so. Democracy is all the stronger when the governed are able to freely comment on what their government is doing. Changing public notice and comment procedures is a terrible idea with an understandable fascination for bureaucrats. But cutting Americans out of their part in the making of rules and regulations that so intimately affect so many lives is wrong.●

A SALUTE TO THE OHIO ASSOCIATION OF THE CHIEFS OF POLICE

HON. LOUIS STOKES

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to bring to the attention of my colleagues, the 51st Annual Conference of the Ohio Association of the Chiefs of Police. This conference will be held in Strongsville, Ohio, concluding with a banquet on July 30, 1982. It is a distinct pleasure and honor for me to use this forum to honor the association and the president of the host organization, the Cuyahoga County Police Chiefs Association, Chief Louis Westerburg.

The Ohio Association of the Chiefs of Police represents the majority of police executives in the State of Ohio. Because of the magnitude of the organization's contributions to the citizens of my great State, I feel that it is only fitting to share some of the history of this organization with my colleagues.

Mr. Speaker, the history of this organization spans over 50 years. During this period, the goals of the organization have expanded from providing aid to various police executives to impacting major legislation and administering training programs for law enforcement officials around the State.

It was in 1928 that the motivation and stated need for an organization of this kind surfaced at a meeting of 30 police chiefs in Dayton, Ohio. The primary purposes of the organization in its infancy were, "to secure closer official and personal relationships amongst police officials, to secure unity of action in police matters and to adopt a uniform system of police records making possible an accurate study of crime." After 2 years of refining the mission of the organization, the first meeting was held in December 1930 at which time the constitution and bylaws were adopted.

After functioning with the aforementioned guidelines in mind for a few years, association officials later realized the value of positive input on the legislative process in terms of the police and legal systems. It was at this juncture in the early 1960's, that the association asked Columbus Police Chief George Scholer to undertake the lobbying responsibilities of the association. Soon, this added dimension of the association's existence proved to be worthwhile when in 1965, the association claimed its first legislative victory in passage of vital police training legislation in the Ohio State Legislature. This accomplishment demonstrated to the public and to association members what positive impact they could have on the Ohio State Legislature and subsequently interest in the law enforcement community began to grow.

Mr. Speaker, realizing the favorable impact on the legislative process the combined efforts of the police chiefs in the State of Ohio could have, in 1968, the association officially opened a legislative operations office. This was a major milestone in the organization's history.

In 1971, the office was expanded and the organization worked diligently to establish itself as a viable and legitimate concern in pending law enforcement legislation on the State level. The thrust of the association was expanded also at that time from just monitoring the legislative process to providing concrete programs for the thousands of police officers in the State.

It was at this point that the association began to seek and administer funds to be used for the training of police officers. Through LEAA, the association was successful in securing a training grant that was used primarily to offset small department expenses in sending police officers to short-term training seminars throughout the State of Ohio and also to Northwestern University, Michigan State University, and the Southern Police Institute in Louisville, Ky. During the 10 years of this additional thrust, the association secured well over $500,000 in aid for the training of police officials at no cost to local communities.

Following up on this commitment to quality training of law enforcement officials, the association proposed and secured funding for a State training academy. In the early 1970's, the academy opened its doors. Since that time, thousands of officers from throughout the State have benefited from the excellent instruction and ongoing curriculum in the academy in London, Ohio.

In addition to the training programs initiated by the association, the membership deserves credit for the overhaul of the entire State criminal code and criminal rules and procedure. Mr. Speaker, forming a productive coalition with the LEAA in the State of Ohio and the Governor's office, the Ohio Association of the Chiefs of Police in 1974 successfully coordinated the modification of the existing State code.

From these selected milestones in the history of the Ohio Association of the Chiefs of Police, it is evident that the organization has grown by leaps and bounds in influence and stature both in the Ohio legislature and in the community. Through concerted and dedicated service of the staff and the entire membership, the association has made an indelible mark on legislation, training and communications involving police officers in the State.

Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to salute the association on these monumental achievements. As the membership meets in Strongsville, Ohio, at the 51st annual conference, I know that they will be establishing even greater goals to enhance the delivery of services of the association to its membership and the citizens of the State of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask my colleagues to join me in this salute to the Ohio Association of the Chiefs of Police.●

THE HINCKLEY VERDICT

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I am inserting my Washington report for Wednesday, July 28, 1982, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

THE HINCKLEY VERDICT

The facts were not in dispute. There was ample evidence that John Hinckley carefully planned to kill the President of the United States. He bought the weapon and the explosive bullets, practiced his assault methodically, and stalked the President like a hunter stalks his quarry. Then Mr. Hinckley tried to carry out his plan. On March 30, 1981, he gunned down the President and three other men on a Washington street, permanently disabling one of them. Yet fifteen months later, a jury found Mr. Hinckley not guilty by reason of insanity.

Public reaction to the verdict was immediate. There was confusion, anger, even outrage. How could a would-be assassin who knew what he was doing and knew that it was wrong escape all responsibility? Did not Mr. Hinckley's desire to impress an actress with whom he was infatuated show that he tried to kill the President precisely because he knew that it was wrong? A poll taken shortly after the verdict found that 90% of those responding wanted Mr. Hinckley to be permanently confined even if his emotional problems were eventually corrected. Some people feared that he might soon be back on the streets and would once again menace public officials. Others complained that the verdict would be an incentive to lawbreakers of every kind. Others ridiculed the verdict as something which offended common sense and eroded confidence in the rule of law. Still others criticized the fact that Mr. Hinckley's wealthy family spent about $500,000 on prominent attorneys and medical experts in a classic "rich man's" defense. There can be no doubt that the verdict violated most Americans' sense of justice and fair play. There was a widespread feeling that Mr. Hinckley "beat the system".

As I discussed Mr. Hinckley's acquittal with Hoosiers in the days following the trial, I noted among them the firm belief that abuse of the insanity defense is but one part of a disturbing legal trend which favors the rights of the accused over those of the victims. The ultimate effect of the trend is to disarm society and prevent law-abiding citizens from defending themselves against violent criminals. Hoosiers recognize the need to protect the rights of the accused, but they are concerned that criminals—whether through wealth, trickery, or simple deficiencies in procedure—too often twist the law to their own ends. Hoosiers who spoke with me about the Hinckley case did not advocate abolition of the insanity defense in federal cases. They held the view that there will always be a few clear-cut instances of mental illness so profound that it must in some way excuse behavior which would otherwise be wholly criminal. What these constituents wanted was a thorough reform of the insanity defense: one that would preserve its worthwhile features while greatly restricting its scope. I agreed with them that reform be made without delay. We should redefine legal insanity, create a verdict of "guilty but mentally ill", and shift the burden of proving insanity to the defense.

REDEFINING LEGAL INSANITY

The issue of legal insanity is centuries old, and controversy has surrounded it for much of that time. In 1843, the English courts concluded that the accused was not criminally liable if, on account of mental illness, he did not understand the nature or quality of his act or did not realize that his act was wrong. The federal courts used this definition for some time, but now their standard is more inclusive and easier to satisfy: the accused is not criminally liable if his act is a product of mental disease or defect. One reform would have the federal courts return to the older English definition of legal insanity. Had such a change been made early last year, it is much more likely that Mr. Hinckley would have been convicted. Despite the obvious fact that he was an emotionally disturbed young man, it certainly seemed that he knew what he was doing and knew that is was wrong.

CREATING A VERDICT OF "GUILTY BUT MENTALLY ILL"

Five states (including Indiana) have created a verdict of "guilty but mentally ill." Some 20 state legislatures are weighing the benefits of following suit. The effect of the verdict varies with the mental illness of the convict. Those whose illness is not serious may receive treatment in prison. Those whose illness is serious are confined in mental wards where they receive treatment; when they recover, they are released to prison where they spend the remainder of their term. A second reform would allow this verdict in the federal courts.

The verdict of "guilty but mentally ill" has critics and proponents. Critics say that it may lead to the hospitalization of those who need minimal care or, in the alternative, to minimal care for those who need the hospitalization. On the other side, proponents say that in virtually all cases it is helpful to hold the mentally ill person responsible for what he does: absolving him of responsibility of an act which has important social consequences only encourages him to continue to live in his delusions. Congress must assess both arguments as it deliberates.

SHIFTING THE BURDEN OF PROOF

The instructions of the judge to the jury occasioned what was perhaps the most serious problem in the Hinckley case. Under federal law (and in some states), the jury is told that the defendant who pleads insanity is presumed to be insane unless proven sane beyond a reasonable doubt. Any indication that the defendant may not be mentally stable (for example, his admission that he committed a senseless or unusually awful crime) is in his favor. The burden of proving him sane falls on the prosecution; it is heavy because the prosecution must dispel all reasonable doubt.

A third reform would have the federal courts follow some state courts (including Indiana's) in having the judge instruct the jury that the defendant who pleads insanity must prove his insanity by a preponderance of the evidence (a proof less strict than proof beyond a reasonable doubt). The defendant would win his case only if he had evidence sufficient to outweigh the prosecution's evidence. Had the burden of proof been reversed in the Hinckley trial, a conviction might well have been the outcome.●

CLARIFICATION OF THE SO-CALLED "HOMEPORTING" RULE

HON. LES AuCOIN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to commend the U.S. Navy on its recent clarification of the so-called homeporting rule.

For several years, the Navy has operated under a questionable policy of overhauling Navy vessels in their respective home ports, so long as sufficient drydocking capacity and economic competition were available in such ports. This policy would make a certain amount of limited sense if Navy vessels were homeported evenly throughout the United States. The private ship repair contractors in each port would be allowed to compete on a number of regularly scheduled overhauls and a broad, industrial mobilization base would be preserved.

Through a combination of historical accidents we have seen a dangerous accumulation of ships homeported in just a few ports. When coupled with the fact that the finest drydocking and ship repair facilities in America are not located in those ports, the homeporting rules become an impediment to the preservation of our strong mobilization base.

The ship repair yard in Portland, Oreg., provides a perfect illustration. Several years ago the Port of Portland added to its already impressive ship repair capabilities by acquiring the largest floating drydock on the west coast. It is the only drydock capable of overhauling the huge oil tankers, and has a reputation for excellence in both the commercial and Navy worlds. Unfortunately, the Navy's homeporting rules have all but wiped out Portland's opportunity to compete on Navy overhauls. Because no Navy vessels are homeported in Portland, our local contractors are allowed to bid only on those few overhauls which cannot be scheduled in their respective home ports. As a result, one of our three main ship repair contractors has gone out of business, another refuses to bid on Navy contracts and now we are down to just one remaining contractor.

Through the leadership of Secretary John Lehman, Assistant Secretary George Sawyer, and the new Chief of Naval Operations, Adm. James Watkins, the homeporting rules are being modified. This is a move I have long advocated. Under the new rules, only one-third of the Navy overhauls will be reserved solely for home port contractors. Subject to the Navy's discretion, up to two-thirds of the overhauls can be opened up to costwide competition.

Again, I commend the Navy for its foresight regarding this matter. The clarification of the homeporting rules could be a tremendous step toward strengthening our Navy while assisting taxpayers throughout the United States.●

SEIZE THE OPPORTUNITY FOR PEACE

HON. JOHN J. LaFALCE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. LaFALCE. Mr. Speaker, recent discussions and negotiations aimed at resolving the conflict in Lebanon appear to have lost sight of the true nature of the PLO as well as the opportunities the Israeli military action has afforded for establishing peace in the Mideast. The PLO has consistently worked to sabotage the Camp David accords and to destabilize the governments of our allies, such as Egypt, Jordan, and the Gulf States.

Israel's action against the PLO, at a high price to both combatants and civilians, offers a unique opportunity to restore Lebanon as it was before the PLO and Syrian invasion, and to significantly reduce the influence of the PLO, thereby enhancing the security of America's allies in the region.

Unfortunately, it appears that this opportunity may be undone by present American diplomacy. We seem to be intent upon devising ways to not only legitimize the PLO but to cast it into a more favorable and powerful role than it has had or deserves. We seem to have lost sight of the causes for the conflict and the problems in the Mideast. History and facts are being distorted and even forgotten.

Morton M. Kondracke, executive editor of the New Republic, discusses these issues and suggests appropriate U.S. diplomatic goals and actions, in the Wall Street Journal, July 22. I recommend "Reagan Diplomacy and the Rehabilitation of the PLO" to my colleagues.

The article follows:

[From the Wall Street Journal, July 22, 1982]

REAGAN DIPLOMACY AND THE REHABILITATION OF THE PLO

(By Morton M. Kondracke)

The Palestine Liberation Organization has done nothing—ever—to merit sympathy or support in the West. As a result of Israel's invasion of Lebanon, it's become clear how little real backing the PLO enjoyed even among other Arabs. The Israelis have destroyed the military strength which formerly made the PLO a force to be feared, if not respected. And yet, at its moment of maximum weakness, the PLO is brazenly demanding that the civilized world guarantee its survival, find it a new base of operations, accord it expanded diplomatic recognition and further its political aims. Incredibly, the world seems to be giving in, with the United States leading the way.

The American media still have the sense not to glorify a gunman who uses hostages to shield himself from the police, but every day they are making Yasser Arafat out to be a plucky little hero, even as he hides behind the innocent civilians of West Beirut.

Meanwhile, the Reagan administration has eased the pressure on Arafat to give up by urging Israel not to launch a final attack. The administration is hinting that if Arafat will merely mutter some magic words—"I accept U.N. Resolution 242"—he can get a full pardon, a military escort out of town and a sponsored membership in the club of world statesmen. This gangland boss with his back to the wall may end up being given American support for a PLO state in the West Bank.

It's hard to believe that President Reagan and the belatedly influential Henry Kissinger actually will permit U.S. policy to go so far awry, but rehabilitation of Arafat and the PLO is under way. It has been practically a non-stop project in the U.S. media ever since Israel invaded Lebanon.

The media more or less uncritically accepted assertions that Israel killed 10,000 Lebanese civilians at the outset of the war. It is only now becoming clear that those early estimates came from the PLO, not (as widely reported) the International Red Cross, and that the true numbers of civilian victims are in the hundreds, not thousands. In Tyre, the press reported that 1,000 civilians were killed. The town's mayor put the number at 63.

Too many have died, to be sure, but the press failed to convey the extent to which the Israelis took precautions to limit casualties—including warning civilians to leave. On the contrary, the TV networks' constant emphasis on Israeli censorship implied that Israel was covering up atrocities.

The lesson of recent wars surely is that nations are well advised, if they can, to make censorship total. The pictures Israel has let through have hurt its case, as the footage from Vietnam hurt ours. Britain beat the Argentines and then released the bad news about how. You can be sure that the Soviets will never show what they've done in Afghanistan, and so the world will not scold them for it. The CIA, if it were wise, would equip Afghan rebels with videotape cameras as well as rifles. In the modern world, TV tape is mightier than a cannon.

The U.S. press also has overemphasized Israeli opposition to the Lebanese war. Polls there indicate that more than 90% of the country supports the operation. The press has been focusing on the other 10%. It also has almost entirely failed to report upon the style of government the PLO gave to the areas it formerly occupied in Southern Lebanon. By accounts of those who have been there, it was thug government in which PLO gunmen took what they wanted and punished those who resisted them. Of late, the press and TV have been carrying daily pictures of Yasser Arafat kissing babies and rallying his troops. Where are the interviews with Lebanese civilians held captive in West Beirut?

The image of Arafat being conveyed to the American public now is that of a moderate man forced by his enemies into unsavory alliances and desperate deeds. Menachem Begin and Ariel Sharon make convenient heavies for the piece. It can easily be believed of them (as charged in some full page ads) that they are destroying the PLO in order to suppress the Palestinian people and hold onto the West Bank forever.

Possibly they would like to do just that, but their opportunity (indeed, the Likud Party's accession to power) arises fundamentally from the consistent refusal of all the Arabs except Egypt to accept Israel's existence. Israel would not have the West Bank if it hadn't been attacked in 1967, and it wouldn't have it now if Jordan had agreed to a territorial settlement afterward or if Arafat had launched a Sadat-style peace campaign.

The Likud government certainly has helped recruit supporters for Arafat in the West Bank by its excessively oppressive rule, but Arafat is no peace campaigner. The PLO charter continues to call for Israel's destruction and the organization has made itself a key agent of instability in the West. It is armed by and allied with Moscow, and it trains terrorists without much regard for ideology—as long as they do their killing in countries allied with the U.S. Its only lasting monuments are Maalot and Munich. Israel has not meticulously observed the rules of gentlemanly behavior in Lebanon, but it has done the civilized world a favor by smashing the PLO.

Now, the Reagan administration seems to be offering the PLO's gunmen not just an escape with their lives, but political legitimacy. Time after time, Arafat has been quoted by visiting journalists and congressmen as agreeing to live in peace with Israel—only to disavow the statement the following day. Now, the administration is implying that if he should merely whisper that he accepts U.N. Resolution 242, the U.S. will negotiate directly with him. It's just a step from there to promoting the PLO as a partner in West Bank peace talks and only one more step to advocating PLO rule. Having failed to achieve his aims by violence Arafat may be about to achieve them by words, uttered under duress, which may well be lies.

In 1980, presidential candidate Ronald Reagan correctly branded the PLO as a terrorist organization. This June, Henry Kissinger correctly observed that bringing the PLO into peace talks would give a veto "to the most intransigent element in the Arab world." The U.S. ought to be offering the PLO a safe exit from Beirut, but nothing more. It ought to be pushing Israel to be generous in the West Bank automony talks and urging Jordan to join them, too. The Israelis have created the chance to shape a peace in the Middle East without the scourge of PLO terrorism. The U.S. shouldn't throw that chance away.●

HONORING GEORGE BARTELS

HON. RICHARD L. OTTINGER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to bring to the attention of my colleagues the distinguished public service career of Mr. George Bartels, who will be retiring from service to the city of New Rochelle, N.Y., on August 1.

George Bartels has spent 25 years as a municipal official in New Rochelle. For 22 years he served as assistant to the city manager, and in the words of a resolution passed by the New Rochelle City Council, Mr. Bartels established "a hallmark for creative and effective contributions in the realm of municipal administration."

Mr. Bartels' achievements go beyond dedicated service to his city. He has contributed to the welfare of our Nation through service with the State Department and a 34-year military tour of active and reserve duty. He actively participates in such groups as the Boy Scouts, American Legion, YMCA, and Rotary Club.

George Bartels has made an important contribution to his community and country. I salute him for a brilliant career fueled by remarkable devotion, and wish him the best of luck in the future.

I am including in today's RECORD the text of a resolution commending George Bartels by the New Rochelle City Council:

RESOLUTION

Whereas, George W. Bartels, virtually a life-long resident of this community, concludes his exceptionally meritorious career of devoted public service to the City and citizens of New Rochelle on August 1, 1982, and

Whereas, his illustrious quarter century, as a municipal official, with twenty-two years as Assistant to the City Manager, establishes a hallmark for creative and effective contributions in the realm of municipal administration, and

Whereas, during his lengthy tenure in a position of high responsibility, sensitivity and complexity, George Bartels has demonstrated an extraordinary aptitude for problem-solving, for applying innovative measures to the processes of management and for contributing wise counsel and warmhearted understanding among all his associates, and

Whereas, George W. Bartels served his country with distinction during a thirty-four year tour of active and reserve military duty retiring with the rank of Colonel, as well as with the U.S. State Department, and actively participates in the public-spirited enterprises of the Boy Scouts, the American Legion, the YMCA NR day nursery, and of the Rotary Club, which he has served as President; now therefore, but it

Resolved, That this Council of the City of New Rochelle hereby commends George W. Bartels on his distinguished quarter century of service to the City administration and to all the people of this community among whom he has earned the greatest respect, the highest admiration and the most sincere affection. We wish him Godspeed and for him and his wife Joan we hope that the retirement days ahead will be healthful and happy and filled with bright sunshine, and now therefore, be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be spread upon the minutes of this Council and a suitable copy presented to George W. Bartels.●

WELCOME TO OUR NEWLY NATURALIZED AMERICANS

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, it is with sincere pleasure that I congratulate the Orange and Rockland County residents of New York's 26th Congressional District who have recently chosen to become citizens of the United States, with all of the privileges, freedoms, and responsibilities that American citizenship entails.

Our Hudson Valley region in New York State is proud of its newest citizens, and I invite my colleagues to join in welcoming the following newly naturalized Americans and extending to them our best wishes for a happy and prosperous life in their new homeland:

THE PLIGHT OF IDA NUDEL

HON. LAWRENCE COUGHLIN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 20, 1982

● Mr. COUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, I join my colleagues today in an expression of mutual concern on behalf of Ida Nudel, whose continuing struggle to obtain permission to emigrate from the Soviet Union to Israel has been an inspiration to all.

Holon, Israel is just over 2,000 miles from Moscow. For Ida Nudel it might just as well be the other side of the Moon. Since 1971, when she first applied for an exit visa, Ida Nudel has been harassed, slandered, and subjected to the inhuman treatment. Convicted of malicious hooliganism in 1978, she was sent to Krivosheina, Siberia.

Now, 4 years later, after her release from Krivosheina, Ida Nudel has been denied a propiska, or residence permit, to live either in Moscow or in Riga. Propiskas are usually denied to people who have been convicted of crimes such as robbery, murder or rape—Ida Nudel's only crime is her desire for freedom. The individual denied a propiska is prohibited from entering the city and, in fact, must stay outside a 100 kilometer radius.

Soviet authorities still have not determined what to do with this woman whose only crime is her great desire to leave her country. Ida Nudel now has been charged with alcoholism and this could eventually result in her incarceration in a psychiatric hospital.

Ida Nudel has suffered far too long. Fortunately, however, her indomitable will, her indefatigable spirit, and her untiring patience have remained constant. Hers continues to be a shining example to all that one's steadfast adherence to a just cause is, indeed, noble.

We must not abandon our efforts to support Ida Nudel's cause. Only by constant vigilance can we in the United States hope to persuade the Soviet Government that their treatment of Ida Nudel and other Soviet dissidents will not be acceptable.●

CYPRUS

HON. ROY DYSON

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. DYSON. Mr. Speaker, as one concerned with peace and justice at home and abroad, I wish to enter the following remarks concerning the blatant and unacceptable violations of the rights of Cyprus by Turkey.

Eight years ago this month the international community witnessed an alarming act of illegal aggression which to date cannot and must not be forgotten. This deplorable event lingers in the memories of the entire world not only because of the unjustifiable nature of the act and the extreme brutality of the aggressors but also because of the blatant unwillingness of those responsible to rectify their actions.

On July 20, 1974, the Turkish junta authorized 40,000 troops to invade the shores of the Republic of Cyprus. Turkey sought and indeed continues to pursue the expansionist goals of political separation of the Greek and Turkish Cypriot communities and the union of 36.3 percent of Cyprus with Turkey. This Turkish-occupied section of the Republic accounts for fully 70 percent of the island's economic potential.

Although there is currently no further bloodshed in Cyprus, this must not be misinterpreted as peaceful resignation to the status quo. Still today there exists both a dire threat to international peace in the Eastern Mediterranean which a conscious, concerned international community can never accept coupled with inactive, nevertheless blatant, continued hostility directed at Cyprus.

Despite the fact that 8 years have elapsed since the initial invasion of Cyprus by Turkey, the situation in Cyprus has not improved; rather, it has worsened with time. Still Turkish forces occupy much of the island, there are 200,000 refugees who were uprooted from their homes and Cyprus continues to search for 2,000 missing persons. This situation is horrifying and unacceptable by all standards.

Turkey has not only defied and violated international law but has also opted to disregard U.N. Charter. The United Nations has adopted resolutions calling for the withdrawal of Turkish troops from Cyprus and the return of the refugees to their respective homes in an effort to insure the island's independence, nonalinement, and unification.

Consistent with the United States concern for the pursuit of human rights and justice in Cyprus, our country supported such U.N. resolutions. Clearly, however, this is not enough.

As a global power and leader of the Western World, it behooves the United States to actively implore the Turkish junta to withdraw from Cyprus and terminate further violation of the most fundamental and humanitarian rights of the Republic. Our Government must support the sovereignty and unification of the Republic of Cyprus.

As a concerned American I call on the U.S. Government to demand termination of the illegal and unwarranted pursuit of further aggression and violation of the rights of Cyprus by Turkey. The 8-year-long chronology of tragedy must not be forgotten until an acceptable and permanent solution is rendered and Cyprus is restored its right to be an independent and territorially integral republic.●

COMMODITY PRICE SUPPORTS PUSH UP BUDGET, COST CONSUMERS

HON. JOHN EDWARD PORTER

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, as Congress continues its battle to control the budget, we must diligently seek ways to reduce the deficit and still retain vital programs.

This, of course, requires conscientious soul searching to determine priorities. I have often advocated continued support for the guaranteed student loan program. This program is essential to providing access to higher education for all students, and it can become cost effective with the proper safeguards.

On the other hand, there are numerous programs that not only succeed in driving up the budget deficit but also tap valuable resources that could be put to better use.

Among these are three large-scale, pork barrel projects—the Tennessee-Tombigbee Waterway, the Clinch River Breeder Reactor, and the SRC I (solvent refined coal) demonstration plant—could ultimately cost taxpayers upward of $12 billion. The first of these three is wasteful and unnecessary and should not be built at all. The remaining two, if they deserve to be built, should be developed by private enterprise.

There is another group of special-interest legislation that is extremely costly to taxpayers. This is the program of commodity price supports and subsidies that forces people to pay out of both sides of their pocketbooks—as taxpayers and as consumers.

It cost taxpayers more than $8 billion this year for these programs that protect producers of grain, tobacco, cotton, dairy products, soybeans, peanuts, sugar, and wool.

And this $8 billion does not include the out-of-pocket cost to consumers who are forced to pay artificially high prices at the supermarket for such items as milk, sugar, and peanut butter because the Government restricts supplies.

While consumers are paying as much as $2.25 a gallon for milk at the store, they also are paying the Government some $2.2 billion to purchase and store excess dairy products. As of April 9, the Government owned 365 million pounds of butter, 625 million pounds of cheese, and 975 million pounds of nonfat dry milk.

Some price supports may be necessary to protect a highly perishable commodity such as milk and insure a year-round supply. But supports at the current level encourage excessive production and should be sharply restricted. The administration has proposed reductions in dairy price supports for fiscal 1983, and I certainly favor this measure.

Sugar is still another example of a product for which consumers are paying artifically high prices because the Government agreed to purchase unsold sugar for a minimum of 17 cents a pound. Now, in an effort to avoid spending about $400 million for surplus sugar, the Government has imposed import quotas on foreign sugar, which sells for about 9 cents a pound on the world market.

These sugar import quotas threaten to seriously impair the President's Caribbean Basin program, aimed at spurring economic growth in those very same countries that are among the world's major sugar producers.

And, by artificially inflating the price of domestic sugar, the program could cost consumers up to $3 billion a year at the store.

Peanut and tobacco growers also receive special protection under a system of allotments that limits growing rights to a select few. This system is feudalistic, passing growing rights down from father to son and restricting free access to the marketplace. These commodities, too, are protected by a form of price supports, costing taxpayers millions of dollars.

Furthermore, it is strange, indeed, that while our Government is supporting the tobacco industry with one hand, with the other it is funding the National Institutes of Health for research into cancer and heart disease, both linked to tobacco use.

It is also ironic that the very same people who are most strongly opposed to Government regulation, in general, lose their principles when it is Government intervention for protection of their own pet industries.

The administration this year has cut $3 billion from its request for the farm stablization program. The President is to be commended for his attempt to restrict these programs.

As Congress reviews the budget, however, it should be wary of log-rolling attempts to push price support levels back up. Rather, it must attempt to cut back these wasteful programs at an even faster rate in order to curb Federal spending and balance the budget.●

HUMAN RIGHTS CONDITIONS IN EL SALVADOR

HON. LES AuCOIN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Speaker, today the President certified that human rights conditions in El Salvador had improved. In fact they have improved so much that El Salvador requires and additional $61 million of U.S. military aid and assistance. It is news to me that carnage and destruction passes for human rights policy. But, as one State Department official so aptly commented, "We call them as we see them."

By turning a blind eye to acts of torture and murder sanctioned by the El Salvadoran Government, the Reagan administration is not only insuring, but encouraging continuation of these acts.

The March elections, touted as a smashing success by the U.S. State Department, moved El Salvador further to the violent right. as frightening statistics released by the Americas Watch and Amnesty International verify, the new government observes no standards of human rights at all. Any rational consideration of the situation in El Salvador highlights the absurdity of the administration claims.

I am not advocating that we ignore the problems of El Salvador—we cannot afford to. We in Congress must reiterate our commitment to improving conditions in El Salvador. Any hope of achieving a negotiated settlement hinges on U.S. monitoring and involvement. But we must not let our impatience goad us into pursuing a military solution to the long-entrenched political problems of El Salvador. Genuine respect for human rights must be the paramount consideration of both nations; anything less works directly against America's long-term interest by making our country appear to be a silent partner in human repression.

Mr. Speaker, for all the above reasons I support, and am an original cosponsor of the Studds-Harkin amendment introduced today. We in Congress must be willing to assume the responsibility to protect human rights in El Salvador. Obviously, this is a burden the administration is not willing to bear.●

GLEN COVE TAXPAYERS SHOULD NOT FINANCE PRIVILEGES FOR SOVIETS

HON. JOHN LeBOUTILLIER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. LeBOUTILLIER. Mr. Speaker, a storm of controversy is brewing in Glen Cove, N.Y., over the use of taxpayer dollars to subsidize municipal privileges for Soviet Embassy personnel assigned to that city.

The bottom line concerns dollars and cents: Should the taxpayers of Glen Cove allow their hard-earned dollars to be used to provide comforts, recreation and special benefits for their Soviet tenants?

I say "No!" and in addition to this glaring misuse of tax funds, the controversy highlights a greater question concerning United States-Soviet relations.

Mayor Parente's decision to deny recreation and parking privileges to Soviet personnel assigned to the Glen Cove residence cannot be viewed as an isolated event wherein a local jurisdiction has somehow "overstepped" its bounds of authority.

The greater question centers on the undeniable relationship between the Soviet Government and its official representatives throughout the world.

Mayor Parente's action no doubt reflects the legitimate concerns of Glen Cove's citizens and millions of people worldwide who daily witness and suffer the Soviet onslaught against freedom.

It is hypocritical to defend and finance Soviet privileges (not rights) in America while 100,000 Soviet troops ravage Afghanistan or while millions of freedom-loving Poles continue to suffer under the yoke of a brutal, Soviet-backed martial law crackdown.

It is the Soviet Union that finances, trains, and harbors the PLO and the worldwide terrorist network through its East German, Cuban, and Libyan puppets.

It is the Soviet Union that stalks Long Island industries with larcenous eyes in its quest to steal defense-related technology to further bolster its massive military buildup.

Glen Cove has every right—as individual citizens, taxpayers, residents of the city, and as free-living Americans—to object to Soviet deceit and opportunism. Mayor Parente should be commended for his courageous stand against tyranny.

Mayor Parente may not have chosen the most amicable option to deal with these inhospitable tenants, but he has certainly chosen the right one. I stand behind the Mayor's decision 100 percent and urge him not to rescind the sanctions.

So long as the Soviet Government and its official representatives continue to flaunt their abuse of freedom and simultaneously attempt to exploit the benefits of our free society, official Soviet personnel—whether they be stationed in Gorki or Glen Cove—are deserving of no special privileges.

Indeed, they deserve to be treated with the suspicion they have so dubiously earned.●

WE MUST BRING INTEREST RATES DOWN

HON. BYRON L. DORGAN

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, if we allow high interest rates to continue much longer, it is going to break the back of our economy.

The Federal deficit is part of the problem. But it is only one part. Another part—a very large one—is the Federal Reserve Board, which determines how much money there will be in our Nation, and in large measure, how much this money will cost.

The Federal Reserve Board is not helping our interest rate problem. Instead, it is making that problem worse.

The Federal Reserve Board used to concern itself with interest rates. It used to adjust the supply of money to try to keep interest rates at a reasonable level.

It did not always do a great job. But at least it had its eye on the right ball.

Then a bunch of economists called monetarists came to town and told the Federal Reserve Board not to be concerned about interest rates. The important thing, these monetarists said, was the supply of money.

So the Federal Reserve stopped being concerned about interest rates. It focused instead on keeping the supply of money below a certain level. We are seeing the results.

The monetarists tell us not to worry, that the problem is with "technical factors." They have endless debates over these "technical factors" that nobody can understand.

America cannot wait while these economists play games.

The problems we face are not technical. They are fundamental. You cannot fix an engine by tinkering with the speedometer. We cannot solve our interest rate problems by arguing over how to measure the supply of money.

The American people do not care about monetary theories. They care about interest rates. Our responsibility here in Washington is to do something about interest rates. If we cannot understand that, then I think we are not ever going to understand anything.

Since 1913, we have given a handful of big city bankers who control the Federal Reserve a complete monopoly over our credit and interest rate policy. We let these money-center bankers decide how much credit there will be and how much it will cost. That system is not working. We have to change it.

The noted economist, Lester Thurow, addressed these questions in a recent column in Newsweek magazine. I ask that Mr. Thurow's column be reprinted here for the benefit of my colleagues and the American public.

The Newsweek column follows:

[From the Newsweek magazine, July 5, 1982]

HOW TO BRING RATES DOWN

(By Lester C. Thurow)

What would happen to the American economy if interest rates were to stay at current levels for another two years? To ask the question is to know the answer. The American economy would be flat on its back with irreparable harm done to its industrial base and labor force.

After two years of high interest rates, weekly business failures—548 in the week ending June 17—are approaching the 1932 record: 612 weekly failures. One can see recessions as a form of economic Darwinism weeding out the weak, but current conditions are putting the best-managed American companies, such as Boeing or Caterpillar, on the economic ropes. If they take a pounding long enough, they will cease to exist as viable economic entities.

INVEST TODAY

Capitalism, a system where individuals invest today to get more back tomorrow, simply does not work with high interest rates and the stagnant business conditions they create. Unless the GNP is growing, the average capitalist cannot get more back tomorrow, and with current interest rates the smartest capitalists simply leave their money in the bank to earn rates of return that are far better than anything to be had in the world of real plant and equipment investments.

When the leading monetarists, such as Milton Friedman in his column in this magazine last week, effectively admit that high interest rates cannot be explained from tenets of monetarism, the time has come for the Federal Reserve and the Reagan Administration to abandon monetarism. The Fed's 1979 conversion to a doctrime that it should look only at the rate of growth of the money supply and never at interest rates when setting monetary policies was a mistake. Economic theories must be rejected when they cannot explain major facts and when they lead to disastrous results.

From any perspective other than that of monetarism, high interest rates are not a mystery. The Federal funds overnight lending rate has been between 14 and 15 percent. Overnight lending rates reflect nothing but the interplay of simple supply and demand, with the Federal Reserve the principal player on the supply side of the market. Short-term interest rates are too high because the Fed is conducting monetary policies that are too tight.

The appropriate solution is for the Fed to go back to watching interest rates rather than the money supply in setting monetary policies. If the Fed were to order its New York bond traders to buy and sell short-term bonds to hold the prime interest rate (now 16.5 percent) 5 percentage points above the rate of inflation in the previous six months (currently an interest rate of about 8.7 percent), the real interest rate would be well above its historical average of 3 percent. That would not be an easy monetary policy for rekindling inflation, but a necessary retreat from an absurd monetary policy to a tight one.

There is no doubt that the Fed can control short-term interest rates if it chooses to do so. It held short-term interest rates below 2 percent from the outbreak of World War II to the end of the Korean War. The relevant question is not whether the Fed can do it, but whether the Fed should do it. And the correct answer is that it should.

SMALL SAVINGS

With lower short-term interest rates, long-term rates would fall, but easier monetary policies need to be supported by tighter fiscal policies. To get long-term rates down permanently, savings must be increased and this means controlling prospective government deficits. The problem with deficits is that they are a subtraction from national savings. Last year individuals saved $108 billion. If the budget deficit is $108 billion or larger, the government is absorbing all of personal savings. With a much smaller supply of savings coming into private capital markets, high long-term interest rates are to be expected.

Ultimately, the Federal Reserve Board should be part of the Treasury Department so that those who are going to be held politically responsible for the economy, the President and the Congress, have the economic power that belongs with that political responsibility. But the real independence of the Fed is grossly exaggerated. If the Reagan Administration made it clear that it wanted different monetary policies tomorrow, it would get them. If we don't have them it is because the Reagan Administration does not want them.

Interest rates are going to come down. We will either bring them down with our economic policies or they will fall in the wake of a collapsing economy.●

WE HAVE GOTTEN THE SHELF OFF THE SHELF

HON. EDWIN B. FORSYTHE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. FORSYTHE. Mr. Speaker, on June 20, 1980, the Washington Post ran a column by Mr. William Raspberry entitled "Getting the Shelf Off of the Shelf." That article was one of a series of articles by Mr. Raspberry about the energy problems besetting this Nation. The premise of the article was that the Federal Government was our worst energy enemy. The articles succinctly pointed out that the policies and procedures of past administrations were a part of, and compounded, the energy problems this Nation was experiencing. Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to insert one of his articles in the RECORD at this point in my statement.

OUR OWN ENERGY ENEMY

(By William Raspberry)

America's agonizing over how to break the OPEC stranglehold on our oil supplies focuses on the wrong villain, one energy expert contends. If we are strangling, says Milton Copulos, it's because we've got our hands locked firmly around our own throats.

According to Copulos, an energy policy analyst of the Heritage Foundation, we've got all the oil we need right here in America. The problem is that state and federal policy keeps us from getting at it.

His reference is not only to the 27.3 billion barrels of proven U.S. reserves—enough in itself to put us ahead of such oil-rich nations as Libya, Venezuela and Nigeria, which is our second biggest source of imported oil behind Saudia Arabia. His own studies indicate potential U.S. reserves of between 276 billion and 444 billion barrels—"enough to support current levels of consumption for the next 46 to 74 years without importing a single drop."

Then why all the talk about an energy crisis? Why did President Carter try to add a gasoline pump surcharge? Why did House-Senate conferees this week order Carter to go forward with building a 750-million-barrel strategic petroleum reserve? Why can't we simply tap our own vast supplies and say to hell with OPEC?

"Put simply," says Copulos. "policies at the state and federal levels have effectively hamstrung attempts to develop domestic reserves, and in doing so have helped tighten the OPEC noose around our necks."

He is ready with impressive examples:

A half-billion barrels of oil lie in Santa Ynez off the coast of California. But while we could be getting 80,000 barrels a day from that source (discovered fully a dozen years ago), we have yet to pump a single drop. The reason? "Inability to obtain the necessary permits from the state and federal governments."

There are an estimated 76 billion barrels of recoverable oil in Alaska—perhaps as much as 113 billion. Alaskan production today is only about 1.6 million barrels a day, about 13 percent of total U.S. production.

In all of Alaska—with potential reserves greater than the proven reserves of Venezuela, Abu Dhabi, Mexico and the Soviet Union—only seven oil rigs are presently operating, compared with 366 in Louisiana and 807 in Texas. "Why? Lack of access. More than 120 million acres of the state, including many of the areas that hold the greatest promise for the discovery of oil and gas, have been foreclosed to exploration by Carter administration executive fiat."

The Georges Bank and Baltimore Canyon offshore fields—each of which is estimated to be the equal of the North Sea discovery—are being held up by court challenges and the restrictive leasing policies of the Department of the Interior.

Occidental Petroleum, which could be producing an additional 231 barrels a day in California, has been unable to obtain the required permission from the state.

"In a sort of perverse application of 'Murphy's Law,'" Copulos charges, "anything the government can do to prevent the development of domestic energy, it does."

Nor is it only on U.S. production that government policy has its strangling effect, says Copulos, who will shortly be releasing his calculations in a Heritage Foundation study:

"Negotiations with Mexico, which possesses 40 billion barrels of proved reserves and enough potential reserves to make it a rival of Saudi Arabia, have been stymied by the intrasigence of U.S. officials.

"The proposed Northern Tier Pipeline to transport natural gas from Alberta, Canada, is threatened by the unwillingness of U.S. officials to provide the necessary guarantees. At every turn, our officials seem determined to throw roadblocks in the way of reducing our dependence on Arab imports."

Obviously many of the policies Copulos decries are designed to protect the American environment. But if Copulos is anywhere close to accurate—the Department of Energy has no reliable figures of its own—America is coming awfully close to being its own energy enemy.

For even assuming we will one day run out of oil, domestic supplies of upward of 46 years would give us the time to develop alternatives to fossil fuels.

The June 20 article focused primarily on House Joint Resolution 573, a joint resolution introduced in the House, and Senate Joint Resolution 184 which was introduced in the Senate. The key point of the resolution was contained in section 3 and called for offering areas on the Outer Continental Shelf of high oil and gas potential for lease sale; offering entire geographic provinces for nomination; and conducting environmental studies on as wide an area as possible. The purpose of these provisions was to increase the domestic production of oil and gas, while preserving current environmental and other laws.

If you have followed the energy policies of this administration, you will recognize these points as the key provisions of the administration's new 5-year OCS oil and gas leasing program which became final on July 21 of this year. I believe we can now say that we have taken a major step toward getting the shelf off of the shelf. And we are no longer our own energy enemy. On July 23, the day after the new program was finalized, the Washington Post ran an editorial in support of the new program.

Mr. Speaker, this is a very important program because it is not only a positive statement by this Nation that it is committed to accelerating the production of its abundant domestic energy resources but also that it will do so in an environmentally and occupationally safe and orderly manner.

The need for increasing domestic energy production is obvious.

In 1979, because about 5 percent of this Nation's imports were interrupted, we faced shortages of hydrocarbon fuels. That shortage, and the subsequent 275-percent increase in the price of fuel, was a social, economic, and industrial blow to this Nation. Particularly hard hit was the Northeastern United States.

The problems we faced then, and will continue to face for many years to come, were not new, and in fact were predicted in 1953 by Carl "King" Hubbard, who is a petroleum expert and former associate director of the U.S. Geologic Survey. Unfortunately, his warnings went unheeded.

Today we have reduced our imports from just over the 50-percent rate of 1977 to today's level of approximately 30 percent of domestic consumption. It is hoped that our current level of conservation can continue, and perhaps even increase, in addition to accelerating the development of our abundant domestic resources. This latter point is important because even if we can continue to hold down our consumption, many experts feel that our oil imports could reach 50 to 55 percent of our needs by the early or mid-1990's if the policies that have plagued domestic energy production in the past are not altered. The newly implemented 5-year OCS leasing program is a major step in reversing those policies.

Currently, only 2.5 percent of this Nation's Outer Continental Shelf is under lease, while over 40 percent of the worldwide OCS is under lease. In addition, the United States receives only 8 percent of its domestic oil production from the Outer Continental Shelf compared to the worldwide OCS production rate of 22 percent of the total world oil demand. What is interesting about these figures is that the peak OCS production was in 1973, the year of the Arab oil embargo, and OCS oil production has decreased by about 30 percent since that time. This is inexcusable because, while the Federal Government owns over 85 percent of this Nation's remaining unproduced oil resources, it owns all of the OCS which contains up to 60 percent of our remaining oil resources. Clearly it has been the policies of the Federal Government, policies of past administrations, that have prevented accelerated production of domestic oil and gas from the OCS. This administration's new 5-year OCS leasing program is designed to do the job that should have been done long ago, as well as to respond to other national priorities by protecting the human, coastal, and marine environment as well as to continue the active role of State and local governments in pre- and post-lease OCS activities.

It is important to remember that the U.S. OCS oil and gas program has been an environmentally safe program, even though the possibility of harm does exist. This is because of the technological advances of American industry, as well as the laws of this Nation. The new program does nothing to alter any of this.

We have had only one blowout in U.S. waters from OCS oil and gas operations of any consequence and, while we do not have all of the answers on impacts from OCS oil and gas activities, it is accurate to state that at this time there is no discernible, significant, or irreversible harm from U.S. OCS oil and gas activities; the danger of oil spills exists from imported tankered crude oil and refined products. An active OCS oil and gas program could actually decrease the level of oil pollution by increasing production and decreasing the flow of foreign tankered oil into U.S. waters. Last year alone shipping, through normal operations, spilled about 13,000,000 barrels of oil into the oceans, and another 2,300,000 barrels were spilled through accidents. OCS oil and gas operations, including all shipping connected with those operations, spill only an average of 13,000 barrels a year, an almost indetectable level. Those of us that live in the Northeastern United States, or for that matter in almost any coastal area, are fully aware of this situation because we have read about oil spills and seen oil on our beaches long before any drilling took place off our shores.

Since 1973 this country has been through a roller coaster of energy setbacks. Since the cutoff of Iranian oil we have experienced significant shortages and price increases and should be fully aware that our energy problems are not temporary but long range. We should also have learned the inadvisability of relying on the future goodwill and stability of foreign nations for significant portions of our domestic oil needs.

The specter of turmoil and instability has again arisen in the Mideast because of the invasion of Iraq by Iran and because Israel is embroiled in war.

Temporary difficulties such as the recent oil glut, the resulting price decrease, and now the probable price increase of imports are not the type of situations that national policy should be based upon. We are facing a genuine long-term energy problem—a problem that has been predicted and a problem we can and will solve through proper planning, such as has been done with the 5-year OCS leasing program.

The new program has been thoroughly evaluated; as a matter of fact, only the Alaskan pipeline received more public and private hearings, and greater evaluation.

The new program not only can significantly increase domestic energy production but also can increase revenues to the Treasury through leasing, rentals, and royalties. The new program can increase national security by decreasing our dependence on unstable foreign sources of oil and can do it in a safe and orderly manner.

Mr. Speaker, it is indeed overdue, but it looks as if we have finally gotten the shelf off of the shelf. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.●

TUITION TAX CREDITS

HON. DUNCAN HUNTER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Speaker, Dr. Henry Karlson, research director of the American Parents' Association, Inc., is a nationally recognized expert on the interaction between government and family. In a recent newspaper column Dr. Karlson, an associate professor at the Indiana University School of Law, explores some of the legal and economic issues surrounding tuition tax credits (TTC's).

Dr. Karson emphasizes an economic reality often ignored by the opponents of tuition tax credits when he writes:

TTC's are not actually more expensive for the taxpayer. In fact, they would serve as a tax cut, not a tax increase. They will permit the local schools to operate at less expensive level, thereby freeing the burden of the beleaguered property taxpayer upon whose shoulders the largest share of supporting public educational institutions rests.

In Washington, D.C., where a tuition tax credit initiative was recently defeated by the city's voters, it was estimated by the measure's supporters that:

Taxpayer savings for every 4,000 students transferring from public schools to non-public schools would have been $5.8 million annually for the District of Columbia.

According to the Economic Communications Center of the Media Institute, a doubling of enrollments in non-public schools could have resulted in a savings of $3,000 per pupil, or $48 million per year, based upon 1981 costs.

More important, however, than this economic point is Dr. Karlson's analysis of tuition tax credits as they relate to basic constitutional rights. He says in part:

How can this nation claim to support the First Amendment of the Constitution—the right of free speech—when we do not permit attendance at places of education which encourage a diversity of thought? To require that all students without the economic means attend only public schools, is to impair the right to access of divergent thoughts to today's youth.

Tuition tax credits are one means of providing free choice in education. The government should provide a free market place of ideas rather than bolstering an already cumbersome monopoly in education which has been fostered by the public school establishment.

TTC's would widen the scope of persons eligible for alternative educational endeavor. It would place non-public schools more in reach of the nation's middle and lower income families by giving them a tax break. Most proposals, including the Reagan plan, place a cap on eligibilities so as to benefit lower and moderate income families rather than the rich.

The American Parents Association, a group dedicated to preserving the American family, is interested in the tuition tax credit issue because it believes that many moderate income families currently denied a free choice in education are being caught in an economic squeeze. Dr Karlson writes:

Many parents view public schools as crime-ridden prisons where powerless children are exposed to daily diets of drugs and violence. Lack of parental imput in the teachings in public schools causes many families to pull their children out of public school at a tremendous financial hardship to the family.

In short, the issue rests on fundamental principles. Dr. Karlson concludes by quoting from the noted education rights attorney, William B. Ball:

We should shut our ears to hysterical claims that educational tax credits will threaten "public education." They will aid public education by helping it be responsible, thrifty and competitive. But by far, the greater value of a tuition tax credit is its role as an enabler of the enjoyment of Constitutional liberties.

I commend the American Parents Association for their work on this issue and I hope that my colleagues will carefully consider Dr. Karlson's analysis when reaching a decision on the tuition tax credit proposal.●

SUCCESS OF THE TURKEY JERKY FACTORY

HON. TONY COELHO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. COELHO. Mr. Speaker, over the past decade we have come to rely on small business to create millions of new jobs and to keep our economy productive and competitive. Moreover, small businesses have been at the cutting edge of innovation.

I rise to address an example of small business growth and innovation in an attempt to exemplify the need to encourage and facilitate the small business community.

America's growing concern over diet—and cholesterol in particular—has yielded an entire line of turkey products in the guise of ham, bacon, and pastrami.

Most recently, Dorothy Spomer, a third-generation turkey farmer from Kingsburg, a San Joaquin Valley community, has seized upon this opportunity to market her family jerky recipe made from turkey meat. For the last 22 years Ms. Spomer has been making turkey jerky for her family. The successful reception of Ms. Spomer's jerky from friends and relatives encouraged her to mix business with pleasure and put her turkey jerky on the market.

There have been several attempts by other manufacturers over the years to make jerky out of turkey meat for the commercial market, yet most of these efforts have fallen short of success and beef continued to reign supreme.

Prior to her business days, Ms. Spomer prepared the jerky in the kitchen of her rural Kingsburg home. While the transition sounded simple enough to Ms. Spomer, she soon learned that putting a food item on the grocery shelf for the consuming public was a game that made it easy to "fowl" out.

In order to meet Government regulations, Ms. Spomer moved into new processing quarters, designed a packaging label and developed an exact proportion recipe.

Turkey Jerky was first marketed in Kingsbury area stores to test the acceptance of the product. From there the product moved to Selma, Fowler, and beyond. Now she is marketing the dried smoke-flavored turkey at retail outlets throughout the State. Her son was successful in placing the jerky into a health food chain in southern California servicing approximately 800 outlets in three States. Today, Turkey Jerky is distributed by three companies covering the entirety of California, Las Vegas, and parts of Arizona.

Spomer's greatest concern is whether she can supply the 11,000 accounts handled by her newest distributor since her operation is not yet fully automated. At the present time the small crew can process about 400 pounds of fresh turkey meat during a 7½-hour period. That 400 pounds of meat will produce approximately 195 pounds of jerky.

While many small businesses, particularly new ones, are struggling through hard economic times, it is a pleasure to note the success of the Turkey Jerky factory.●

WHAT IT MEANS TO BE ALL AMERICAN

HON. IKE SKELTON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, in recent years it has become fashionable for our citizens, the media, and even elected officials, to criticize America. Certainly some of this criticism is justified as we face inflation, high unemployment, soaring deficits, and Government scandal.

I would like to remind those who would complain, however, that despite our problems, we are still the greatest country in this world and nowhere is this more aptly demonstrated than in the minds and hearts of our children.

Recently, I received two short essays from two young fourth graders in my district on their view of America. I would like to share them as I think you will agree that they capture, in their simplicity, the very essence of what it means to be an American.

I LIKE AMERICA

I like America because it is a free country and we can vote, we can travel, and can go to any church we want to. I like America because there are many things to see. We can see parks and streams, mountains, trees, fields, deserts, grass, lizards, houses, barns and roads.

AMERICA THE BEAUTIFUL

I like America because of its freedom. We can go to any church we like and we can go to any sports event we want to go to. We can go fishing or hunting any time we want to. There are many places to visit. We can go to monuments anytime we want to.●

THE SAD PLIGHT OF IDA NUDEL

HON. NORMAN F. LENT

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. LENT. Mr. Speaker, I enclose for my colleagues in the House of Representatives, an article taken from today's Washington Post which further details the sad life of Ida Nudel, the only Soviet woman to serve a term in Siberia as a "prisoner of conscience." As chairman of the 1982 Congressional Call to Conscience Vigil, I implore my colleagues to continue in their efforts to free Ida Nudel and the many thousands of Soviet Jews like her, who are denied the right to leave the Soviet Union. I believe this article will show the loneliness and despair of a woman whose only request was to live with her sister in Israel.

The article speaks for itself.

MARTYR

Ida Nudel, the only Jewish woman to serve a term in Siberia as a "prisoner of conscience," has disappeared. Nudel, 51, has spent the last 11 years of her life trying to leave the Soviet Union to join her sister in Israel. For her efforts, she was sentenced to four years of internal exile, living part of the time in barracks that housed hardened male criminals.

She was released in March but told she would never be allowed to leave the Soviet Union. Her last contact with the West was on July 13, when she spoke with her sister, and signed off in despair. She was being made a homeless person.

Ida Nudel first requested permission to leave in 1971. At the time she was an economist, working in the Institute of Planning and Production and monitoring hygiene standards in food stores. Permission was refused on the grounds she possessed "state secrets." Her room was bugged. She was followed. She was repeatedly detained and beaten. She was also fired from her job and, in order to avoid the charge of being a parasite, worked as a cleaning woman. She spent the next seven years trying to get out and sending chocolates, photographs, reading material, clothing, food and medicine to imprisoned Jews on the rare visits they could have with their families. She came to be known as the "guardian angel," of the "prisoners of conscience" and in the Soviet Jewish community, she became a legend.

Then on June 1, 1978, she hung a banner from the balcony of her Moscow apartment saying, "KGB, give me my visa." She was arrested and three weeks later convicted on malicious hooliganism and banished to Krivosheino, 1,800 miles east of Moscow. Her main companion was a collie that was with her when she returned to Moscow.

Marcia Weinberg, who is married to Rabbi Joseph Weinberg of the Washington Hebrew Congregation and who heads the committee for Soviet Jewry here, met Ida Nudel shortly before her arrest. Nudel has been "adopted" as a special prisoner by the sisterhood of the Washington Hebrew Congregation.

After her release, says Weinberg, Nudel told her sister by telephone that she had been told she should "rehabilitate herself and become a good Soviet citizen." In April, she was denied permission to live in Moscow. Then she was sent to Riga. "But when she got to Riga she was told she couldn't live in Riga," says Weinberg.

The last contact she had with her sister came on the 13th of July. Weinberg says Nudel told her sister she had spent one night in a bus station. "This is when we, as a world group, became concerned," says Weinberg. "She's not an alarmist. She said, 'Don't try to reach me; I just don't know where I'm going to be. I will try to find you.' It was in that kind of despair she signed off and nobody knows where she is. We know she's not in Moscow and not in Riga." One theory is that she has been sent to a closed city where no Western press or tourists are allowed to go.

On Tuesday, July 20, a delegation from organizations concerned with Soviet Jews met with presidential assistant Elizabeth Dole. Dole, who is a member of Congressional Wives on Soviet Jewry, says Nudel's plight has now been drawn to the attention of the highest levels of the American government. The reduced flow of emigrants from the Soviet Union has been raised again and again at meetings with Soviet officials, says Dole, and it is a concern of which President Reagan often speaks.

The meeting with Dole left Weinberg with a profound sense of the difference between the two nations. "We could call the White House and say 'help.' The United States is a place where government can stop long enough to talk about one human being and that person's plight. It's such a juxtaposition to the Soviet Union where individuals are trampled on and stomped on and lost." Later that day, a vigil was held at the Soviet Embassy on Nudel's behalf; among the speakers was a representative of Dole's office.

What has happened to Ida Nudel is so alien to the American experience that it seems unbelievable. As Weinberg puts it, it is senseless. "It is almost like they are trying to destroy a spirit totally. For what? Why? She's done it already. She's been in exile, she's been in prison. It would just seem enough."

Sometimes the story of a single person can tell more about a system of government than all the statistics in the world. The Soviets have created a martyr, yet another human being who is a living indictment of a system that doesn't work. It is only fitting that when those in the free world think of the Soviet Union they should think, also, of Ida Nudel.●

THE 97TH CONGRESSIONAL CLASS FOR SOVIET JEWRY: LEV GENDIN

HON. BERNARD J. DWYER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. DWYER. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the 97th Congressional Class for Soviet Jewry, it is an honor and privilege to call to the attention of my colleagues the plight of Lev Gendin who has been repeatedly denied permission to emigrate from the Soviet Union to join his wife Aviva in Israel.

Lev Gendin has been a refusenik since 1971. His most recent exit visa refusal occured in February 1977 on the grounds of "secrecy," an all-too-common pretext used by Soviet emigration officials, regardless of whether it can be fairly justified by the facts of the applicant's case.

Upon applying to emigrate, Lev was dismissed from his job and has been arrested and jailed several times. He is under constant harassment by Soviet authorities and has been interrogated by the KGB numerous times.

In December 1978, Lev was interrogated by the KGB in conncetion with the arrest of his roommate and has since gone into hiding.

His wife, Aviva, emigrated to Israel in 1971. Despite the arrests and persecution he faces daily, Lev will not give up his desire to be reunited with Aviva in Israel.

Not surprisingly, Lev is in poor health and is severely depressed, like so many others who have been the targets of stepped-up Soviet persecution and increasingly restrictive emigration policies.

To most observers, the continuous reduction in the exit quota of Jews from the U.S.S.R. indicates a deliberate policy that suggests to Soviet Jews that their basic right of emigrating to Israel is not assured.

This policy has caused great anxiety among Soviet Jews who had come to believe that emigration, at least based on repatriation to Israel to reunite families, would continue at some respectable level.

That this is not the case is why we, as responsible and compassionate Americans, must continue in our efforts in behalf of these refuseniks, who, like Lev Gendin, will not forsake their hope of freedom and reunification with their loved ones.●

CHANGES IN THE BANKING INDUSTRY

HON. LARRY E. CRAIG
OF IDAHO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Speaker, on June 15 at Sun Valley, Idaho, Mr. George Rothell, president of the First Interstate Bancorp, the holding company for the First Interstate Bank of Idaho and in 10 other Western States, gave the keynote address at the Idaho Bankers Association annual convention. Mr. Rothell told of the many changes occurring in the banking industry and changes yet to come. His address was well received and, in the belief that his remarks will be of educational value to many others, I am including it in the RECORD. These are excerpts from the address:

EXCERPTS FROM ADDRESS OF GEORGE ROTHELL

Banking has been a stable and profitable business—it has had an image of honesty and trust—a place where the public could put its money and have the confidence that they could get it back when they wanted it.

It's also been a protected business, protected by legislation that included three primary supports.

The first was an exclusive product. If you wanted a banking service, you had to go to a bank. Until recent times, no one else could offer a transaction account or a checking account. Checking accounts were the primary means of payment for goods and services and had to be accomplished through a bank. Checking accounts were also an important source of free money to be utilized for loans or invested in securities.

It was also the basis of a subsidy for many other loss leader bank services, whether a free calendar or a no service charge, low balance account. The large accounts subsidized the small accounts. And as you know we no longer have such product exclusivity.

The second support was an exclusive territory. The regulators controlled the granting of charters based on geography and population and we didn't give any though to nonbank competition. No longer true.

The third major support was a ceiling on rates which more or less gave a guarantee on the cost of money, our raw material. Again, no longer true as we slowly and painfully go through the process of deregulation.

And so today, not one nor two, but all three of banking's historic protective pillars have either collapsed or are in the process of collapsing.

In the good old days, various classes of financial institutions had very specifically defined purposes and served specific markets. Over-simplified, savings and loans provided mortgages; credit unions made low-cost loans to members; finance companies served the blue-collar worker; and so on.

Today, S & L's offer checking accounts, issue Visa and MasterCards, make commercial loans—all services once provided only by banks.

Finance companies are heavily into the second trust deed market and are intensifying their marketing efforts toward the upscale—not blue-collar—borrower.

Foreign banks, once of small concern, are now flexing some very formidable muscle in the United States. In less than ten years, foreign banks have opened more than 200 offices of all kinds in America. In California and New York, they now account for more than 40 percent of all business and commercial loans. They have made major investments in the U.S. with the purchases of Marine Midland, National Bank of North America, Crocker National Bank, Union Bank, and a host of other smaller banks.

Another group of competitors, the money market funds, have literally exploded onto the financial scene. By the end of 1981, with the help of high interest rates, they have racked nearly 200 billion dollars in assets.

Where has all that money come from? Some bankers say 70 percent came from commercial banks. The Investment Company Institute, a mutual fund trade association, says it was new cash that would not have gone into savings.

Whatever the source, the thrifts were the hardest hit and in 1981 alone, the nation's nearly 4,000 S & L's and 400 mutual savings banks lost deposits of almost 40 billion dollars.

And the investment bankers, through their brokerage houses, have not limited themselves to money market funds. Five years ago some offices of Merrill Lynch started it all and offered a cash management account, which combined a margin account with a money-market fund. Today, customers' cash balances no longer lie idle in brokerage accounts. Access to the account is by either check or Visa card.

By April of this year, the Merrill Lynch cash management program has grown to some 600,000 accounts and a value of about 30 billion dollars. The average customer writes only six checks a month, most of them being for large amounts.

What's left for the banks? Leonard Huck, Executive Vice President of Valley National Bank of Arizona, said: "we get the gas and light bills while Merrill Lynch gets the big bucks and the large checks."

Huck, who also is President of the Bank Marketing Association, says banks are countering these threats by cutting costs, charging for services that had been free and raising charges on others. Raising prices will not make many friends, and I'm sure you agree we need all the friends we can get.

Let me read you the names of some new players in the financial services games:

Sears, RCA, Gulf and Western, National Steel, Baldwin United, Greyhound, General Electric, Control Data.

These companies are highly respected names and are famous outside the world of finance. But now they are heavily involved in financial services. Why? Why are they moving, almost in lockstep, towards the financial services business?

Well, there are probably several reasons: To companies looking for diversification, it offers a clean business. For those concerned with high labor costs, finance seems to lend itself to technology and mechanization and not to be so labor intensive. To companies facing reindustrialization, it seems cheap by comparison. These new players have an unusual advantage because the historic providers of these services are hog-tied by the old laws and regulations and hindered by their balance sheet structures.

From this list of new players in financial services, let me focus on just one, to give you a feel for what we're facing. Sears, Roebuck . . . Sears, a highly respected name. And if you think that hometown America, and mother, and apple pie don't trust and respect Sears, Roebuck & Co. every bit as much as the First National or the First Interstate of whatever, then we're kidding ourselves.

The Chairman of the Board of Sears, Edward Telling, has announced his corporate goal. Quote, "Our goal is to become the largest consumer-oriented financial service entity." He said that, as Sears moved to acquire Coldwell Banker, the nation's largest independent realty company, and Dean Witter, the largest brokerage firm.

Already, Sears has Allstate Insurance, grossing 6.2 billion dollars last year; Allstate Savings & Loan, a mortgage company servicing 1.4 billion dollars in mortgages, and, most importantly, a credit card base of 40 million acounts and a chain of stores numbering over 3,600.

The financial services marketplace is alive with intense competition, which is fueling the revolution in America's banking industry.

And that leads me to a second factor severely complicating problems in our industry and that is the state of the economy.

This year looks as if it could be the worst period for business failures since 1932. As of April 8, over 6,000 companies had folded, 55 percent more than in the same period last year and almost as many as in all of 1978.

The top lending officer of one New York bank believes that at least 100 companies among America's 1,000 largest have "potentially serious problems."

We've seen some disheartening failures lately. AM International filed bankruptcy in April after 58 years in business. That same month, Saxon Industries, another major office equipment manufacturer, said it was going into bankruptcy.

International Harvester Company has been in trouble for some time now. So has the Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co. A large commercial airline, Braniff, has filed for protection under the bankruptcy laws. There are others.

Idaho has had more than its share of economic problems, too, with the closing of the Bunker Hill mining complex . . . and the dramatic decrease in new housing starts that has hit your forest products industry.

The finance industries have their problems, too. Over the past year, S & L's and thrifts and banks needed regulatory assistance for consolidation, or merger, of one type or another, to avoid failing.

These are difficult times. Some say the worst in 50 years.

Much of what we've been going through was forecast some years ago. In fact it's been coming every year for the past four years. And I imagine most of us are doing some intensive strategic planning so that we will successfully perform during these difficult times, and be prepared to do well and come out the winners in the years ahead.

Notwithstanding the problems of competition, the economy, the high interest rates, poor balance sheet structures and outmoded regulation and law that seems to paralyze our regulators and legislators, we are not without significant advantages in that we still have a substantial share of the market. We still have a good and trusted image, and I happen to believe people still like to do business with a bank. We need to preserve and enhance these advantages.

But, in a way we are like David preparing to do battle with Goliath and upon arriving at the battlefield we find we have left our slingshot at home. Never has the future been more uncertain for our industry or more difficult. And the problems we have are not respectful of size or structure or geographic market.

Unlike Alka Seltzer, relief is not just a second away—it is years away. The economy must recover; interest rates must come down; we must get away from the long-term fixed rate assets crowding our balance sheets and we must deregulate and relegislate and bring our system into the Twentieth Century.

Many will not survive the revolution, or if you prefer, the evolution. Many will merge or be acquired. Many will not make it. Some had said that by 1990 the number of banks doing buisness in the U.S. will be less than 4,500, down from 14,500.

And who will the survivors be? Well, I don't think size will guarantee survival. You're going to have to be smart, well managed and lucky. Certainly, at least two out of three of those qualities will be required.

I happen to believe the multi-state bank holding company will be the best vehicle for the future but, of course, you might say I would be a little prejudiced. But such a vehicle offers geographic diversification, has the capital to acquire and develop technology and should be able to maximize efficient delivery.

I would also quickly say that the smart, well-managed small unit bank will also be able to do very well because it can offer personal and responsive service not possible in a large organization. We have many examples of this in California and I'm sure across the country.

But the most important thing is to stay ahead of the game and plan, plan, plan. As someone once said, it is not the plan that is important but the planning process because it makes us consider all possible alternatives.

FIRST INTERSTATE'S PLAN

I would like to briefly tell you a bit of how we at First Interstate do our basic planning for the future. Responsibility for strategic planning tests rests with an overall corporate Planning Committee that consists of seven members—the chief executive officers of the five largest banks in our system, plus the Board Chairman of the holding company, and I as President.

We formed this committee in mid-1978 which was about the time the period of rapid change was getting a good start. And we began to examine this change and analyze the social and economic climate. We believe that there would be a very large segment of the market that wanted national banking, and the image that went with it, just the same as there was a large segment that wanted strong local and personal banking.

Certainly, technology was having a dramatic impact on banking. We were in the midst of building a 41,000 mile, on-line computer network that eventually linked every teller in every one of our 920 banking locations.

We believed this sort of technology was part of the future in American banking. Our computer network gives us the ability to deliver advanced products and handle an average of nearly half a million teller transactions every single banking day.

This enormous workload is processed with greater speed, accuracy, and security than would otherwise be possible. We believe we must continually add to its capabilities as our other costs inevitably rise.

Our system, which includes four satellite stations, is "in and paid for" and we feel very good about that. When the day comes that we can acquire a Texas bank, we need only to develop a switch and to then hook it by phone wire to our office on the New Mexico border at Hobbs, New Mexico, and an 11-state, on-line data system will become a 12-state, on-line data system—with all the consumer and business advantages of intrastate and interstate banking available to these new markets that are receptive for this type of service.

In a similar vein, automatic teller machines are moving more quickly into the bank delivery system. We have more than 600 ATM's in the West; the largest network in America so far.

In keeping with our earlier plans, we are harnessing the new technology and developing new products as part of our strategy for the future.

Three-and-a-half years ago, our Planning Committee predicted . . . as it turned out, rightly so . . . that banking was entering a new era of competition.

We also felt that to compete for this national or interstate market, we, as a banking organization, had to be well and favorably known on a much broader scale. Frankly, we had a problem in that regard. The holding company was then known as Western Bancorporation and each of our banks had separate identities.

The Planning Committee decided that if we were to compete in the financial marketplace, we needed to project a clear and precise image of ourselves.

We started work to develop a consistent and unified identity program for our 11-state system. The result was our name change program which was the largest and most sweeping name change program of its kind in the history of American banking.

Certainly, this was no easy task.

Customers reacted to the new name in the ways that really count! For example, in the four months before the name change, last February through May, the seven largest banks in our system had a net decrease in checking accounts of 17,000. In the four months after June 1, those same banks had a net increase of over 100,000 accounts. As of the end of February, 1982, this figure had climbed to 166,000.

There was a substantial increase in the use of our 600 automatic teller machines, too. In the six months before June 1, we averaged 2.2 million ATM transactions a month. In the next six months after the name change, that average increased to 3.1 million—a 43-percent increase.

Our research shows that for virtually all banks . . . in all markets . . . the awareness of the new name . . . after a very short time . . . equaled the awareness of the old name, which had been around for many years.

This is quite remarkable when you consider that some of our banks had very old, well-established names. The Bank of Idaho traces its history all the way back to 1868, when the Stock Growers and Traders Bank opened in Caldwell.

But there is another audience out there that is virtually important to First Interstate. And I refer to the financial community of stockholders, financial analysts, portfolio managers and business editors—all those who, in one way or another, follow our company and our stock.

Let me read you what the First Boston said in a 1981 report. Quote "The name change is more than cosmetic. By adopting a single new name systemwide, First Interstate will be operating as much as legally possible as though it were a branch banking system."

Here is another comment about us from Bache International Research. Quote "The name change signifies a new era and a commitment to unify and identify the organization. First Interstate is far ahead of its competitors in the race to become a truly interstate banking organization." And as the New York security analysts said about us back in March: "First Interstate Bancorp of today is totally different from the Western Bancorporation of a few years ago,"

But I have yet to comment on the most recent development in our plan to adapt to the revolution in banking . . . and that is franchising. It has been part of our long-range planning for some time, and the most significant segment of our plan to meet deregulation head-on.

Under the program, banks will retain their local management and ownership, but benefit from identification with us as the nation's largest multi-state banking system. They will receive state-of-the-art products and services, including very sophisticated technology, without large capital outlays.

This is an opportunity for independent banks to enhance their market position and position themselves for growth in the financial services industry.

We feel that franchising will become more and more attractive as the squeeze of competition gets tighter, not only from other banks, but from Merrill Lynch, Sears and other aggressive non-bank competitors.

Franchising not only will provide us with a new income center, from fees, but enable us to stretch our name beyond our normal territory and better position us for the day when interstate banking arrives in fact.

Following our announcement, we have received inquiries from banks ranging in size from $10-million up to $10-billion, and they have come in from more than 20 different states.

A name change is not an easy decision for the board of an independent bank to make. We understand that as well as—or better than—any other bank management group. And we understand the value of making that decision!

And if you've followed the news announcements, you already know The First National Bank of Golden, Colorado, has agreed to become America's first franchised bank. First Interstate signs probably will be put up in Golden late this year.

I hope that gives you insight into some of the strategic planning activities that we are doing internally to prepare First Interstate Bancorp, as a multi-state bank holding company, for the future.

In my opinion, if banking is to maintain its market share . . . to compete . . . to prosper in the years ahead, it must move along with the financial revolution and meet the changing needs of the marketplace.

For this to happen, at least two major hurdles must be cleared.

First, banking must once again become a competitive force. Second, we must change the ways we manage our banks.

For banks to become competitive again, Congress and the Regulators must take action. They must deregulate our rate structures and enact legislation which would permit bank holding companies and banks to compete on an equal basis—to open branches, to own banking subsidiaries throughout the United States and to develop our own products and set our own rates.

Because we at First Interstate operate in 11 prime western states, you may find it hard to believe that we support interstate banking. Let me assure you that we do. What we do not support is the imposition of yet another artificial restraint, such as limited interstate banking by Federal Reserve District, or by contiguous states.

And even if full interstate banking were granted, we would still be handicapped because if we cannot compete with a full product line in Los Angeles, we still won't be able to compete with a full product line if we're allowed to go to Houston.

Equally important, we must be able to provide products that are competitive, particularly with respect to rate and term.

Aside from change in laws and regulatory relief, we as bankers must also manage better than we ever have in our professional lives.

We must place more emphasis on strategic planning, on technology and new products than ever before. All of us.

And we must focus our best talents on cost accounting. Now that interest rate ceilings will be removed by the mid-1980's, we will need cost accounting expertise as never before. We simply must know what our products and operations cost and charge appropriate prices. "Unbundling" will become a necessity; indeed, it has already become so.

We must, as never before, manage interest rate risk. Please note that the two most publicized bank problems of the past few years—First Pennsylvania and First of Chicago—were not due to loan losses but resulted instead from a serious mismatching of assets and liabilities in terms of maturity. Simply stated, the two banks had funded long-term, fixed rate assets with short-term liabilities and were squeezed when rates for short-term money skyrocketed.

We cannot underestimate the millstone around the necks of the majority of American banks of the long-term fixed instrument—real estate mortgages and government securities—which must more and more by funded by short-term, volatile wholesale rate liabilities. And this will not change because of regulation or deregulation. Only the timing will change.

If DIDC did nothing, we would still be disintermediated by the money funds and buy our money back at wholesale rates, just as we have already commenced to do. Balance sheet management will be more important than ever over the next few years.

We must also pay more attention to people management. Banking has not always attracted the most ambitious, and hard-hitting executives. We are a service business—a financial services business—which is essentially a people business. We must not overlook the human resource element of our business.

In closing, I believe the successful bank of the future . . . the one that survives the financial revolution . . . will have to undergo the painful learning process that other deregulated industries have gone through. I make no case for or against the rights or the wrongs (or the justice or injustice) of it all.

It's a huge market and we all have a huge stake in it. I do know that we (First Interstate) will be working hard and diligently with every possible capability to increase our share of the market and be on the leading edge. I think there is enough to go around for all and I would not presume to say there is only one route, one structure, one way to prosper in the future.

I do know that I am getting a little tired of the tedious and tiresome debates, the disagreements on new instruments reaching to the smallest of minutia and the paralysis that seems to immobilize the legislators and the regulators. We, the bankers, have been criticized by the regulators because they say we can't agree. And we, the bankers, criticize the regulators because we say they, along with the legislators, cannot agree. But, whoever is to blame, we need to get moving. Each passing day results in a weakening of our position and a lessening of our market share.

For us to be winners rather than losers, we need a level playing field. We have to keep pace with the changes. We have to be faster to innovate—and we have to manage as never before.

We must focus on our strengths, areas where we do well both in the lending and non-lending parts of our business; we must develop much more sophisticated marketing and operational skills; and we must be able to deliver advanced and innovative products to set us apart from the competition.

And last, but not least, the public must perceive us as being advanced, competent, and professional—more so than the competition.

I don't think it's going to be all bad. Indeed, I believe the public demand for financial services will grow and create more opportunities, not less. We have a period of uncertainty to go through, but on the other side are some new and exciting areas of growth and challenge.●

CAPTIVE NATIONS WEEK

HON. GERALD B. H. SOLOMON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, last week it was my privilege and honor to be the main speaker at the International Captive Nations Conference in Taipei, Taiwan.

As you know, President Reagan proclaimed the week of July 18 as Captive Nations Week. When I was in Taiwan I was able to present a copy of the proclamation to representatives from all over the world—people who had gathered to reaffirm their strong support for those oppressed and enslaved behind the bamboo and iron curtains.

Captive Nations Week was established by a joint resolution passed by Congress on July 17, 1959. It has been observed during the 23 years since then by citizens of those countries no longer free and by those of us fortunate enough to have remained free.

In this proclamation, President Reagan said:

This week offers Americans an opportunity to honor our nation's founders whose wisdom and commitment to self-determination and liberty have guided this country for more than 200 years. Let us once again reaffirm our faith that the aspiration for freedom will ultimately prevail over the rule of force and coercion which denies human rights to so many other parts of the world today.

Mr. Speaker, I will not offer my entire speech today but I would like to submit excerpts. The following is a very condensed version of what I told the participants of the International Captive Nations Conference:

The people in captive nations, subjugated under the yoke of international communism, live in fear, deprivation, and despair. But their valiant spirit is far from broken and they continue to struggle for their basic rights even though time and time again they are cast down and suppressed.

Compared to the miserable records of the communists, the free nations of the world have created for their citizens a life of spiritual fulfillment, cultural progress and economic well-being. One of the greatest examples of this success story is happening right here in our host country. In some 30 years, the Republic of China has achieved an economic miracle that is almost unprecedented and unsurpassed.

What is most amazing about the people in the captive nations is that despite the almost total control of communist governments over the lives of every citizen, the basic ideas of freedom are still strongly instilled in these oppressed societies. The explosion of freedom in Poland is the most graphic example of how an entire nation can force its occupiers to take notice of a hunger for freedom against which guns are useless.

And for those captive nations and for those of us who have vowed to free them, there is new hope. For with the election of Ronald Reagan as President of the United States, my country now has a strong leader who shares our views, a leader who is totally committed not only to preserving the free world but to helping those people now enslaved under communism to become free like you and me.

Yes, there is new hope. Spread the word. The free world is not about to buckle under to international communist agression. Communism is a dying philosophy. Its dismal record of failures has left it with a terminal illness. But the sicker it becomes, the more dangerous it is. Which is why all freedom loving people and freedom loving countries must band together as one—to counter any last gasp effort to conquer the world by this sickly monster called communism.

And on a final note about the brave people of Taiwan, many people here on this island may worry about the future of the Republic of China. Let me make a strong prediction, and that is that there will be a Republic of China here on Taiwan long after there is no People's Republic of China on the mainland. ●

LEBANESE TELL OF ANGUISH OF LIVING UNDER THE PLO

HON. JOSEPH P. ADDABBO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, some of my colleagues may have seen the following article in the New York Times. It concerns the troubled and beleagured land of Lebanon, where the Palestinian Liberation Organization has imposed its harsh rule and military presence. As some uninformed and misguided persons today condemn Israel for its actions against the PLO in Lebanon, this article shows us the true horror of the occupation and the devastation wreaked upon Lebanese villages. I would therefore like to share this fine piece by David Shipler:

[From the New York Times, July 25, 1982]

LEBANESE TELL OF ANGUISH OF LIVING UNDER THE PLO

(By David K. Shipler)

SIDON, LEBANON.—For about six years, until Israel invaded southern Lebanon on June 6, the Palestinians had something closely approaching an independent state.

It had an army, a police force, a crude judicial system, an educational and welfare system, a civil service and a foreign policy. Those who lived within its rough boundaries said they were too terrified then to describe it to outsiders. Now, for the first time, they are describing what it was like, telling of theft, intimidation and violence.

Its territory was scattered in patches of influence, from its de facto capital in west Berut and the adjacent camps, where the Palestinians shared control with the Syrian Army, to its provincial areas of virtually exclusive Palestinian control, a region that extended southward along the sparkling Mediterranean, through the coastal cities of Damur, Sidon and Tyre, and inland across terraced hills east and south of the town of Nabatiye.

Under the umbrella of the Palestine Liberation Organization, it comprised an array of competing factions, some pro-Syrian, some pro-Iraqi, all less influential than Al Fatah, the faction headed by Yasir Arafat. Its authority flourished amid the weaknesses of the Lebanese Government.

But politics here was much more than patronage and debate. The major tool of persuasion was the gun, according to those who lived through it.

The citizens of this state within a state were those who had not been allowed to become citizens of Lebanon: the Palestinians, about 300,000 of them, whose impoverished, squalid settlements of nameless alleys and humble concrete houses became the P.L.O.'s political and military centers. Most of them, or their parents, had come in 1948 in flight from the fighting in Israel's war of independence.

Most of those subject to the P.L.O's rule, however, were Lebanese nationals in the cities and villages beyond the boundaries of the camps, both Christians and Moslems, who said they felt powerless in their own homes. They are the ones who are now most willing to tell their stories.

Their degree of candor seems unaffected by the presence or absence of Israeli officers during conversations. Some are still circumspect, afraid the P.L.O. will return after Israel withdraws; others open up in a spirit of relief.

The Palestinian guerrillas came unannounced to Dr. Ramsey Shabb's country estate in the hills east of Sidon. He recalled that he first saw them camped beneath the orange trees when he drove out to his land one day. They had set up rocket launchers in his orange groves; crates of ammunition were stacked nearby.

In the days that followed, he said he noticed that one of his small outbuildings had been filled with boxes of explosives and ammunition. As the weeks passed, barns became armories, fuel drums appeared, jeeps and trucks arrived, 130-millimeter artillery pieces were deployed among his 100 acres of orange groves and vineyards.

The guerrillas finally began to move into his main house, an elegant stone building on a hilltop, built by his father. Dr. Shabb said they left him one upstairs room, and he had to pretend that this was all fine. But he stopped taking his family there for weekends, staying instead in an apartment he kept in the private hospital he owned in Sidon.

"They were taking over everything, everything," said his daughter, Rima, a student at the American University in Beirut. "They were the Government," his wife, Salwa, added.

PATCHWORK OF FIEFDOMS

The takeover of land and houses began as the P.L.O. spread from the camps after the 1975–76 civil war, when the Lebanese Government disintegrated and Lebanon descended into a dark level of lawlessness, carved by religious and ethnic strife into a patchwork of fiefdoms ruled by a variety of armed gangs—Palestinian factions, Christian militias, Moslem leftists, Druse militiamen, Syrian troops.

In the south, within striking distance of Israel, the Palestinians seemed to make special efforts to push their control beyond the limits of the camps so they could have the freedom to move and to build a military structure. And so they took houses.

"Our cook went home one day after she finished work," said Dr. Shabb, "and she found a family sitting in a room with many kids. They forced her to stay in one small room, and they used the rest of the house, and she could not do anything."

"My mother had a small garden here," he continued. They would come and cut the flowers. She once told a 10-year-old boy not to do it, and he said, "We'll blow up your house." Two years ago, she sent away somebody with a goat, and they dynamited her house, damaging the veranda.

Ahlam Ghandour, whose husband is a wealthy importer, said she protected her luxurious house in the hills outside Nabatiye by never leaving it empty, by never going away on trips, by staying alert to any sign of P.L.O. encroachment. "Once a Palestinian came and put a Land-Rover at my house," she recalled. I said, "Please don't leave it here, maybe an Israeli plane will see it and bomb my house." He said, "Okay, Madame," and left.

There were overtones here of a class struggle, for the poor Palestinians in the camps had provided cheap labor for years in the citrus groves and the factories of the wealthy Lebanese. And although some Palestinians had made it up and out of the camps, achieving higher education and often some wealth themselves, the masses had not. The rank and file of the guerrillas seemed to come from the lowest strata, and often, therefore, the P.L.O.'s armed muscle blended with a bitter material greed. The Lebanese found themselves helpless.

THEFTS BY P.L.O. ARE DESCRIBED

In the picturesque Maronite Christian village of Lebaa, east of Sidon, for example, an opportunistic cousin of the Raad family arranged for Palestinians to rent a country house belonging to the father of Dolly Raad, a 26-year-old executive of Middle East Airlines. Miss Raad said it was a deal made both in acquiescence to the occupiers and to the prospect of money, for the P.L.O. leaders had, by all accounts, a lot of money.

The Palestinians turned the house into a restaurant and casino, provoking complaints from neighbors about noise and an unsavory clientele. Then, about two years ago, they locked it up, abandoned it and stopped paying rent, Miss Raad explained. "We asked for it back. They said no."

Both Lebanese and Palestinians describe such outright theft as a common practice of the P.L.O. guerrillas. They often took things from shops without paying, Miss Raad and others complained. Youssef Alifreh, a young Palestinian resident of the Burj al Shemali camp, near Tyre, confirmed it. "Now we are happy because the armed P.L.O. left," he declared. "When somebody wanted to buy something, he would take it and not pay, and if someone would complain, he would shoot him."

At 4 P.M. one day three years ago, a mixed detachment of a dozen P.L.O. and Syrian troops arrived at the home of Zouhair Ladki, a 25-year-old Moslem, in Khalde, just south of Beirut. They ordered the family out, saying they had to check reports that an "American spy" was hiding inside. When the "search" was finished, Mr. Ladki said, many things were missing: his mother's jewelry, television sets, a videotape recorder, a hi-fi set, even some rugs.

CARS COVETED BY GUERRILLAS

Automobiles also became a coveted prize for guerrillas. Two respectable-looking gentlemen from the P.L.O. walked into one Sidon new car dealership, Dr. Shabb recalled, inquired about a certain model, asked if they could test-drive it, got in and disappeared.

At many checkpoints along the roads, young toughs brandishing Soviet-made assault rifles often stopped the cars they fancied and simply took them, as they still do in west Beirut. An auto-theft ring grew up in the south. "If you pay 7,000 pounds," or about $1,400, said Rima Shabb with a smile, "you will get your car back. If you pay 14,000, you will get somebody else's. If you're an elderly person driving an old car, you're safe.

Many Lebanese left their good cars in the garage. Miss Raad never drove her well-kept Mercedes-Benz to work at the airport in west Beirut, which was controlled by the P.L.O. and Syria, taking instead an old, beat-up Mercedes that she jokingly called "the Rolls Royce." "We never washed it," she said.

SOME LOST FARMS AND ORCHARDS

The economic impact of the P.L.O. takeover is difficult to assess, but it seems to have been felt keenly by retailers and farmers. Storekeepers were hurt in towns such as Nabatiye, where an estimated population of 35,000, mostly Shiite Moslems, dwindled rapidly to about 4,000 or 5,000 as those who could afford to move fled to Beirut and environs, leaving only the poor and the sympathetic leftists. The town's once-flourishing market withered and has only now begun to revive as residents stream southward to regain their homes after the P.L.O.'s departure.

For the farmers, the problems were exemplified at Dr. Shabb's estate. The guerrilla squatters took a great deal of his citrus and grape crop; what was left he sold, as usual, to a man who hired laborers to pick it, but the man paid a much lower price than before, knowing that he would have to give a portion to the P.L.O.

Dr. Shabb, a surgeon, kept the farm only as a hobby. But he said that "many people who lived from their farms and orchards went bankrupt when the P.L.O. came in."

For many Palestinians, however, the P.L.O. was protector and benefactor. Some in the crowded camps recall the pitifully low wages the citrus-pickers once received in the south, and they credit the P.L.O. with forcing employers to improve the pay. The results were reflected in rising living standards.

"Conditions improved," said Sami Masri as he stood amid the rubble of the Rashidiye camp on the outskirts of Tyre. It had been a major P.L.O. base and headquarters, and fighting there was severe.

"There used to be no electricity here. In all of Rashidiye there were no refrigerators, no automatic washers." The P.L.O., he said, organized not only military training for the youngsters of the camp, but also soccer teams, chess clubs, Ping-pong tournaments. A youth recreation center was set up in a concrete building that now lies crushed under the weight of war.

Employers, however, found the P.L.O.'s labor-organizing a bit unorthodox. The head of the public works department in southern Lebanon said the guerrillas had made his life miserable by stealing his equipment and limiting his authority over his workers.

"Men repairing roads were supposed to work eight hours a day," he remarked, "but they worked five or six. They would come at 10 and be gone by 4. We couldn't do anything. If I tried to make them work, I was afraid. You would go to the south and they would shoot you and nobody would ever know."

LEBANESE GOVERNMENT INEFFECTIVE

As the P.L.O. became the government, the Lebanese governmental structure retreated into the shadows of impotence. Elected officials stepped aside or stood quietly while they were circumvented. Policemen took off their uniforms or sat in their offices doing paperwork. Judges left the bench, lawyers left town.

"You know our people follow the strong one," Mayor Ali Khalid Shaalan of Tyre said with a smile of apology. The entire City Council complied with the P.L.O.'s demand that they step down, the Mayor said, except him. "The Palestinians pressured me to resign and to leave everything in their hands. But of course I refused and told them I was ready to die before giving them the municipality." Instead of killing him, they worked around him, stripping him of authority.

In Nabatiye, the Lebanese provincial Governor, Adnan Ibrahim, came to work each day, busying himself by providing municipal services to towns and villages in the region. A thin man with horn-rimmed glasses and a look of melancholy, he still speaks with the pain of those years.

"I worked," he said in French, "but with such difficulty. I supported what was insupportable. I worked without having power. They did not want the police here. We were never free to say what we thought. We were not allowed to hang the picture of the President of the republic during the Palestinian occupation."

Then he slipped into the present tense, as if nothing had changed but his willingness to speak. "They drink the water," he said contemptuously of the P.L.O., "they light the buildings, they use the roads—without paying a piaster. I am working in a minefield. A Palestinain officer comes here to my office, I salute him. It is a necessity."

In a Tyre police station, around a table with five policemen who had just been put back into action by the Israelis, the recollections of their years of eclipse under the P.L.O. brought a carefully worded outrage.

"I worked only with paper," said one of the policeman fingering a crime report. "If somebody shot somebody, he would be protected by the Palestinians. I worked on that, but on paper."

But what seemed to stir his anger most deeply was the sense of profound humiliation. "I would go in my automobile," he explained, "they would stop me and ask for my card. Me! I'm a policeman! I should demand their card!" And what did he do about it? "I showed my card and went on."

The wounded honor exacted a heavy toll, according to Clinton Bailey, an Isareli specialist in Arab affairs who is serving with the army as an adviser in southern Lebanon. In extensive conversations with local residents, he has concluded that the P.L.O. left angry scars. "One of the most important elements in an Arab's life is honor," Mr. Bailey said, "and honor is connected to strength. These people being pushed around by armed elements is really the worst thing that can happen."

SECURITY AND JUDICIAL SYSTEM

As the police and court systems were sapped of authority, the P.L.O. fashioned a crude security and judicial system of its own, one that has applied for many years in the camps. These townships were considered out of bounds to the Lebanese police, even in the late 1960's. After King Hussein drove the armed P.L.O. units out of Jordan in the "Black September" civil war of 1970, many of the leaders and fighters moved to Lebanon to plant the seeds of quasi-independence by reinforcing the camps' sovereignty.

By 1976 or 1977, according to both Palestinians and Lebanese, the disparate factions of the P.L.O. had established forces with a police function, an internal security force to combat espionage and dicipline faction members, and a network of local "people's committee" to arbitrate disputes and hand out punishment.

MERCENARIES ARE BROUGHT IN

The situation seemed to worsen over the years as the P.L.O., hard-pressed to fill military quotas, brought mercenaries in from Bangladesh, Sri Lanka, Pakistan and North African countries. By all accounts, the outsiders were largely crude, undisciplined thugs whose tension with the population was worsened by their inability to speak Arabic and communicate with the people they were threatening.

But the P.L.O. was not on a campaign to win friends among the Lebanese. Its thrust was military. The huge sums of money the P.L.O. received from Saudi Arabia and other Arab countries seems to have been spent primarily on weapons and ammunition, which were placed strategically in densely populated civilian areas in the hope that this would either deter Israeli attacks or exact a price from Israel in world opinion for killing civilians.

Towns and camps were turned into vast armories as crates of ammunition were stacked in underground shelters and antiaircraft guns were emplaced in schoolyards, among apartment houses, next to churches and hospitals. The remains could be seen soon after the fighting, and Palestinians and Lebanese can still point out the sites.

DEDICATED MILITARY EFFORT

East of Sidon, a deep tunnel in the side of a mountain, two football fields long, was crammed so tightly with grenades, rockets, artillery shells, missiles, explosives and small arms ammunition that only a narrow corridor was left for people to walk in.

So dedicated was the P.L.O.'s military effort that even the extensive ancient Roman ruins in Tyre, excavated and partially reconstructed by Lebanese authorities over the years, were made into a base and placed off-limits to tourists and to the Lebanese custodians. Visitors who chanced to take a picture of the columns and sarcophaguses saw the wrong end of a rifle, one custodian said. Remains of P.L.O. arsenals can still be seen beneath the rebuilt seats of the hippodrome; archeologists say that no damage was done other than through neglect.

P.L.O. CONSCRIPTION PROGRAM

An extensive P.L.O. conscription program drafted Palestinian boys as young as 12 and mobilized all male students for one to three months of duty a year, according to some Palestinians. During the invasion, Israeli soldiers said they found themselves in combat with 12- and 13-year-olds shooting rocket-propelled granades. More than 200 youngsters from 12 to 15 were captured and have been released.

The P.L.O.'s draft apparently stirred resentment, for Rima Shaab told of checkpoints being set up during mobilization periods to catch young Palestinians who were trying to run away. Doctors said they often gave boys and young men notes exempting them for false medical reasons. Sister Alisse Araigi, headmistress of a Maronite school in Nabatiye, said, "Families came to us and asked for certificates that children were sick and couldn't be drafted."

There is tentative evidence that the P.L.O. used the United Nations Relief and Works Agency, which cares for Palestinians and receives 25 percent of its budget from the United States, as a kind of civil service to enforce and carry out its draft and military training program. The curriculum in agency schools was laced with anti-Semitism and themes of militant nationalism. The Siblin teachers' training school east of Sidon was obviously given a heavily military cast, as a visit to the dormitories full of uniforms and the storerooms full of ammunition revealed.

Youssef Sayed, a 25-year-old Palestinian from the Ein Khilwe camp near Sidon, said that when a student was called up for a month's military service with the P.L.O., "he is obliged to go, otherwise he won't be accepted next year in the Unrwa school." When asked how this could be, he explained, "The Unrwa personnel are in the P.L.O." Several other men, including an employee of the agency, nodded in agreement.

BITTERNESS AT CHANGES

Some of the bitterness now spills over. Amid the ruins of the Rashidiye camp, an old man, Ahmed Mahmoud, began shouting angrily to a reporter that his 18-year-old son had been "forced to become a fighter," and that as a result, he was now in an Israeli prison camp.

"People living here from 1948 were living all right," he said, referring to the original refugees, as distinct from the P.L.O. leaders who arrived later. "But some people came from other places, they put people under pressure, they made some difficulties. We lived here as if it were our country, we worked, our children were studying, we were happy in Lebanon."

A woman broke in, shrieking: "We are all Palestinians! There are no differences! Don't try to draw lines between us!" He shouted back:

"Our children were working in the lemon groves, and then the P.L.O. came and forced them into service!"

For the Lebanese, none of this had any virtue. "Life was terrible," said Khalil Hamdan, who owns a gas station in Harouf, a Shiite village near Nabatiye. "They never used their brain," he said of the guerrillas. "They used their Kalashnikov. Even in the car, they used a machine gun to open the road for them." They blew their horns, he said, and shot into the air as well, an effective means of getting traffic out of their way.

THE TALE OF THE RECALCITRANT IMAM

Mr. Hamdan's village had a particularly rough time because it resisted the spreading P.L.O. control. One resident, Hassan Bader el-Din, told a searing tale about his brother, Ali Bader el-Din, the imam of the village who returned in 1979 from 12 years of religious study in the Shiite institutes of Iraq.

The imam consistently refused demands to inject Palestinian nationalist themes into his sermons in the mosque. Two years ago during Ramadan, the month of fasting, the pressure on him grew intense, for he was giving sermons every day. Still he resisted. On the morning of the 19th day of Ramadan, he arose as usual to take his morning meal before the fast began at dawn. Then, while it was still dark, he left his house to walk the 50 yards to the mosque. He never arrived.

After several days of fruitless inquiry by his family, a shepherd in the village of Deir Zaharani, four miles away, found his body, shot once through the head, beneath a bridge.

NIGHTTIME FUNERAL ORDERED

Fearing a large turnout for his funeral, the P.L.O. required that it be held at night, which is not done in Islam. But later, 5,000 came to a memorial service. Obviously concerned, Yasir Arafat visited Harouf, went to the family and spoke particularly to the sheik's 10-year-old son, Mohammed.

According to the brother, who was present, Mr. Arafat told the boy, "The Zionists killed your father." He pulled out his pistol, a Czechoslovak model, and gave it to young Mohammed, saying, "We consider your father a hero of the Palestinian revolution. When you grow up, use this to take revenge." The brother has turned the gun over to the Israeli Army, and it has been shown to correspondents.

At another nearby village, when Sheik Mohammed al-Masri tried to resist the encroachment of Palestinian factions, he said his 15-year-old daughter was raped and murdered.

Ali Ismaili Hatib, also from Harouf, lost his 19-year-old son, Hussein, to the P.L.O. The young man, working in Libya, came home from vacation, his father said, got into a taxi in Beirut, and was stopped at a checkpoint outside the village. "They saw he had a lot of gifts and valuable things," said the old man, now 70, "and as the car pulled away, they shot him in the back."

ACCUSED OF BEING A U.S. SPY

The next day, a P.L.O. delegation came to say that "the Zionists" had killed him and to offer the family a monthly allowance. The old man refused it.

Zouhair Ladki of Khalde also had trouble when he returned to Lebanon last March after a period of study in the United States. At a checkpoint 10 minutes from Beirut airport, the P.L.O. looked at his passport, noticed the American visa stamped in it, blindfolded him, held him for 36 hours, questioned him about being an American agent—"Why are you coming from the U.S.A., did they brainwash you?" they asked—and then released him.

It was this paranoia, the constant fear of being infiltrated by spies, that led to much of what seemed like random killing. Mr. Ladki is a Moslem who does emergency rescue work for the International Red Cross, and therefore wears a large red cross over his shirt, front and back. He recalled an episode in 1978, when a bomb destroyed a 14-story building in the Sabra camp in Beirut.

"We helped for two weeks to dig up bodies," he said. "They began to be suspicious about us being "not clean," as they say. They asked, "Why are you a Moslem and put a cross on yourself?" The Palestinians killed three of his team.

So many friends and relatives died that he began to build an emotional wall around himself. "I lost too many dear friends," he said. "To come from a country like the U.S.A. and expect to find your, dear friends—one was killed just because his father was in the Moslem Brotherhood. For nine months I have been afraid to make friendships again."

"I can understand that," said Dolly Raad, "because for a long time I did not want to become attached to anyone or anything, because you know you can lose it, and that will affect you very much.

"Before the P.L.O.," she continued, "we used to be pro-Palestinian. They were driven out of Palestine, they were massacred. On a humanitarian level, we supported them. It's very easy to have compassion for this people. You see them and you pity them. Before '75 we have this opinion. They were poor, we should help them.

"In '76 they stopped a bus and said that those who were Christians, come down. My cousin stepped down, and was killed. When we saw the Palestinians were killing us and threatening us and having barricades and shooting innocent people, then came the hatred.

"I don't know if you can understand the fear of being in the dark," Miss Raad went on, "and expecting to see someone who is going to kill you, and is an expert in killing. In '76 you couldn't see women without black dresses. It was a black year. Everyone had lost a husband, a son. Everyone was wearing black."

In the rubble-strewn camp of Rashidiye, where the P.L.O. had a major headquarters and military base, Sami Masri, a Palestinian man, understood. "Maybe if I were Lebanese, I would have that same anger," he said. "These poor Lebanese, they are in between."●

U.S. SPACE PROGRAM

HON. LAWRENCE COUGHLIN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. COUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, nearly 25 years ago, the United States placed its first satellite into space. In the intervening years, the United States has been the acknowledged world leader in developing and using space technologies. Indeed, we have made great progress and I wish to take a moment to reflect upon our accomplishments at this time of year when we have in the past commemorated National Space Week.

Surely, the National Aeronautics and Space Administration's program has captured the hearts and minds of the American people. Who can forget that historic moment in July 1969 when Neil A. Armstrong set foot on the Moon? Armstrong's immortal words, "One small step for man, one giant leap for mankind," clearly illustrate the immense significance of the event.

This past Fourth of July, the world's first reusable manned space vehicle, the Shuttle Columbia, flew down out of a clear California sky and completed its fourth test flight. It is now fully operational. The success of the Columbia marks the commencement of a new and exciting era in the space program.

As the "workhorse of space," the Columbia will haul humans, machines, and materials into orbit for numerous practical purposes. It can launch and retrieve communications, weather, and defense satellites. It can perform scientific experiments such as the development of new pharmaceutical products. For example, it has been suggested that the cancer-combating drug, interferon, can be produced with greater ease and at less cost. Finally, the Shuttle can be used to deploy a manned orbital laboratory. Certainly, it is easy to see why the first 45 flights, extending well into 1985, are reserved.

As we enter this new era of space exploration, I feel that the United States should devote its attention to the development of a cogent space policy. I am looking forward to the completion of an interagency review of NASA's space policy. I believe that this study will aid us in our effort to define what our space policy will be in the years to come. The absence of such a policy will surely hinder the space program's ability to continue to contribute in the positive manner it has in the past.

I firmly believe that the NASA program has been a great success through the years not only because of the hard work of many men and women, but also because our space program truly epitomizes the questing spirit of the American people.●

THE PRESIDENTIAL CERTIFICATION OF EL SALVADOR

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the President reported to Congress that the Government of El Salvador was progressing sufficiently with political and economic reforms, and that its human rights record had improved enough to justify continued U.S. military support.

I believe that the President should not have certified El Salvador as fit to receive military aid. I cosponsored a resolution declaring the certification null and void. There is evidence that human rights in El Salvador not only have not improved, but that conditions may have regressed. The land reform program is also not moving forward and may in fact be dead.

The new Salvadoran Government hardly represents a democratic cross section of Salvadoran society. Although, it is commendable that there was such a large turnout for the elections. It is questionable, however, as to whether or not the turnout was as large as originally reported. Further, the results would have been different had the left participated in the elections. The offer by the Salvadoran Government for the left to take part in the elections could not be taken seriously, since there was no guarantee for the safety of their candidates.

With the emergence of Roberto D'Aubuisson as head of the Constituent Assembly, and with the key posts for the land reform program in the Salvadoran Government taken over by officials who are less than supportive of the program, the impetus for progressive change is no longer present in Salvador. In addition, the key figures in the military have not changed, another indication that human rights have not become a priority issue for the new Salvadoran Government.

What is equally disturbing is that a number of credible, independent organizations, familar with conditions in El Salvador, have stated that they feel the cause of human rights has not been advanced in that nation.

Among these organizations, who are questioning the Salvadoran Government's sincerity in maintaining a close watch on human rights, is the International Committee of the Red Cross, ICRC. It can hardly be classified as a politically biased organization. Yet, the ICRC has threatened to withdraw from El Salvador because that government has refused to obey international treaties on the treatment of prisoners.

ICRC representatives in El Salvador have not been able to find prisoners in Salvadoran army camps in war zones. This is a clear indication that the army is killing its prisoners rather than detaining them.

Yet this is only one example of the continued human rights violations of the Salvadoran Government. The American Civil Liberties Union and the America's Watch issued an extensive report on July 20, stating that the government did not meet the conditions outlined by Congress.

I am deeply concerned that instead of aiding the Salvadoran Government with our military aid, we are, instead, undermining it. Our total aid package to El Salvador is larger than the amount provided to all other Latin American and Caribbean countries.

When is this insanity of trying to help the Salvadoran people by providing their government with guns going to stop? Our economy is suffering. We have cut back on valuable social programs. Yet, we insist on sending millions of dollars of military aid to a regime that is politically bankrupt.

I not only condemn the President's certification, I question his entire approach to the region. He must stop looking for Communists in the closet of progressive Latin American groups, and begin to realize that legitimate compromise and dialog are the only possible long term solutions. As a leader of the Hispanic community in the United States, I am appalled at the lack of sensitivity and foresight shown by the President in Latin America. His policy toward El Salvador is a shining example of this.●

JOHN AND ANN FRATIANNI

HON. JAMES H. SCHEUER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. SCHEUER. Mr. Speaker, in this day and age when change is the fashion, consumption the lifestyle, and commitment and responsibility to our fellow man the taboo, I would like to honor before this House of Congress the long standing commitment of two people to each other. They are, I am proud to say, residents of my home State of New York.

John and Ann Fratianni were joined in marriage at St. Lucy's Roman Catholic Church in Brooklyn, N.Y. on August 29, 1932, and will celebrate their golden wedding anniversary on August 29 of this year. This sacred and enduring union has produced three children—John Fratianni, Jr., Jo Ann DePaola, and Lucille Scarpulla—who have brought great joy to their parents; and one, I might add, to myself, John, Jr., who is an important member of my congressional staff. These children have further enriched the lives of John and Ann Fratianni by blessing them with 10 grandchildren—Ann Marie, John III, Roseanne, Richard, Maria, Peter, Richard, John, Frank, and Jacqueline.

The members of the Fratianni family will be joined by a host of relatives and friends to celebrate this most memorable of occasions, their 50th wedding anniversary in August.

I would like to extend my warmest congratulations to John and Ann during this, their 50th year of marriage. Theirs, Mr. Speaker, is an accomplishment we all admire and try to emulate.●

CERTIFICATION OF MILITARY ASSISTANCE TO EL SALVADOR

HON. MARY ROSE OAKAR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, today the President of the United States has once again certified that El Salvador has made sufficient progress toward protecting human rights, and in political and social reforms, for our Government to continue the flow of military assistance, equipment, and weapons to that violence-torn country. In effect, our President, through Secretary of State Shultz, is asking the Congress and the American people to certify that "business as usual" in El Salvador means progress.

The President has broken faith with the Congress and the American people in an arrogant declaration that defies belief. Some of the very statistics and evidence cited in the State Department report reveal the distortions in the administration's argument. We are told that the violations of human rights have decreased, that fewer people are being killed. Yet we know that violence has simply become more hidden—fewer bodies in the streets, more disappearances. Torture and intimidation have become more sophisticated, more systematic. We are told that human rights abuses by the armed forces and security personnel are being checked, that violators are being prosecuted. Yet we know that of the mere 85 homicide suspects handed over by the military to the civilian authorities in the last 2½ years, none seem to have been tried and convicted in court.

We are told that land reform is alive and well. Yet on the scene reports indicate that as many as 33,000 campesinos who were beneficiaries of phase III have been evicted from their land, that applications are down dramatically because of the violence, that as of early June 1982, only 103 definitive titles have been distributed to former tillers out of 150,000 potential beneficiaries identified by the government. Furthermore, and of special interest to my office, we are told that progress has been made in the investigation and prosecution of the murders of six, possibly seven, American citizens in El Salvador since December 1980. Yet, in the case of the four American missionaries, the murderers who were identified and taken into custody in April 1981, have yet to be brought to trial.

Last year El Salvador received approximately 70 percent or more of all the military assistance our Government sent to Latin America. Enough military aid to support Canada was poured into a country the size of the State of Massachusetts, with a population of less than 4.5 million. We should ask ourselves what has been the effect of our dramatic increase in military aid since 1980? The statistics clearly reveal an astronomical increase in the number of killings of noncombatant civilians and a rising incidence of torture and mutilation.

What moral arrogance gives us the right to use American taxpayers' money to decimate and threaten an innocent population? Will this mean victory for democracy in the long run? Will it mean peace in our hemisphere? Unless we attach sanctions to our military assistance and implement them with sincerity, we have bound our Nation to a wheel of increasing hypocrisy. We cannot continue to write blank checks for "military solutions" in Latin America.

Our national honor, the conscience of the American people, and the integrity of our legislative system have been compromised by this act of certification. We should be outraged.●

HOUSE EXPORT TASK FORCE APPLAUDS PASSAGE OF EXPORT TRADING COMPANY LEGISLATION

HON. DON BONKER

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. BONKER. Mr. Speaker, it is with much pleasure I announce passage of export trading company legislation by the House Tuesday. Although the trading company concept has received considerable support from the private sector, recent administrations, and Members of Congress; legislation has been debated in Congress for nearly 4 years without enactment. As Chairman of the House Export Task Force, and primary sponsor of H.R. 1799, I would like to commend my friends and colleagues for their tireless efforts in supporting the legislation, and acting to insure passage of the Export Trading Company Act of 1982.

Trading company legislation is the singlemost important export trade initiative passed by thie Congress. It acts as a major incentive to our small- and medium-sized businesses to actively pursue export trade. Moreover, it will have major positive effects on our domestic economy and our international trade status.

The last decade was a period of frustration and disappointment for our country insofar as international trade is concerned. Our first trade deficit of the 20th century occurred in 1971, and we have had a deficit nearly every year since.

It has been only recently that export trade has been given much attention in this country, for to date, it has been a mere afterthought for the majority of the American business community. For years, our growing domestic economy has satisfied the needs of the American businessman. He consequently has not had the need nor the desire to look into foreign markets that were often unreliable and risky as well as politically and socially alien. Moreover, the American businessman lacked an expertise in conducting foreign sales—from locating the foreign buyer to packing, shipping, and completing export documentation.

The U.S. Government, in addition, has not been as active in encouraging export trade or in providing assistance to the business community as other nations have. The American businessman perceived, and in many cases rightly so, Government regulations as impediments to international trade—regulations that were ambiguous, confusing, and often costly with which to comply. These self-imposed disincentives have served to deter the small- and medium-sized American companies from entering the international marketplace.

The United States can no longer afford to ignore the value of export trade and the importance it plays in our domestic economy and our status as an international industrial power. During the last two decades, the U.S. share of world exports dropped from 18 percent in 1960 to 15.4 percent in 1970, and last year fell to 12 percent. Today, exports of goods account for 8.2 percent of our gross national product, the lowest percentage of any industrialized nation in the world.

While numbers vary according to the source, the trend is as clear as it is alarming. Without a change, this trend could cost the United States hundreds of thousands of jobs, billions of dollars in economic activity, and the productivity boost that increased exports could generate for American industry.

Passage of export trading company legislation is a major step in enhancing our position in the international marketplace as an aggressive trading nation. The basic purpose of an export trading company is to provide the full range of services required to effectively connect U.S. suppliers with overseas customers. The development of the trading company is linked to the needs of individual firms to pool capital and distribute risk in engaging in more costly and less certain foreign markets. Moreover, they are designed to encourage the small- and medium-sized firms to actively pursue export trade.

Many of our trading partners, European as well as Japan, Korea, and Taiwan, possess sophisticated, large-scale, general-purpose trading companies which perform the full range of requisite functions for potential exporters. The success of such companies has contributed significantly to the export earnings of all of our major trade competitors.

American trading companies will greatly help to increase our exports of agricultural commodities, services, and high technology. While thousands of American firms manufacture products and offer services which are highly competitive overseas, these companies have not entered foreign markets because of a lack of capital and knowledge. In contrast to the success of Japanese and European trading companies, absence of one-stop export facilities in the United States has forced many U.S. exporters either to seek the services of a number of individual export promotion operations or to market their own products by combining marketing and production within a single corporate entity, involving considerable cost.

Export trading companies will offer a wide range of services, including economic feasibility and marketing studies, transportation and insurance, customs documentation and clearances, warehousing, packaging, distribution, marketing, and after-sales servicing. With that, the trading company is fully responsible for the actual export of goods and services, removing from the manufacturer a number of cumbersome and costly procedures.

In addition, export trading companies will enhance the competitiveness of U.S. exporters by providing comprehensive marketing intelligence, expertise in developing new markets, well-established distribution networks, and diversification of export risk due to the volume of business and number of products. In addition to these export services, American exporters will be able to draw on the considerable resources, expertise, and knowledge of the U.S. banking system.

The growth of our domestic market has slowed considerably and will not alone satisfy the needs of American industry. Yet, the international marketplace is extremely complex and highly competitive, particularly as more and more nations feel the critical need to export as a result of weak domestic economies. Given our international trade problems and concerns, we must develop an export consciousness and realize what exports do for our national economy, in general, and what export trading companies do for exports, in particular.

A private study conducted by Chase Econometrics in 1981 stated that the creation of—

U.S. Export Trading Companies and Associations would have a powerful, positive effect upon the American economy. By 1985, the impact of these companies would be sufficient to increase current dollar Gross National Product by between $27 billion and $55 billion without causing significant additional inflation. Employment would be increased by 320,000 to 640,000 workers. The extra income and employment generated would reduce the Federal deficit by between $11 billion and $22 billion.

Mr. Speaker, the value of expanding America's foreign trade in clear. And the value of American export trading companies to that expansion is also clear.●

AN AMERICAN SUCCESS STORY

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I would like to pay tribute to a man who personifies the American successs story, Mr. Santiago Grevi, who was born in La Playa de Ponce, P.R., where my mother was born, and moved to East Harlem at the age of 18. He worked at a variety of jobs to better himself and to find a niche in his new home.

In 1953 he began a career that made him well known throughout New York's Hispanic community; he became a radio broadcaster. With his program, "The Voice of Puerto Rico," Mr. Grevi reached out to New York's Puerto Rican community. He gave them a voice, a remembrance of home. For years the show, which was directed and produced by Mr. Grevi, was heard over WLIB and WBLS in New York. It was a mainstay for all Spanish-speaking New Yorkers.

Then at the age of 47, Mr. Grevi decided to shun success and embark on another career. He went back to college and on to law school. He was admitted to the New York State Bar in 1964. Mr. Grevi did not understand that a 47-year-old man from Ponce, P.R., had no business being so ambitious. He ignored the odds, and the prejudice, and worked hard to achieve his goal.

Santiago Grevi did not play by the rules. He pushed aside his successful career as a broadcaster to become an attorney. Governor Rockefeller understood the value of such a man. He appointed Mr. Grevi to the New York State Drug Abuse Commission, and in 1972 the late Governor made Mr. Grevi commissioner. Of course, Santiago Grevi was also active in a variety of other community activities, including politics, where he was vice president of the Kanawa Democratic Club.

Recently, a school was named after Santiago Grevi in the South Bronx. This is a fitting tribute for this great man. He worked hard; he beat the odds; and he continued to learn, and achieve throughout his life. Santiago Grevi is a perfect example of an American success story, and I feel particularly proud because this great man spent much of his life in my home, New York.

SISTER CLEOPHAS, EDUCATOR, DIES

HON. BARBARA A. MIKULSKI

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring to the attention of the House of Representatives the death of a distinguished intellectual and humanitarian on June 28, 1982. Sister Mary Cleophas Costello, in addition to her scholarship and leadership, was an extraordinary person. She had a tremendous influence on the women of my generation; showing by example that women could pursue fields of intellectual excellence, and at the same time retain basic womanly attributes. She was a role model, teacher, mentor, a gentle disciplinarian, and a friend. Her absence is mourned by the many who sought her guidance.

SISTER CLEOPHAS, EDUCATOR, DIES AT 77

Sister Mary Cleophas Costello, RSM, president of Mount St. Agnes College here for 13 years and later a professor on the English faculty at Loyola College, died of cancer Tuesday at the Mercy Villa convent on Bellona avenue. She was 77.

During more than a decade of teaching at Loyola, Sister Cleophas originated the Creative Living Lecture Program for senior citizens, which she directed until early this year.

She had been on the Mount St. Agnes English faculty more than 25 years before serving as president of the college from 1955 to 1968, and returned to teaching when the school for women merged with Loyola in 1971.

Besides conducting classes at Loyola with the rank of a professor emerita, she served regularly as a visiting professor at Catholic University in Washington, lecturing on her academic specialty of literary theory and serving as an adviser to graduate students.

A native and lifelong resident of Baltimore, Sister Cleophas was a versatile educator with wide interests. She held a harmony teacher's certificate from the Peabody Conservatory of Music, a bachelor's degree in mathematics from St. Mary's College in Indiana and a doctorate in English literature from Catholic University.

An accomplished pianist and vocalist, she was often called upon to help entertain at social gatherings she attended and was active in promoting the arts in the Baltimore area.

She taught courses on T. S. Eliot, Dante, Christian humanism and other subjects to several generations of undergraduates at Mount St. Agnes and Loyola, and was the author of articles in professional journals that extended from her favorite literary fields to theological subjects and interdisciplinary studies.

Sister Cleophas was credited with strengthening the liberal arts, science and education programs at Mount St. Agnes and establishing new psychology, sociology and speech-pathology programs there.

In 1966, the Business and Professional Women's Club of Baltimore presented Sister Cleophas with its Woman of the Year award. She also received medals for outstanding service to education from Loyola and the national Mercy Higher Education Colloquium, and was named a member of Alpha Sigma Nu, the national Jesuit honor society.

A mass of Christian Burial will be offered at 10 a.m. tomorrow at the Shrine of the Sacred Heart Church, 5800 Smith avenue, in Mount Washington.

Sister Cleophas is survived by a brother, John J. Costello, of Baltimore; two nieces, and a nephew.●

ASSAULT ON WOMEN'S RIGHTS

HON. SIDNEY R. YATES

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, I am saddened by the Reagan administration's continuing assault on women's rights. Not content with its responsibility for the death of ERA, the administration now seeks to cripple the National Advisory Council on Women's Educational Programs.

The administration sought to kill the Women's Educational Equity Act program outright by denying it funds. Now that Congress has refused to accede to that short-sighted and meanspirited request, the administration orchestrates the dismissal of the Advisory Council's talented and professional executive director.

It is disgraceful that the Reagan administration continues this assault. And it is disgraceful that the administration has politicized and undermined a council which was bipartisan and effective. I hope and trust that this special order puts the Reagan administration on notice that Congress will not tolerate the continuing assault on women's rights and, in particular, on the WEEA program.●

THE BALANCED BUDGET AMENDMENT

HON. LINDY (MRS. HALE) BOGGS

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mrs. BOGGS. Mr. Speaker, the Senate currently has under consideration a proposed constitutional amendment that would require a balanced Federal budget. It is likely that the House will consider such a proposal in the near future.

Last Sunday, the New Orleans Times-Picayune/States Item featured an editorial that discussed several important aspects of the balanced budget amendment. I would like to share these comments with my colleagues as we prepared for the debate on the amendment.

THE BALANCED BUDGET AMENDMENT

America, the land of "There oughta be a law," seems developing into the land of "There oughta be a constitutional amendment." The latest proposal gathering momentum is for an amendment to require a balanced federal budget. Such budgets are greatly to be desired, but the proposal would do little to require them and by its ineffectiveness could bring disrepute to the magnificent document it would be embedded in.

The federal budget should be balanced. There is just so much the government can be expected to do, and it should live within that area of clear responsibility. But unlike State and local governments, the federal government has many responsibilities that might be considered open-ended. National defense is one, and tiding-over economic programs in hard times is another.

But the proposed amendment would not really encourage a certifiable balanced budget and would not restrain the routine, massive imbalances that have upset the economy and produced the demand for a disciplinary amendment. Congress each year would produce a revenue estimate and a spending bill that would have to match. Federal revenues in any given year would not be allowed to increase at a rate higher than the rate of increase in national income in the previous year. If Congress and the president want to spend more than they estimate they will take in, they will have to pass a tax or taxes to fund the excess.

But the budget need not be balanced in time of war—an exception that needs no comment. But also, spending could exceed income in any year by a three-fifths vote of Congress. This amounts to Congress' authority to waive the amendment whenever it pleases, which means whenever voter pressure in favor of particular spending programs overwhelms the voter pressure that would now engrave "balanced budget" in constitutional stone.

A majority vote could permit federal revenues to grow faster than the national income. This simply provides taxing authority—which Congress has already—without calling attention to it by that horrid name.

In practice, budget-making doubtless would be done by playing with imaginary figures even more than that game is now played. Where will that estimate of revenues, against which proposed spending will be tested, come from? Many now produce estimates, and all differ. The amendment does not say whose figures will rule, and one can expect that budget writers will pick or produce one that suits their proposed budget, and deal with adjustments at the end of fiscal year.

The effect of the amendment could well be to turn even the responsible elements in Congress into con men under the pressure to budget for a national government whose domestic and foreign performance is of global importance. And accepted winking at one part of the Constitution could be precedent for future winking at parts of it that are foundations of the nation.

The responsibility for sound management of the public fisc belongs with the public's elected representatives. They cannot be relieved of it by the magician's trick of misdirecting attention to something that seems relevant but isn't. The executive and legislative branches now have the authority to bring spending into line with basic requirements, fiscal soundness and response to special conditions. They should simply do it.●

NUCLEAR FUEL REPROCESSING: THE ANSWER TO SAFE NUCLEAR WASTE DISPOSAL

HON. MARILYN LLOYD BOUQUARD

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mrs. BOUQUARD. Mr. Speaker, last week I sent a letter to the Washington Post in response to an article which appeared in the July 20, 1982, morning edition. I am not including that letter here because it was a personal letter to Mrs. Graham, the chairman of the board. My letter concerned an article written by Mr. Milton R. Benjamin which referred to a report issued by the health and energy learning project regarding nuclear fuel reprocessing. The report was apparently timed to coincide with deliberations on appropriations bills concerning the Barnwell nuclear fuel plant located in Barnwell, S.C.

Mr. Speaker, this matter is serious because the report was simply not true on most counts. Its erroneous and misleading nature was verified by our own research records in the Committee on Science and Technology and through the efforts of M. Pierre de Mazancourt of the French Embassy who was gracious enough to provide correct information about their reprocessing plants. This French data shows that the statements made in the Washington Post were untrue as does the information graciously provided by Mr. Shirakawa of the Embassy of Japan. The Japanese said that the Post's statements about the Tokai Mura reprocessing plant were untrue, and this was also the conclusion of our own nuclear engineers at Savannah River, Idaho, and Washington State. We expect the Department of Energy to respond to this fallacious report in detail, but I think it is important to provide some facts for the record on this important nuclear issue.

The article claimed that reprocessing plants have an average lifespan of 6 years. Commercial plants in West Germany and Japan are less than 6 years old; however, their useful lives are expected to be at least 25 to 30 years.

But—the Savannah River, S.C., plant has been operating successfully for 28 years.

The Idaho plant has been operating successfully for 23 years. The Hanford, Wash., plant operated successfully for 16 years and was shut down because of decreasing reprocessing requirements. High burnup spent fuel assemblies, which are similar to civilian spent fuel, have been reprocessed in quantity without difficulty. Zircalloy fuel assemblies which have cladding similar to commercial fuel rods have been reprocessed successfully at Hanford.

The article claimed that reprocessing plants operate at only 10 to 35 percent efficiency.

But—Savannah River, Idaho, and Hanford have all performed at better than 80 percent capacity. According to Monsieur de Mazancourt of the French Embassy their La Hague plant has been operating at over 100 percent of design capacity during the first half of 1982, not 10 percent as stated in the article.

Reprocessing plants are uneconomical according to the Post.

But—Idaho records show a benefit-to-cost ratio after discounting of 1.5.

According to the Post, the French La Hague plant had "on the average, one serious accident about every 4 months from January 1980 to June 1982."

But—the French Government said that they have had no serious accidents which could have endangered workers or the environment.

The Post reported the Tokai Mura reprocessing plant had to be shut down this April for 1 year because "radioactive matter touched the heating steam of the fuel rod melting pool."

But—Mr. Shirakawa of the Embassy of Japan said there was a small leak in a dissolver that is being repaired while the plant continues operating on the No. 2 dissolver.

There is no way to classify the statements made in the article other than to categorize them as utter falsehoods.

One element of the U.S. solution to nuclear waste disposal is in Barnwell, S.C. While we would not bury the waste in South Carolina because of soil conditions and high water table, the Allied facility in that State could be utilized for reprocessing. Reprocessing allows us to reduce the scope of the waste first and extract the long-term radioactive elements which are reusable—they can be put right back as fresh fuel to generate power.

Once reprocessing is performed, what remains are relatively short-lived elements which decay more rapidly such that in roughly 500 years they are as dormant as normal background radiation in an average uranium mine. It is useful to think about 500 years in terms of manmade objects from previous civilizations. I can point to the pyramids and I can tell my constituents "See, they are 4,000 years old," and I can point to pottery found in Egypt and say, "Look that is 2,000 years old." I can also say to them that I am concerned about their health and safety and I want them to enjoy a strong economy; both goals are possible. If you encapsulate the waste in glass after reprocessing and then place the rigid glassified material in a stainless steel container and slide it into a hole in an appropriate host rock, it will be stable for centuries. But Barnwell, or a similar plant must be operated first so that we can isolate glassified waste and not spent fuel with its great energy content.●

A SOUTH BRONX SUCCESS STORY

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a moment to pay tribute to a Bronx success story. So often, the only news we hear of the South Bronx is about the poverty and hopelessness. As a lifelong resident of the South Bronx, I know that there is more to the South Bronx than this distorted image. It is also a place full of possibility and achievement.

An example of this kind of achievement is work done by the James & Kirtland Iron Works, located on St. Ann's Avenue on 149th Street. In 1863, the iron works completed work on the dome for the Nation's Capitol Building. The dome which remains as a symbol of the American democracy is also a symbol of success and achievement in the South Bronx.

The statue of Abraham Lincoln, in the Lincoln Memorial, was also the work of South Bronx artist/craftsmen, the Piccirrilli brothers. At their studio on 142d Street, the six Piccirrilli brothers sculpted the statue for the memorial, and presented it to the United States for the unveiling on Memorial Day in 1922.

Both the James & Kirtland Iron Works and the Piccirrilli brothers are examples of South Bronx contributions to American history. The South Bronx also has a rich history full of tradition. It is important to note that even today, the South Bronx is far from dead and hopeless. The people who live in the South Bronx are proud to carry on its rich legacy.●

THE ORIGINAL DISARMERS

HON. JOHN J. LaFALCE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. LaFALCE. Mr. Speaker, later this week the House will consider House Joint Resolution 521, calling for a mutual and verifiable freeze on and reductions in nuclear weapons and for the approval of the Salt II agreement.

In preparation for this momentous debate, I wish to direct our colleagues' attention to an editorial that appeared in the Niagara Gazette on July 20, 1982. The editorial, entitled "Creators of Atomic Bomb Started Anti-Nuke Drive," puts today's public outcry against our nuclear arsenals of destruction in proper historical perspective, for it was Oppenheimer, Einstein, and Fermi, names most associated with our Nation's fledgling nuclear weapons development program, who were the original disarmers.

Mr. Speaker, the great minds who developed the first atomic bomb were not only great scientists capable of harnessing unknown forces, but they were also humanitarians who immediately recognized the destructive potential of that which they had wrought. They were compelled to speak out against their own offspring when they realized that such might placed at the disposal of man could lead to armageddon.

We failed to heed the voices of these great men, Mr. Speaker, and as a result the challenge we face today to reduce the massive nuclear arsenals of the United States and Soviet Union is perhaps greater than the original disarmers could have imagined.

I hope that we are prepared to meet this challenge so that future generations will associate the names Einstein, Oppenheimer, Fermi, and others not with parentage of the bomb but with leadership of the movement that fought the threat of nuclear anihilation and won.

The editorial follows:

CREATORS OF ATOMIC BOMB STARTED ANTI-NUKE DRIVE

Only two weeks before American B-29s dropped the atomic bombs that would force the Japanese to surrender in World War Two, the first atomic device was exploded at Trinity Site in the New Mexico desert.

That was 37 years ago, in mid-July, 1945.

Many of those involved in the anti-nuclear weapons movement today were not yet born when the Trinity test took place, and it may be worth their while to note that the earliest advocates of nuclear weapons control included some of the scientists who made the weapons possible and then came to regret what they had done.

Perhaps we should all reflect on how the creators came to view their creation. Like Dr. Frankenstein, many of them eventually sought to destroy what they had labored so long and hard to bring into being.

Albert Einstein is the scientist whose name became most widely known to the public at large during the 20th century. Einstein had little to do with the building of the first bomb, but he was persuaded in 1939 to apply pressure to President Roosevelt on the side of pushing ahead with the atomic project.

Einstein, as ardent pacifist, deeply regretted his decision in later years. The physicist's last public statement before his death in 1955 was a call for an end to the nuclear arms race. He said just after the war that if he had known that Germany would not succeed with its own atomic project, "I would not have lifted a finger."

Entreaties to politicians to halt the arms race often fall on deaf ears today, and so it was then. When in 1944 it became increasingly apparent to the Allies that the Nazis did not have a bomb and in fact were not even close, many of the scientists at Los Alamos, N.M., were faced with a moral dilemma. Should work on the bomb proceed in view of Germany's pending collapse?

The eminent Danish physicist Nils Bohr, on the team at Los Alamos, visited Roosevelt in late summer, 1944, and suggested that the secret of the bomb be shared internationally. He had presented the same plan to Winston Churchill in July. Both leaders rejected the plea.

After the Trinity test, Leo Szilard and Enrico Fermi, two other scientists working at Los Alamos, formed the Committee on Political and Social Problems to argue against using the weapon. The committee recommended that the bomb be dropped in an uninhabited place where the Japanese—and the world—could see its destructive force.

But President Truman—new to the job after Roosevelt's death—was convinced that the bomb would bring a quick end to the war and save countless American lives. As a result, atomic bombs were dropped on Hiroshima and Nagasaki on Aug. 6 and 9, 1945, killing more than 200,000 people.

The might of those weapons was but child's play compared to the destructive force of the missiles buried in silos in the Soviet Union at this moment targeted for Niagara Falls.

The possibility of their use is infinitely real, infinitely horrifying. The best scientific minds in the world came to realize that fact more than 35 years ago. Increasing numbers of everyday citizens are coming to accept the danger and speak out against it now.

Physicist J. Robert Oppenheimer quoted the sacred Hindu epic, the Bhagavad-Gita, after witnessing the Trinity test. The lines have been repeated many times, but they bear quoting once more: "If the radiance of a thousand suns/ Were to burst at once into the sky/ That would be like the splendor of the Might One. . . ./I am become Death,/ The Shatterer of Worlds."●

REGISTRY OF INTERPRETERS FOR THE DEAF

HON. LAWRENCE J. DeNARDIS

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. DeNARDIS. Mr. Speaker, it is a great honor for me to acknowledge July 27 as National Recognition Day for the Registry of Interpreters of the Deaf. Through their outstanding efforts in bridging the communication gap between the deaf and hearing worlds, sign language interpreters have done and are continuing to do an invaluable service for our Nation and the nearly 14 million deaf and hearing-impaired citizens, who are leading meaningful and productive lives.

As an organization dedicated to improving the training and certification procedures for interpreters as well as working to make Federal, State, and local services available to the deaf and hearing impaired, the Registry of Interpreters for the Deaf, involving 5,000 dedicated individuals, makes possible communication and understanding between the deaf and individuals with normal hearing.

Mr. Speaker, I am also pleased to announce that the Registry of Interpreters for the Deaf will be holding their national convention in Hartford, Conn., my home State and the birthplace of the American School for the Deaf—the first institution of its kind in the United States.

Once again I congratulate the Registry of Interpreters for the Deaf on this special day, and also wish them many more years of success and continued service to humanity.●

ABORTION SIMPLY STATED IS THE KILLING OF A BABY

HON. HENRY J. HYDE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, one of America's most trenchant journalists, John D. Lofton, Jr., has written a typically hard-hitting column appearing in the July 7, 1982, Washington Times. He discusses the glaring inconsistencies inherent in Planned Parenthood's fundraising advertisements in a way that is both instructive and interesting and I commend Mr. Lofton's article to my colleagues:

[From the Washington Times, July 7, 1982]

ABORTION, SIMPLY STATED, IS THE KILLING OF A BABY

(By John Lofton)

Once upon a time, way back in the Dark Ages, the mid-1960s A.D., the folks at Planned Parenthood believed that in an abortion a baby was killed, or so they said.

In 1965, a booklet titled "Plan Your Children for Health and Happiness" was published by Planned Parenthood/World Population. In this publication was a question-and-answer section in which the following was asked: Is birth control an abortion? The answer:

"No. It is definitely not an abortion. Abortion kills the life of a baby after it has begun. It is dangerous to your life and health. It may make you sterile so that when you want a child you cannot have it. Birth control merely postpones the beginning of life."

But all this is ancient history. It is now the 1980s. And the folks at PP are in the vanguard of those forces that favor the legalization of abortion to kill babies. In fact, nowadays, the PP folks don't even seem able to distinguish between having a baby and killing a baby. And, to make matters even more confusing, the folks at PP are today attacking those who still believe what they used to believe; that is, that abortion kills a baby.

Planned Parenthood of Maryland recently ran a full-page ad in the Baltimore Sun. The ad showed a man and wife in bed and between them was another man wearing a dark suit, a tie and horn-rimmed glasses. The headline at the top of the ad reads, "The Decision to Have a Baby Could Soon Be Between You, Your Husband and Your Senator."

The copy in this ad says the Senate Judiciary Committee has taken "An unprecedented first step toward depriving you of your most fundamental personal right: the right to have the number of children you want. When you want them. Or to have none at all." The step spoken of is the so-called Hatch Amendment authored by Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah.

Calling possible Senate passage of the Hatch Amendment a "nightmare" that is becoming a "reality," the PP ad says, "Backing this amendment are right-wing U.S. senators who want to impose their religious beliefs on you. Your friends. Your friends. Your family. Everyone." The ad urges its readers to clip a coupon and send money because: "Now more than ever, we must fight to keep the government from governing your private life. The state of safe and legal abortion hangs in the balance."

There is no doubt that the PP ad is clever. But it is grossly misleading. Hatch's legislation does not seek to limit the decision to have a baby. What the Hatch amendment to the Constitution would do is allow the states and Congress to restrict the so-called right to kill a baby, an unborn baby—a human being in its earliest stage of development. This is a crucial distinction.

There may be good reasons for killing unborn babies. I can't think of any, but that's not the point. The point is that abortion is the killing of a baby. And killing a baby is not the same thing as having a baby. In the case of the former, a baby dies; in the cases of the latter, a baby lives.

To talk with a Planned Parenthood person is to talk with a person who seems to know nothing about either the birds or the bees. When I ask Dan Pellegrom, executive director of the Maryland PP, if an unborn baby is a human life, he says: "No."

Me: "But two humans made it. How could it be anything other than a human life?"

Pellegrom: "Oh, two human beings make all kinds of things."

Me: "like what?"

Pellegrom: (pausing) "All kind of objects, all kinds of things. I mean, I—you know—"

Me: "Would you agree that an unborn baby is alive?"

Pellegrom: "Well, the sperm and egg are alive before they are united. Obviously cells exist and there are such things as living cells. I'm not going to tell you that sperm and the egg aren't alive."

Me: "When do you think human life begins?"

Pellegrom: "I don't know. I think St. Augustine said at quickening."

Now, this is fascinating. We are in the latter half of the 20th century. But in response to my question, which is a medical question having to do with biology, Pellegrom cites the views of a religious authority who lived centuries ago!

This sort of confusion of realms is absurd. Aristotle was undoubtedly a brilliant philosopher but he knew not his hind quarters from his elbow as regards certain other subjects. He maintained that women had fewer teeth than men; he said that children would be healthier if conceived when the wind is from the north; he believed the brain was an organ to cool the body, and he stated that elephants suffering from insomnia could be cured by rubbing their shoulders with salt, olive oil and warm water.

Over and over, when I press him, Dan Pellegrom refuses to take a stand. He refuses to say if he thinks an unborn baby is a human life. Repeatedly, he says abortion is a "Private matter" that individuals must decide for themselves.

But this is a copout. As G. K. Chesterton observed: "To admire mere choice is to refuse to choose." Whatever else may be said of the pro-lifers, they have not ducked the key abortion question. They have made their choice. They say it is killing. And they are correct.

On the subject of the imposition of beliefs, Pellegrom's view is bigoted. If one group's pro-life position is based on religion, the word of the God of the Bible, the imposition of this view by law is "dangerous," he says. Why? Because this would negate the secular humanistic beliefs of the pro-abortion crowd whose god is "free choice." Thus, the imposition by law, of a non-religious pro-abortion position is fine. But, the imposition of a religious, godly pro-life position is something to be feared. The double standard is obvious and despicable.

Truly, it is the pro-abortion forces who are really the metaphysicians. Pellegrom tells me he thinks the government should intervene to protect the life of a 1-hour-old baby even if the mother conscientiously and freely chooses to smother it to death.

I asked: Why? Why is it murder to kill a 1-hour-old baby but OK to kill the same baby when—a few hours or weeks or months earlier—it was inside its mother?

Pellegrom objects to my use of the word baby. But when I change the terminology from the rights of Born Baby A versus Unborn Baby B to the rights of Born Baby A versus Thing B, he still doesn't respond, asking: "Well, you know, where are we going here?" The answer with him, of course, is: nowhere.

The Planned Parenthood ad says that abortion is "something personal, not political." But this cannot be true. In a civilized society, the killing of an innocent baby—born or unborn—can never be just a private matter. No way.●

ST. ANTHONY'S BAND CLUB HONORS CHARLES ESTRELLA

HON. MARGARET M. HECKLER

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mrs. HECKLER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to say a few words honoring a fine and outstanding citizen residing in my district, Mr. Charles Estrella. Mr. Estrella is a humble man, a man who has given 30 years of dedicated service to the Fall River, Mass., Parks Department and a man who served his country during the Second World War in the U.S. Navy. Mr. Estrella is also a man who shares my great love of music. During his tour with the Navy he was a member of the 1st U.S. Amphibious Marching Band and for the past 25 of his 64 years has been a manager and player in the St. Anthony's Band Club of Fall River. It was my great pleasure to accompany this club on their trip to St. Anthony's Feast in Portugal, where I became aware of the invaluable contribution Mr. Estrella has made to this fine group, as well as the great contribution the band has made to music lovers everywhere.

On Saturday July 31, Mr. Estrella will be honored by the St. Anthony's Band Club on the occasion of his retirement. As this fellow band members prepare to celebrate this momentous day and to share in the Estrella family's happiness, I thought it appropriate to honor Charles not only on his retirement, but also for his years of loyal service to his community, his State, and his country. I ask my colleagues to join me in extending my most heartfelt congratulations on this occasion and my wishes for a happy and prosperous retirement.●

SCOUTS SAVE LIVES

HON. DON FUQUA

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Speaker, we all know what a tremendous influence the Boy Scouts of America are in preparing our youth for the duties and responsibilities of citizenship but today I would like to commend this fine program, and three of its participants, for a more immediate accomplishment—the saving of two lives.

The two incidents occurred nearly 100 miles apart, but they dramatically demonstrate the value of Boy Scout training not only to our youths but to the general public as a whole.

Tim Moffses of Madison, Fla., was spending the day at the Suwannee River when he noticed that Allyson Gardner, also at the river with her church group, was caught in the current and in danger. Another group member went to her assistance and also got caught in the current, whereupon Tim Moffses and his friend, Gard Gardner, went to their assistance. Miss Gardner was successfully pulled from the river while the other swimmer succeeded in making his own way to shore.

Explorer Scouts David Aldridge and Joe Hsu of Tallahassee were also credited last month with giving lifesaving assistance to a woman who had lost consciousness.

The fact that three of these four outstanding young men have received Boy Scout training attests to the value of this organization not only to the individual but all all of society.●

TARGETED JOBS TAX CREDIT BILL

HON. MATTHEW J. RINALDO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. RINALDO. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing a bill to extend the targeted jobs tax credit program through fiscal year 1983 and to encourage the employment of low-income older persons. My primary purpose in introducing this bill is to promote the employment of older persons, particularly those with low incomes, who have significant labor market disadvantages and often need special help in overcoming employer preferences for younger workers and strenuous competition in the job market.

Under current law, the targeted group which includes older workers—SSI recipients—is too restrictive and, as the chart below indicates, is the least served group under the program. It is my hope that by adding a new category of disadvantaged workers we will increase the access of mature workers to available jobs.

TJTC certifications issued by the Department of Labor in fiscal year 1981

Cooperative education youth	178,984
Economically disadvantaged youth	176,131
Vocational rehabilitation referrals	16,311
Economically disadvantaged Vietnam veterans	16,112
Economically disadvantaged ex-convicts	14,970
General assistance recipients	8,189
SSI recipients	884
Total	411,581

This legislation is particularly appropriate at a time when our Nation is experiencing post World War II record unemployment. Studies show that following a recession, half of those who become unemployed do not find jobs of comparable status or pay and the majority of those who fall into this category are in their fifties or older. In addition to those who are experiencing recent unemployment, there continues to be a willing and capable pool of older persons who need and want to be a part of the labor force. A 1979 Lou Harris survey found that in the 65 and older age group alone, 9 million people needed and wanted employment.

I am joined in sponsoring this legislation by Mr. STOKES, Mr. MITCHELL of New York, Mr. MINISH, Mr. CORCORAN, Mr. EVANS of Georgia, Mrs. MARTIN, Mr. BARNES, Mr. FAZIO, Mr. ROE, Mr. HUGHES, Mr. DAUB, Mr. PEPPER, and Mr. JOHN BURTON.

I hope that all of my colleagues will give it favorable consideration.●

H.R. 5133, FAIR PRACTICES IN AUTOMOTIVE PRODUCTS ACT

HON. WILLIAM E. DANNEMEYER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on Energy and Commerce, I have been examining H.R. 5133, the proposed Fair Practices in Automotive Products Act. This legislation has been reported out of the Subcommittee on Commerce, Transportation and Tourism and may come before the full committee in the near future.

It is my view that the bill is unfair to consumers, labor, and the domestic automobile industry. Separate analyses by the Congressional Research Service and the Department of Commerce indicate that this is an ill-advised approach to solve the problems of the U.S. auto industry.

This bill will increase car prices, not reduce them.

It will reduce American jobs, not increase them.

It will injure U.S. auto companies, not help them.

For these reasons, upon which I will elaborate, I oppose H.R. 5133 and urge my colleagues to reject it as well.

This legislation would require that, for model years beginning after June 30, 1982, a specified percentage of total production costs of all automotive products, both cars and parts, sold in the United States by an automobile producer, must come from domestic labor and domestically produced parts. This percentage would increase with the number of motor vehicles sold by a given manufacturer. The maximum domestic content ratios would be reached as of model year 1985.

The intent of domestic content requirements is to restrict the number of foreign-made motor vehicles that can be sold in the United States and the amounts of foreign-made parts in U.S.-produced vehicles. These restrictions would shelter domestic producers from competition. In so doing, however, content requirements serve to camouflage the real causes of the auto industry's problems.

Restrictions such as those proposed in H.R. 5133 should not be enacted into law. Short-term protective benefits to auto manufacturers are, in the long term, disproportionately damaging to a larger number of concerns. The evidence supporting this claim is clear.

The underlying flaw of this legislation is that it would trigger rising costs for manufacturers in the United States and trigger rising prices for consumers. According to the Commerce Department study, passage of H.R. 5133 would increase all automobile prices by a minimum of 10 percent. In addition, as a result the Consumer Price Index will increase by 0.3 percentage points. Finally, enactment of H.R. 5133 would place over $15 billion in U.S. exports in a vulnerable position relative to retaliatory action by our trading partners.

Proponents of H.R. 5133 assert that the legislation will reduce unemployment by creating 800,000 jobs. To the contrary, the Congressional Research Service has concluded that this bill could result in a net loss of jobs. For additional information, see "Local Content Laws and Automobile Imports: Arguments Pro and Con." Any gains in employment that would be made by H.R. 5133 would be largely, if not totally, offset by the loss of about 165,000 American jobs that are dependent upon auto imports. Even assuming a 1-for-1 transfer of sales from embargoed imports to domestic cars, the CRS report indicates that not more than 46,000 autoworkers would be reemployed as a result.

Enactment of domestic content legislation could lead to a near breakdown in the areas of components and subassemblies of American manufacturers. The growing production of "world cars," which enable producers to use less costly parts and produce more efficiently, would be restricted. Cars such as these are critical to the recovery of the domestic companies. For example, the CRS study mentioned earlier points out that the Chrysler Corp. would have been unable to produce the volume of K-cars without engines from abroad. General Motor's J-car is produced with parts from nine countries. Ford's Escort and Lynx are designed as "world cars" that contain the parts and components made most efficiently by a particular country. Further, the American Motors Corp. is pinning its hopes on joint production with the French firm Renault of a new vehicle using 50 percent domestic parts and 50 percent foreign parts. As the Wall Street Journal noted, domestic content legislation such as H.R. 5133 "would deliver a knock-out punch to GM's and Ford's 'world car' strategies of consolidating world production and gaining access to the highest quality, lowest cost engines and parts."

Clearly, as one can see, this bill would reduce competition in the automobile industry. Incentives for new investment and productivity advances would be reduced. Consumer choice would be limited. By legislating the idea that firms' and consumers' options should be limited implies an inefficient use of limited world resources.

We must also be mindful of the numerous negative implications for U.S. trade policy, should we enact H.R. 5133. Adoption of this import restriction invites retaliatory action against U.S. export products and jeopardized potential new markets. This legislation would establish a precedent which runs counter to the accepted economic principle of trade based on comparative advantage. The bill would violate provisions of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT), of which the United States is a signatory, which prohibit domestic content requirements. We cannot afford the protectionist signals that this legislation would send.

All of us want our economy and the automobile industry to recover. But the problems we face in achieving recovery will not be solved by imposing domestic content requirements. Rather, they will be solved by creating an economic climate in which U.S. companies and employees are productive and competitive. Interest rates must come down if car purchases are to be affordable for the average potential buyers. This will not happen until Federal deficits and the borrowing which ensues from deficit spending are brought under control. Inefficient work rules and regulatory mandates must also be examined for reform. Ultimately, the task falls to auto executives, union leaders, and rank-and-file employees, to manufacture cars which meet the needs of U.S. consumers over the rest of the competition, foreign and domestic.

At least one other instance in which we sought to treat the symptoms of economic problems through the use of trade measures comes to mind. In the 1920's we faced a similar situation. To alleviate a short-term problem, Congress imposed heavy tariffs through the adoption of the Smoot-Hawley Act. As the framers of the act intended, the tariffs reduced U.S. imports, raised the demand for domestically produced goods and services, and provided an initial stimulus to the overall economy. However, other ramifications also developed. Foreign retaliation followed passage of the Smoot-Hawley Act which substantially reduced U.S. aggregate economic activity and increased unemployment.

Jude Wanniski, in "The Way the World Works," sums up the real meaning of protectionist legislation. He writes:

Indeed, the Smoot-Hawley Act dealt a severe blow to the U.S. economy in the early 1930's. The stock market crash of 1929 and the Great Depression ensued because of the passage of the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act of 1930.

Wanniski traces the congressional consideration of the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act during 1929 and the reaction of the stock market to developments on Capitol Hill relating to the legislation. He argues that while the act was not enacted and implemented until 1930, the effect of the progress of the bill through the legislative process was a sufficient signal to the stock market to produce the events leading up to the crash in October 1929.

While I will have more to say about the history of the Smoot-Hawley Act and the lessons we should learn from it, suffice it to say at this juncture that we should heed Wanniski's warning that "a return to protectionism would be a blow to the world economy."

I urge my colleagues to oppose H.R. 5133 should it come before the Energy and Commerce Committee or the floor.●

UNION COMPULSION

HON. L. A. (SKIP) BAFALIS

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. BAFALIS. Mr. Speaker, since I have always supported right-to-work legislation and helped to author the provision now part of Florida's Constitution when I served in the State legislature, I am seriously concerned that there is an active effort nationwide to undermine the protection afforded nonunion employees in States with right-to-work laws. For this reason, I would like to insert in the RECORD a copy of an article which recently appeared in the Miami Herald. This article gives a brief history of the case Lord against Local Union No. 2088, involving employees on two Air Force bases in the State of Florida, and the ramifications of the Supreme Court's decision to let stand the ruling of the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals.

[From the Miami Herald, June 30, 1982]

UNION COMPULSION

Workers shouldn't be fired or denied a job merely because they aren't members of a union. To prevent such discrimination, 20 states have enacted "right to work" laws as authorized since 1947 by the Taft-Hartley Act.

Florida is among those 20 states. Its law, however, has proved to be useless to six non-union employes of RCA International Service Corp. (RCA). They were excluded from working on the space shuttle because they weren't members of a union holding a contract with RCA.

The workers challenged their exclusion in court. This week the U.S. Supreme Court dealt them a setback. It let stand an appeals-court decision upholding their exclusion from jobs.

The appeals court had ruled that Federal law prevails over state law on Federal installations such as the Kennedy Space Center at Cape Canaveral. As an interpretation of the way the law is, the lower court's view now has the Supreme Court's imprimature.

There is reason to wonder, however, whether the Supreme Court might not have ruled differently had the Solicitor General, representing the Federal Government, pursued the case enthusiastically by raising Constitutional issues of unlawful discrimination.

Perhaps the Reagan Administration will encourage him to do so when the Supreme Court is asked to hear similar cases—and several are pending. He should, for important Constitutional issues need to be clarified.

Meanwhile, Congress ought to take a new look at Federal labor law in light of the Supreme Court ruling. A law barring compulsory unionism on Federal installations or even among Federal contractors is in order.

To be fair, the law ought not rule out contracts in which labor and management agree to let unions assess a fee for essential services that benefit nonmembers. The fee must bear a reasonable relationship to the value of such services, however, and must not be union dues in disguise.

Letting unions charge nonmembers a reasonable fee for such services could help disarm opposition to Federal legislation outlawing compulsory unionism. No longer could organized labor complain of "parasites" who derive the benefits of unionism but don't pay.

Nobody ought to be coerced into joining any organization, however. Compulsory unionism simply doesn't square with American ideals exalting freedom of association. What's more, when membership is truly voluntary, unions must work hard to serve the interests of their members. When membership is compulsory and the dues just keep flowing in, the union leaders' zeal to serve the workers often wanes.

Compulsory unionism is bad for business, for labor, and for the Constitution's promise of free association. Congress ought to get the Federal Government in step with the 20 states that have had the foresight to outlaw it.●

EQUITY—AND JUSTICE—FOR MILITARY SPOUSES

HON. MARGARET M. HECKLER

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mrs. HECKLER. Mr. Speaker, today, in accepting the gentlewoman from Colorado's amendment to H.R. 6030, we took an important step toward rectifying a practice that places military spouses at a tremendous disadvantage when their marriages end in divorce. Current law treats these spouses differently than spouses of civil service, foreign service, and Central Intelligence Agency personnel when it comes to classification of retired pay as marital property.

The U.S. Supreme Court, in McCarty against McCarty, recently held that, absent a Federal statute to the contrary, State courts could not consider military retired pay as marital property subject to division in a divorce settlement.

This decision challenged this Congress to pass such a statute. In my view, such a law is essential to giving military spouses equity—not just with other Federal spouses, but justice under law.

Our armed services recruit families. For example, one Navy recruiting ad is blatantly directed to the prospective Navy wife. It states,

> You're one of a kind, and just as important to us as your husband . . . [W]e try to make life easier for you with benefits you won't find in civilian life.

Yet when the Navy wife becomes an ex-wife, she is left with nothing—no career, no medical insurance, no share of retirement benefits.

These military spouses, men and women alike, deserve better from the country that they, too, have served. That is why I supported the amendment to permit State courts to consider the military pension as part of marital property. It is time we corrected this injustice.●

THE AMERICAN QUEST FOR PEACE

HON. JOHN J. RHODES

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, as we study and debate the proper course for America to follow in its relations with its European allies, and in negotiating with the Russians for the reduction of nuclear armaments, it is helpful to consider the viewpoints of all concerned Americans. In this regard, I would like to commend to my colleagues' attention, the remarks of Hon. Arthur F. Burns, American Ambassador to the Federal Republic of Germany. Ambassador Burns delivered his speech, "The American Quest for Peace" at the opening of South German Radio's "Focus on America Week," held in Stuttgart, Germany, on June 2, 1982.

The Ambassador's remarks follow:

THE AMERICAN QUEST FOR PEACE

(Speech by Arthur F. Burns American Ambassador to the Federal Republic of Germany)

It is a privilege to be able to join this distinguished company to help inaugurate Sueddeutscher Rundfunk's "Focus on the United States". I am especially grateful for the opportunity to address you tonight, for we meet on the eve of momentous international events. The leaders of the principal Western powers are assembling in Versailles this weekend for two days of economic discussion. This will be followed by a NATO summit in Bonn next week. In addition, President Reagan will visit with high government officials in Rome, London, and Berlin.

Such an intensive round of interchange among the West's political leadership would be significant at any time. It is all the more so now, for the conferees must deal with vexing economic and political questions at a time when many of the institutions and security arrangements that have so successfully protected us during the postwar period are under widespread attack. New questions are being asked, new doubts are being raised; new fissures are apparent in the body politic.

This challenge exists, as we know, on both sides of the Atlantic and comes not only from fringe groups but also from prominent citizens who argue that altered conditions have eroded the utility of traditional arrangements. It is a challenge that the assembled leadership of the Western powers will inevitably have to weigh in its deliberations.

Let me say, as a longtime teacher and public servant, that I for one see a constructive side in much of the debate now welling up around our security and economic relationships. NATO, the stationing of American troops in Europe, as well as many postwar agreements involving finance and commerce go back more than thirty years. As has often been noted, these arrangements have produced the very conditions of stability and security that now allow their continued essentiality to be questioned. As a result, they are undergoing what might be called a midlife crisis. Under the circumstances, the questioning by a new generation of their basic premises is not only inevitable; it can—if done responsibly—be beneficial.

For how can we ourselves be certain that the concepts and institutions in which we have so long placed our trust continue valid unless we are periodically called upon to reexamine and defend them? Only out of such a process of questioning can come a renewed assurance of their relevance and vitality. And only such a reappraisal can stimulate the adjustments that new circumstances warrant.

I welcome this process of testing and dialogue for still another, quite personal reason. I am deeply confident of the outcome; confident that the transatlantic relationship is fundamentally strong; confident that America's basic international policies are sound; confident that the structures that have served the cause of peace so well are still vigorous and adaptable to new conditions; confident, in short, that the assumptions that have guided the North Atlantic Alliance will stand up under rigorous scrutiny—and emerge the better for it.

This confidence is based on awareness of the past as well as on my evaluation of the present. Clearly, it is impossible to assess the compelling requirements of the present without a companion understanding of the past. That is why I have spoken so often in recent months of the need for better knowledge and appreciation of history, particularly by the young. The ignorance that I have encountered in this area, both in Germany and at home, is appalling. It accounts, I believe, for much of the intellectually shabby edges of the contemporary colloquy. I am especially troubled by those West Europeans who profess to see little difference between American and the Soviet Union—who proclaim that both are a threat to international peace and order.

Now, the United States, like the Soviet Union, is a large and complex country. Unlike the Soviet Union, however, ours is an open and democratic society. We accommodate the competing aspirations and interests of many different groups. Understatement is not our national characteristic, and particularly at election times we are prone to overblown rhetoric. But the hyperbole we periodically indulge in must not be misread. It tells more about our political rites than about our policies. In the international area, those policies have been remarkable consistent in the postwar era. As Professor Robert Osgood of Johns Hopkins University recently reminded us:

". . . the continuities of American foreign policy are always greater than the political claims to innovation would have one believe. The greatest discontinuities spring from response to unanticipated events, not from changes of Administration."

Our postwar efforts to seek a durable peace represent the central and most vital part of that continuity.

Allow me to recall a few of the highlights of the past record. In so doing, it may be appropriate, as we await the Versailles meeting of this weekend, to begin by reflecting upon an earlier conference at that same site: the 1919 meeting which wrote such an infamous epilogue to World War I.

The consequences that flowed from the decisions taken at that earlier Versailles assemblage are well known. Practically everyone now agrees that the huge reparations exacted from the defeated powers, the staggering inflation and political turmoil that followed, plus the bitterness and anger that were Versailles' legacy, laid much of the basis for World War II. More pertinent to our present discussion is the fact that later Allies statesmen learned the lessons to be drawn from the shortsightedness of their predecessors. Planning for a peaceful postwar world began well before World War II ended. It proceeded from a vision of the world being solidly based on the rule of law—a world informed by a spirit of true cooperation, with each nation bound firmly to peaceful settlement of international disputes. Beyond this, economic growth and prosperity, the absence of which had contributed so materially to the outbreak of World War II, were to be fostered by progessive dismantling of barriers to the free flow of goods and capital among nations.

As early as July 1944, at the invitation of President Franklin Roosevelt, representatives of 44 countries convened in Bretton Woods, New Hampshire, to formulate plans in the monetary and financial field for the stable and prosperous world that the planners envisaged. Out of their deliberations emerged two of the cornerstone economic institutions of the postwar world—the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. The following April, two weeks before the end of war in Europe, the San Francisco Conference which drew up the Charter of the United Nations, was convened. Whatever its shortcomings in actual practice, the Charter did become a blueprint for international order—a world where force could be employed only under the most limited circumstances.

Another preoccupation of American leaders of that period was control of the awesome potential of atomic energy—again in the interest of minimizing the danger to peace that could later be posed by reckless political adventurers. On June 14, 1946, the United States unveiled a detailed plan for international nuclear control. This proposal, named after Bernard Baruch one of America's distinguished elder statesmen, came at a time when the United States was the only nation in the world that possessed nuclear weapons. Still, in the interest of creating a stable and peaceful international environment, the United States offered to surrender its nuclear monopoly to an international authority that would be entrusted with "all phases of the development and use of atomic energy, starting with the raw material." By providing for full international control, this prescient plan sought to prevent atomic undertakings that could endanger peace.

It is worth reflecting for a moment on how much less costly to the peace of mind of the human family, to say nothing of its pocketbook, the subsequent years would have been if that farsighted proposal had been accepted. Unfortunately, with the xenophobia we have come to recognize as its hallmark, the Soviet Union turned the plan down, claiming that it masked some sinister hegemonic intent.

The Marshall Plan—the 35th anniversary of which we proudly celebrate this month—was likewise aimed at creating a healthy and peaceful international environment. Rather than being an early cold-war ploy, as has at times been alleged, this plan was in fact open to the Soviet Union and other East European countries. With the notorious Versailles precedent in mind, Secretary Marshall and his colleagues realized that the shattered European economies must be restored with American help. Their central purpose was to provide the means that would enable a devastated Europe to begin producing and trading on an ascending scale once again. Wisely, they also recognized that the Europeans themselves had to become actively engaged in the planning process. As Marshall put it in his memorable Harvard University address of June 5, 1947:

"It would be neither fitting nor efficacious for this Government to undertake to draw up unilaterally a program designed to place Europe on its feet economically. This is the business of the Europeans."

And significantly, Marshall added:

"Our policy is directed not against any country or doctrine but against hunger, poverty, desperation, and chaos. . . . Any government that is willing to assist in the task of recovery will find full cooperation . . . on the part of the United States Government."

Later that month, Ernest Bevin, Georges Bidault, and Vyacheslav Molotov, respectively the foreign ministers of Great Britain, France, and the Soviet Union, met in Paris to consider the American plan. Britain and France proposed that a joint steering committee administer the program. Once again, in a manner so often since repeated, the Soviets rejected this approach as interference in their internal affairs. They demanded that each country independently estimate its own requirements for help. When Britain and France found this position unacceptable, the Soviets withdrew from the conference.

Yet again, one cannot help but speculate how different the history or postwar Europe might have been if the Soviets—and the other countries of Eastern Europe under their control—had not repulsed what Winston Churchill later called "the most unsordid act" in history, an act that pumped over $13 billion—a sum equivalent at today's prices to four times that figure—into Europe's stricken economies. What we definitely know is that Western Europe was propelled to an historically unprecedented improvement of living standards, while both agriculture and the manufacture of consumer products within the Soviet bloc languished. By now, several West European countries actually appear to have a greater per capita income than does the United States.

The Soviet pattern of resistance to American peace proposals, set in the early postwar period, has since then been repeated time and again. In particular, progress on arms control has been severely checked by Soviet opposition to on-site verification. True, there have been some hard-won accomplishments: the 1963 partial test ban treaty, the 1968 nonproliferation treaty, the 1972 convention against biological and toxic weapons, and the 1972 SALT treaty among them. But far-reaching American proposals for reducing armaments—President Eisenhower's "Open Skies" plan, President Kennedy's comprehensive disarmament initiative, President Carter's effort to secure an agreement prohibiting production of chemical weapons, to cite only a few examples—have unfortunately been rebuffed.

Most dismaying to Americans has been the unrelenting military build-up of the Soviets and their unresponsiveness to Western moves in the opposite direction. They maintained their large armies following the war as the Allies demobilized their wartime forces. Their build-up continued as the Red Army settled into permanent garrisons in Eastern Europe in the 1950's. It continued despite the serious arms control efforts of the 1960's. And it continued and accelerated during the detente of the 1970's—a time when the United States was cutting its defense budget in real terms and even shelving plans for major new weapons, such as the B-1 bomber.

The Soviet military build-up has made the world a very dangerous place. With the Soviet Union now able to project its military power worldwide, no area of the globe is free of potential intimidation or confrontation. And with the NATO countries compelled to respond by modernizing their military structures at the expense of domestic programs, we are drawn once again into a vortex of escalated tension and social unrest. I need hardly add that the Soviets devote a much higher percentage of their national output to armaments than does the United States or any other Western country, and that the Russian people themselves are therefore not least among the sufferers.

In recalling these facts and this history, my aim today is not to reopen old wounds or to stir about in the embers of old disputes. Nor is it to eulogize American peace efforts, for we Americans have also had our doubts and suspicions, and we too have made mistakes in our quest for international peace. Granting all that, I must still insist that those who now contemplate drastic alterations in the arrangements that have secured the safety and vital interests of the West in the postwar period are under a moral obligation to study, soberly and in full depth, the record that I have placed before you in its most summary form. Those who do so will find that when it comes to persistent striving for peace, the scales tip decisively on the side of the West.

There is a telling difference, after all, in the drives and aspirations of the Soviet Union and of the United States. I do not wish to paint the Soviets black and us white. But to ignore differences in the history and culture of the two countries is to avoid reality. The Russian people have lived throughout their tumultuous history under assorted czars and commissars, some benevolent, some not. But few, if any, of them have achieved renown for championing the individual rights of Russian citizens. Americans, on the other hand, have been privileged throughout their history to live under a Constitution guaranteeing their freedom to speak, write, vote, and worship as they see fit, besides their freedom to work for themselves or for employers of their choice, and to spend or save on whatever scale they deem wise or proper.

We are justly proud of that freedom and are zealous in its protection. The peace for which we have worked across the years is not a peace imposed by some superpower or master race on other peoples, but a peace that preserves human freedom and enables it to flourish. Our empathy with peoples whose freedom is threatened has lead us in the postwar period into some controversial foreign undertakings. Our role in Korea, in Vietnam, and more recently in El Salvador, has provoked sharp and emotional debate. Questions have been raised about the wisdom, necessity, extent, and nature of our support for this or that people or government. However one feels about the particular issues involved, I submit that our purpose in each case has been idealistic. We have sought neither territory nor any economic advantage for ourselves. In every instance, our basic aim was to assist a friendly country to maintain its independence and freedom. It is noteworthy that even in the case of Vietnam, where our effort failed, not a few who opposed that war now question their earlier position. That is hardly surprising, in view of the frightful brutality that the North Vietnamese have inflicted on their neighbors.

Be that as it may, my main point is this: American initiatives for peace over the years have been reinforced by being coupled with initiatives in support of freedom. That philosopy continues to dominate our foreign policy. It was well expressed by President Reagan in his inaugural address when he said:

". . . peace is the highest aspiration of the American people. We will negotiate for it, sacrifice for it; we will not surrender for it, now or ever."

In this spirit, we are now pressing for arms reductions and for a lessening of East-West tension. But we are also assuring ourselves an effective deterrent force.

The resurgence of America's defense capability began toward the end of President Carter's administration, and it has accelerated materially under President Reagan's leadership. This shift in American policy was not undertaken hastily or willfully by our Congress. On the contrary, it has evolved out of the grass-roots sentiment of the American people who had become fearful of the continuing increase of Soviet military power and the willingness to use it to exploit the weakness of other nations. If such an awakening to the Soviet threat is less conspicuous in Europe, one reason may well be that our allies, especially the Federal Republic of Germany, were more attentive during the 1970's to the need for strengthening NATO's deterrent power. In fact, what has come to be known as the NATO double-track decision was largely a European initiative aimed at reestablishing the deterrent capability of the Alliance. And it was precisely this decision that finally persuaded the Soviets to come to the negotiating table in Geneva.

On the eve of the beginning of those negotiations last November President Reagan explained with utmost clarity that the United States is fully committed to the goal of virtual elimination of intermediate-range missiles in Europe, and that the United States will therefore not deploy any of the sophisticated weapons scheduled for 1983 if the Soviet Union will agree to dismantle its own intermediate-range weapons. The President went on to commit the American government to seek agreements with the Soviet Union to bring about substantial reductions of conventional military forces in Europe as well as both American and Soviet intercontinental nuclear weapons. The President concluded his dramatic proposal for building peace by observing that "there is no reason why people in any part of the world should have to live in permanent fear of war;" that "the time is right to move forward on arms control;" and that "nothing will have a higher priority" for him "and for the American people."

Last month President Reagan followed up this call for sanity on military matters by proposing a realistic two-step approach to the control of intercontinental weapons. The first phase of the President's plan would seek to reduce American and Soviet missile warheads to equal ceilings at least a third below current levels, while the second phase would seek to achieve equal ceilings on other strategic elements such as missile throw weights. Negotiations on this far-reaching proposal for a phased reduction of intercontinental missile systems will soon get under way. The outcome will remain highly uncertain for some time, but there is at least some hope now that the interests of humanity will prevail.

In developing plans for these arms control negotiations, the American government has consulted frequently and extensively with its NATO allies. That is as it should be. The best road to international peace is always uncertain, and Americans cannot claim greater wisdom than Europeans in pursuing our common goal. Much has been heard recently about a political development, commonly referred to as "the peace movement," in which the young people of Germany and other European countries are particularly involved. The idealism of our young people is highly admirable and must never be frustrated. It is regrettable, all the same, that their well-intentioned thoughts about war and peace are not disciplined by historical knowledge of the human condition. All of us in the West, whether young or old, must never forget that NATO is the instrument for peace that has shielded our security and freedom for a generation and a half. Some adaptation in the scope and vision of NATO may well be desirable; but when we talk seriously about peace movements, let us respect the preponderant truth that the North Atlantic Alliance is the one effective and proven peace movement with which we have been blessed in this troubled century.

The political principle underlying NATO is direct and simple: an attack on one member nation is an attack on all. But NATO has a moral as well as political dimension. What has made NATO such an effective movement for peace is that it is an alliance of nations, freely joined with one another, to preserve and protect the basic values on which our Western civilization is based: namely, respect for the rights of the individual, respect for the rule of law, respect for the principles of democracy. It is these shared values that have given NATO its fundamental strength—that have made it a peace movement unprecedented in its success at preserving peace. It deserves our continued commitment and support because it works and there is none better.●

AFRICARE ESSAY CONTEST

HON. HAROLD WASHINGTON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. WASHINGTON. Mr. Speaker, the members of the Congressional Black Caucus have a keen interest in the growth and development of Africa and in programs which assist young Americans to better understand its significance. For this reason, I take this opportunity to commend Africare for sponsoring the first Africare essay contest on the subject of "Africa and the United States: Interdependence." A special word of congratulations is extended to each of the essay finalists, and especially to the first place winner, Stager Clay Smith, a 17-year junior from Woodrow Wilson Senior High School in Washington, D.C. Mr. Smith's paper was on "Africa and the United States: Factors Supporting the Concept of Interdependence."

I am inserting in the RECORD the attached news article on the Africare essay contest which appeared in the Washington Post (District Weekly) on May 26, 1982, at page DC-2:

STAGER CLAY SMITH, AFRICARE ESSAY WINNER

Stager Clay Smith, a junior at Woodrow Wilson Senior High School and the son of J. Clay Smith, Jr., of 16th Street, NW., won a trip of seven days in West Africa and two days in Paris this summer as first-place winner in the Africare Essay Contest on Africa.

Accompanying Smith to the awards ceremony was Elizabeth Newsome, who taught Smith to read years ago at the Maude Price Nursery School on Warder Street, NW.

The contest theme was "Africa and the United States: Interdependence." Its goal was to contribute to students' understanding of the importance of Africa in relationship to the rest of the world by encouraging D.C. public school students to give serious thought to African history, current events, culture and sciences.

Other grand-prize winners were seniors Tyrone Lassiter of Dunbar Senior High, who won a second-place $500 cash scholarship; Darrell Brown of Theodore Roosevelt Senior High, who won a third-place $250 cash scholarship; and Mary Norris of Dunbar Senior High, who won a fourth-place $125 cash scholarship.

Named as "best essayists" for their schools were Lydia Brooks, Armstrong Adult Center; Patty Hannaham, Banneker Senior High; Esther I. Amobi, Cardozo Senior High; Terry Pearson, McKinley Senior High; and Gwendolyn Arnold, H.D. Woodson Senior High. Honorable mention essayists were Michelle A. Caplan of Banneker Senior High and Phyllis D. Brown of Dunbar Senior High. Best essayists and honorable mention winners were awarded African artifacts from Niger, West Africa.

Africare was established in 1971 in the District to help improve the quality of life in rural Africa.●

THE 75TH WEDDING ANNIVERSARY FOR MR. AND MRS. FRANK D'AMBROSIO

HON. EUGENE V. ATKINSON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. ATKINSON. Mr. Speaker, on August 15, 1982, I will have the honor to participate in a 75th wedding anniversary celebration in honor of Mr. and Mrs. Frank D'Ambrosio, Sr. They were united in marriage on August 15, 1907, at St. Theresa Roman Catholic Church in Waterville, Conn. Presently, Mr. and Mrs. D'Ambrosio, Sr., reside in Ellwood City, Pa.

I will be brief, but I am sure that my colleagues would be interested in taking a moment to consider the dedication that these two individuals made to one another, to their family, and to society.

Frank D'Ambrosio, Sr., spent 40 years working for the United States Steel in Monaca, Pa. In addition, he was a farmer for 50 years. Furthermore, Frank was a member of the Sons of Italy in Ellwood City. Together, he and wife Elizabeth raised 14 children; 72 grandchildren; 69 great grandchildren; and 32 great great grandchildren.

To be married for this long period of time, especially with the increase of the divorce rate, shows true devotion to one another. May they serve as an excellent example to their community, as well as to America, to prove that a lot of hard work, time, and sacrifice preserves one of America's most cherished institutions, the family. Thank you.●

A UNISPACE INITIATIVE FOR PEACE

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, the upcoming United Nations Conference on the Exploration and Peaceful Uses of Outer Space (Unispace) will not only place our technological know-how under world scrutiny, but will also put our political savvy to the test. This is true of all U.N. conferences, but is particularly true in light of the short time we have had to prepare for this conference. The United States only began preparing for it 8 months ago. And the U.S. delegation will receive its first briefing from the State Department tomorrow, just 10 days before they are to represent our country in a major international conference.

As a congressional adviser to Unispace 1982, I have been concerned about this lack of preparation. But more distressing has been the approach the United States is taking to the whole conference. U.S. delegation organizers have stubbornly insisted that the conference is strictly concerned with technical matters. I think this flies in the face of reality. For example, there are a number of countries, primarily the developing countries, that are concerned with satellite uses by the U.S.S.R. and the United States and other developed countries. The dissemination of data gathered by remote sensing satellites is a very sensitive issue. Rather than addressing the fears of these countries in a constructive way, and making some friends in the process, we are ignoring their problems.

One exception to the damage control approach being taken to the U.S. participation in Unispace is a proposal offered by my colleague from Kansas (Mr. WINN). It is similar to a proposal for the establishment of an international peacekeeping satellite which would be part of a larger United Nations Satellite Monitoring Agency. "Peacesat," as it has been referred to, would serve to monitor military activities over the globe and aid in arms control verification. I would like to join with my colleague, Mr. WINN, in calling for discussion of this initiative at Unispace 1982. We can further our goal of arms limitation and develop the peaceful uses of outer space. At the same time, we can signal to the world that we intend to be leaders in the pursuit of peace.

I would like to submit for the RECORD a recent article which appeared in Chemical and Engineering News on the subject of Unispace which discusses the peacekeeping satellite proposal.

The article follows:

[From the Chemical and Engineering News, July 26, 1982]

UN TO DEBATE USES OF SPACE SCIENCE

(By Wil Lepkowski)

Vienna Unispace conference will discuss commercial uses of satellites for meeting developing countries' needs; military uses also on agenda.

In about two weeks, the United Nations will be staging another of those huge conferences around a major scientific and technological theme. This one is on the uses of outer space. The site will be Vienna. And the politics likely will be hot.

Up to last December, it wasn't clear whether the U.S. would be sending a delegation at all to the conference, called Unispace, seeing it as another forum where the U.S. would be set up as an opponent of progress by left-leaning developing countries. But by February, the U.S. had decided to go and appointed Gerald Helman as head of the delegation.

Many issues are expected to consume long hours of debate. One is the handling of data received from privately financed remote sensing satellites surveying the resources of various countries. The developing countries fear that the countries possessing that technology (U.S., U.S.S.R., France, and soon Japan) will be gathering information on their resources, keeping it to themselves, and then selling it to customers. The issues come down to who owns the data, whether gathering and disseminating them without permission is legal or at least ethical, and whether the countries being surveyed should be kept completely informed about who is doing the surveying and what they are finding.

Related to that is the information beamed down from broadcast satellites. The developing countries want to keep undesirable programing off their airwaves and will be pressing for some kind of protocol over the control of that broadcasting.

A third major issue involves telecommunication satellites which are set permanently over one section of Earth. Only so many positions are available for these satellites and the developing countries want some sites for their own use. The U.S. says frequencies can be reserved on these satellites for other countries.

The big sleeper could be the debate over the militarization of space. The French are proposing to establish a special internationally administered reconnaissance satellite that would keep watch over hostile activities around the world. The satellite would be part of a larger United Nations Satellite Monitoring Agency that would perform all technologically feasible functions such as weather forecasting, programing, environmental monitoring, resource explorations, crop forecasting, and communications. But the peacekeeping role would be the politically incendiary topic. Both the Soviet Union and the U.S. oppose the system, since neither wants a third force peering down on its military activities.

Still, the idea seems to be catching on in some unlikely places. For example, conservative Rep. Larry Winn (R.-Kan.) announced during an afternoon earlier this month that the "peace satellite" was an idea whose time had come and that he would be introducing a resolution for Congress to endorse the idea. Winn says he intends to ask President Reagan to bring up the subject during his forthcoming summit meeting with Soviet party chairman Leonid Brezhnev.

"If they could agree that we would make a joint effort to build and man a peace-keeping satellite, that would give the greatest signal to everybody in the world that the two leaders want peace," he told the Kansas City Times.

Winn, since he is running for reelection in his district, may have political reasons for adopting such an uncharacteristic stance on arms control. He reports detecting strong sentiments among his constituents for efforts to end the constant nuclear arms escalation in the paradoxical cause of stability. But the proposal has its naive aspects, especially in establishing the kind of organization and funding that would guarantee, first, that the system could be afforded and second that the data gatherers could be trusted with the information.

So the conference should be interesting to watch. Satellite technology does promise to change drastically the political perceptions, if not the organization, of the world since it tends to dissolve borders. The chemical industry is involving itself slowly in these horizons. For instance, Dow Chemical and Hercules just signed on as clients with Satellite Business Systems Inc. to link their offices around the country electronically in one communications system. The industry is almost certain to play some kind of a role in the mission of the resource satellites that more and more will go into orbit during the 1980s.

But as far as the conference is concerned, caution is the keynote. As a report issued a few days ago by Congress' Office of Technology Assessment said: "Few in the U.S. are aware of the conference and of its potential importance to this country's space policy and the future of its aerospace industry. Many U.S. leaders view this conference with suspicion. Consequently, they seek to minimize its importance in the hope of limiting the damage it might do to U.S. political and commercial interests."●

JAMAICA SUPPORTS CARIBBEAN BASIN INITIATIVE

HON. PAUL FINDLEY

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Speaker, the outstanding citizens from the Caribbean and Central America who came to Washington last week included some of the region's leading representatives of government, culture, the private sector, and the financial community.

They traveled at their own expense for the purpose of informing the U.S. Congress of their position concerning the Caribbean and Central American Revitalization Act.

These educated, enlightened, and articulate spokesmen and women justified their need through their public support of the President's proposal. In addition, they also learned much about what was happening in the Congress with respect to committee action on this legislative proposal. Now they have returned to their own countries to inform and clarify the potential impact of this legislation on their own communities.

The interest is high. For example, the oldest free newspaper in that part of the world, the Kingston, Jamaica Gleaner, has done a special feature which, in effect, pays tribute to the American democratic system.

These men and women are to be congratulated. Among those who came, and should be recognized, were the Jamaicans lead by the Right Honorable Deputy Prime Minister Hugh L. Shearer. The latter not only visited with President Reagan, but also met with the majority of those members who are on committees working on this legislation. These people emphasized trade assistance and investment and not permanent aid.

Those with the Private Sector Organization of Jamaica (PSOJ) were:

Avis Henriques, currently serving her second term as president of the PSOJ. She is also a past president of the Jamaica Chamber of Commerce and is an executive member of the Jamaica Employers' Federation; J. Paul Thomas, deputy president of the Jamaica Manufacturers' Association and chairman of the Task Force on Footwear of the Prime Minister's Committee on Investment and Employment; Prakash Vaswani, immediate past president of the Jamaica Exporters' Association and the Honorary Secretary of the PSOJ; Geoffrey Messado, a chartered accountant and general manager and director of Carreras Developments Ltd.; Neville James, manager of the PSOJ since January, 1981; and Dr. Richard Lowe, senior director, Jamaica National Investment Promotions, Ltd.

Following is President Reagan's statement on the Caribbean Basin Initiative.

CARIBBEAN BASIN INITIATIVE

I want to welcome the bipartisan compromise which has been reached in the House Foreign Affairs Committee on my request for emergency economic assistance under the Caribbean Basin Initiative. It is my hope that the compromise will be supported by a large majority of the members of the committee. The bill will authorize the full amount of our request of $350 million. A total of $100 million would be authorized for El Salvador, with $20 million of this for support of that country's land reform program. While somewhat less than our original request, this $100 million will provide a vital boost to the Salvadoran economy and help to ensure continued progress in the political and economic reform in that country.

Additional amounts of assistance provided under this bill would go to Costa Rica, Honduras, Jamaica, the Dominican Republic, the island countries of the Eastern Caribbean, Haiti, Belize, and Guatemala.

Early action on the Caribbean Basin Initiative is a high priority for my administration. It is my hope the Appropriations Committees of the House and Senate will give early and favorable consideration to this legislation. Favorable action in both Houses on the critical trade and investment initiatives of our program is also imperative.●

STANISLAV ZUBKO

HON. LAWRENCE J. DeNARDIS

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. DeNARDIS. Mr. Speaker, I am once again pleased and honored to participate in the Congressional Vigil for Soviet Jews. As a participant in this most important excercise, I am mindful of the staggering emigration figures recorded in recent months. According to statistics obtained from the National Conference on Soviet Jewry, during the first half of 1982, 1,500 Jews were permitted to emigrate from the Soviet Union—a 94 percent drop when compared to the first half of 1979, during which a record 25,000 Jews were given visas. Last month alone, only 182 Jews were able to emigrate from the Soviet Union.

I want to bring to the attention of my colleagues today the case of longtime Kiev refusenik, Stanislav Zubko. In May 1981, the Kiev KGB entered Zubko's apartment on the pretext of investigating a robbery in a neighbor's apartment. once inside, authorities confiscated what they allegedly believed to be a small quantity of hashish and a firearm. They also took a Hebrew book, the possession of which is outlawed.

Zubko was brought to trial in July and charged with "illegal keeping of arms" and "illegal possession of drugs"—under articles 222 and 229 of the Ukrainian Criminal Code, respectively. He was sentenced to 4 years in a labor camp. Declaring his innocence, Zubko stated that both the pistol and hashish found were placed there by the security police.

Prior to his incarceration, Zubko had been a leader among the Kiev refuseniks. As is the case with Zubko, several Kiev activists have been arrested and imprisoned under highly questionable circumstances in an effort to suppress the growing feeling of dissatisfaction toward the Soviet regime for its abuses of basic human liberties. In recent months, we have witnessed a sharp increase in the number of such arrests, while also noting a dramatic falloff in the emigration flow from the Soviet Union. Mr. Speaker, it is critically important that we continue to closely monitor this situation, while offering hope and support to those in need. Through the Congressional Vigil for Soviet Jews, Members of Congress may be of such asssitance.●

EL SALVADOR CERTIFICATION

HON. JOE MOAKLEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, today I rise to express my outrage at the Reagan administration's certification of El Salvador. Never in my recollection has any previous administration so dangerously combined an ignorance of history with a total misreading of current reality as have President Reagan and his advisers in their policy toward El Salvador. It is hard for me to understand how anyone who has lived through the tragedies of Vietnam and Iran could be so anxious to send American military aid to a government with such a total disrespect for human rights.

The Foreign Assistance Act of 1981, conditions certification of El Salvador on, among other things, that "the Government of El Salvador is making a concerted effort to comply with internationally recognized human rights." Clearly, in light of the reports of Roberto D'Aubuisson's (Chairman of Constituent Assembly in El Salvador) horrendous record on human rights—such a certification cannot be made in good faith. In addition, it has been reported that Mr. D'Aubuisson has begun dismantling many of the essential land and economic reforms.

Mr. Speaker, the United States should be working for and urging a negotiated settlement in El Salvador and should not be sustaining the present/extremist regime with arms. I intend to, once again, join with my colleagues in an effort to call for the suspension of military aid to El Salvador and to declare the President's certification "null and void" in that it is not in compliance with the laws set forth in the Foreign Assistance Act of 1981.

Mr. Speaker, I recently received an informative and disturbing report on human rights conditions in El Salvador since the March elections from Amnesty International. I would like to submit this report to the RECORD for the benefit of my colleagues.

AMNESTY INTERNATIONAL CONCERNS IN EL SALVADOR FOLLOWING THE ELECTIONS FOR A CONSTITUENT ASSEMBLY HELD ON MARCH 28, 1982

In the period following the elections for a constituent assembly held on March 28, 1982, reports of human rights violations involving the official security forces continue unabated. Between March 28 and May 19, 1982, for example, Amnesty International initiated appeals on behalf of 50 persons who are reported to have "disappeared" in El Salvador in the aftermath of the elections (see attachment.) In all cases, the individuals were abducted by armed men, sometimes in military uniform and in some cases in plain clothes. As far as Amnesty International is aware, none of the individuals have been acknowledged by the Salvadorian authorities to be under arrest, although in several cases witnesses are reported to have seen them being taken to National Police headquarters. Amnesty International is gravely concerned about the safety of these individuals.

It should be noted that these cases reflect only a small percentage of the volume of reports of human rights violations which have been brought to the attention of Amnesty International, but are indicative of Amnesty International's concerns that non-combatants from all sectors of society continue to be victims of human rights violations at the hands of the official military and paramilitary squads.

Based on such reports, it is the assessment of Amnesty International that there has been no improvement in the human rights situation in El Salvador in recent months.

Amnesty International has been monitoring the human rights situation in El Salvador for a number of years and has consistently drawn attention to human rights violations carried out since the government of General Carlos Humberto Romero came to power. Amnesty International has repeatedly appealed to the authorities under the succession of ruling juntas which followed the overthrow of that government in 1979 to investigate and account for the arbitrary detentions and thousands of cases of "disappearances" and probable murder. The government has systematically failed to exercise due diligence in attempting to bring those responsible to justice. In no single instance, to Amnesty International's knowledge, have the authorities issued a satisfactory response to inquiries concerning these human rights violations.

The security forces in El Salvador continue to be regularly involved in carrying out a widespread and systematic program of torture, "disappearance," and individual and mass killings of men, women and children. Testimonies received by Amnesty International from a variety of sources suggest unequivocally that all branches of the Salvadorian security forces, whether nominally military, military police, or paramilitary, have been implicated in human rights violations which have occurred on such a scale that they constitute a gross and consistent pattern of human rights abuses.

The security forces' involvement in massive human rights abuses is clearly in direct violation of internationally and regionally accepted standards for the protection of human rights as guaranteed under the Salvadorian constitution, and as set out in such documents as the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and its Optional Protocol, and the American Convention on Human Rights.

These instruments contain provisions protecting such basic rights as the right to life, the right not to be subjected to torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, and the right to a fair trial, and which prohibit discrimination on such grounds as age or political affiliation. Violations of these most basic guarantees are Amnesty International's precise concerns in El Salvador.

Amnesty International considers that where a government encourages or allows private persons or groups to commit acts which constitute abuses of human rights, that government remains responsible for such acts, by virtue of its willful failure to protect human rights to which it is committed by its own constitution, and by virtue of the regional and international conventions and standards to which it has subscribed, as well as by the rules of international law.

Further, Amnesty International is aware that these human rights violations in El Salvador are occurring at a time of civil conflict between guerrilla groups and the Salvadorian government. We are also aware of reports of crimes having been committed by non-governmental opposition forces. However, analysis of all available data suggests that the majority of the reported violations, including torture, "disappearance," and deliberate, cold-blooded killings, have been carried out by the security forces, and have been directed against people not involved in guerrilla activities. We note that all of the human rights instruments referred to above also stipulate that even in time of war governments may not derogate from their commitment not to subject anyone to arbitrary deprivation of life or torture or other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment.

Given the gravity of the human rights situation, Amnesty International has repeatedly called upon the government of El Salvador to implement the following recommendations which Amnesty International believes would contribute to the promotion and protection of human rights.

(1) To undertake measures to halt the illegal operations by security forces and other government agents so as to put an end to the indiscriminate persecution of political, religious and social leaders and members of the rural population.

With respect to organizations that monitor human rights, to assure complete autonomy in the exercise of their activities, as well as the integrity of their officials.

(2) To initiate investigations into allegations of human rights violations and to bring those responsible to justice and to make public such steps taken by the government in accordance with constitutional guarantees and international commitments.

(3) To permit the International Committee of the Red Cross full access including to places of imprisonment.

(4) To account for all prisoners and individuals listed as "disappeared" and to make public a complete list of all those detained in order to clarify the number and location of prisoners.

(5) To observe international and national standards for the protection of human rights as defined by international and regional conventions to which El Salvador is party, as well as by provisions in its own legislation.●

RESOLUTION ON CHILD LABOR REGULATIONS

HON. GEORGE MILLER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing today a joint resolution to prevent the Secretary of Labor from issuing his proposed changes in regulations concerning child labor.

Two weeks ago, the Reagan administration unveiled its first concrete plan for expanding job opportunities. That initiative had been eagerly awaited by a Nation which has seen unemployment—especially among young, out-of-school teenagers—swell to the highest levels in recent history.

The administration evidently has decided to replace the failed economic policies of "Reaganomics" with "Faginomics". Secretary of Labor Donovan announced on July 16 an unconscionable proposal to increase substantially the number of hours that 14- and 15-year-olds may work. In addition, the Secretary's proposal would open many jobs which have been considered unsafe to these junior high schoolers.

These proposals are profoundly unwise. As witnesses told the subcommittee on labor standards today, expanding the work day of these young children will have a detrimental impact on their school performance and attendance, will interfere with their family relationships, and will increase their use of alcohol, marihuana, and cigarettes.

These proposals are also profoundly insensitive to the needs of 14 million Americans who are without work, and whom this administration offers very little in the way of hope.

If the Reagan administration is truly interested in increasing job opportunities for Americans, I suggest that they look to the hiring halls and the unemployment offices, not to the classrooms and playgrounds of this Nation.

Let us be very clear that this—one of the most severe weakenings of the child labor law in nearly half a century—is not needed to accommodate the child who helps out with his family's farm chores. Children who work for their parents are not included in the current law's restrictions today.

No, these changes in child labor protections are apparently sought only by a small number of special interest businesses who prefer to save money by hiring young children who use their subminimum wage for pocket change instead of hiring a worker who needs a job to sustain himself and his family.

These regulations would allow 14- and 15-year-old children to work 24 hours a week when school is in session, and as much as 36 hours when school is in session 4 days a week or less. The proposal would lengthen the workday to as late as 9 p.m. on school nights, and 10 p.m. on weekends. These proposals are totally contrary to the law which allows child labor only under conditions which will not "interfere with their schooling" and "will not interfere with their health and well-being." Witnesses before this subcommittee this morning documented that the proposed regulations utterly contradict these statutory safeguards.

As one who has made his personal interests in Congress the well-being of our children and the health and safety of our workers, I am outraged by the insensitivity and stupidity of these proposals. And, I believe that the Congress shares this opinion.

I am today introducing a joint resolution prohibiting the Secretary of Labor from promulgating regulations to weaken the child labor law. An identical resolution will be introduced in the Senate by Senator KENNEDY.

Lastly, I would just note that this is the second proposal in the brief lifetime of the Reagan administration which abandons the most historic labor protections against our weakest and most powerless workers. Last year, the administration proposed to throw out the 40-year prohibition against domestic sweatshops. Only an outraged Congress and media halted that extraordinary unwise action which could have jeopardized not only the health and safety of hundreds of thousands of workers, but have seriously undermined the domestic textile and clothing industries.

Now the Labor Department proposes abandoning 44 years of protections against child labor. I would hope that the record of this hearing convinces Secretary Donovan to withdraw these outrageous regulations. But I will not await his action. I intend to ask the House Leadership to schedule my resolution for immediate consideration to assure that Secretary Donovan's plan to roll back the clock on child labor is not permitted to go any further.●

A TRIBUTE TO LARS MURPHY, ARTIST, PATRIOT

HON. FRANK J. GUARINI

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. GUARINI. Mr. Speaker, yesterday, Lars Murphy, a good friend of mine and the community, was buried.

Lars was a professional artist and a man who gave of his God-given talent to Jersey City, which he adopted as his home. He was known on the east coast for his specialized painting and seascapes, scenes of nature, and horses.

His community service was intensive. He conducted art classes, raised funds for charitable causes, and taught the love of country through and with his works of art to older Americans and children residing in the huge housing developments which dot my district.

Lars organized and judged coloring contests for persons of all ages, and especially enjoyed working with children. He encouraged them to enter coloring contests at Thanksgiving and Christmas-time and had the tremendous task of reviewing thousands of entries over the years.

Lars indeed showed that art transcends all ages and economic postures. His work with the children indeed did much to develop their talent, promote community pride, fight the graffiti problem so prevalent in our area, and direct the children into career opportunities. Many of the young people he taught, from 1965 to 1974, today are teachers of art or work in the field.

One of his favorite techniques was to have the children sweep an area with brooms and then help them fashion paper boxes, tin cans, and bottles into junk art which they thoroughly enjoyed doing.

Born in Salisbury, Md., Lars lived many years in New York City before moving to Jersey City in 1962. He studied at New York University, and at the Newark School of Fashion Arts.

For 15 years he supervised the annual Washington Square Art Exhibit in New York City in Greenwich Village, which has attracted hundreds of thousands of art lovers over the years.

His desire to work with children and the elderly also had him donate services for several summers to the Diocese of Paterson where he taught art.

In 1978 Paterson Mayor Lawrence Kramer received a "Lars" oil painting of the Paterson Falls as a gift from the Father Francis English Community Center. Mayor and Mrs. Kramer accepted the rendering and described it "breathtaking."

Above all, Lars loved nature which he portrayed so beautifully in his paintings of the Jersey shore; Mystic Seaport, Conn.; the Bay of Fundy in Nova Scotia; and areas in Florida and Puerto Rico.

He often told of his pride of painting, on the scene, every lighthouse on the Atlantic seaboard from Canada to the Caribbean. His specialty was the magnificent Barnegat Lighthouse which has stood like a beacon in more ways than one in New Jersey.

Lars delighted in teaching about nature and the environment and would tell the children who asked "What is the grass?" "It is the handkerchief of the Lord."

He often said that no one who has seen the grandeur of the Rocky Mountains, or Yosemite, could be an atheist.

He taught the children that earth and living things must not be abused because in the end they would take their revenge, because by exploiting them we diminish our future.

Lars often quoted Helen Keller, America's greatest advocate for the blind, who said:

That the sky is brighter than the earth means little unless the earth itself is appreciated and enjoyed. Its beauty loved gives the right to aspire to the radiance of the sunrise and the stars.

He loved to quote President Lyndon Johnson, who said "The beauty of our land is its natural resources. Its preservation is linked to the inner prosperity of the human spirit."

Lars Murphy was an early riser and loved to visit the seashore to walk the beaches, for he felt the early morning was the time for smells before our senses become contaminated with the common odors of the environment. He said, "All humans should breathe the morning air and see the full blaze of the sunrise, which will be something worth remembering no matter where you happen to be."

He believed that man has a need to escape civilization and needs retreats and refuges to recapture, even for a few fleeting hours, life's primitive conditions.

Conrad J. Vuocolo, of my staff, tells of visiting Lars at his studio, which he fashioned out of an abandoned small lumber yard on Garfield Avenue in Jersey City, where he would paint sitting on the floor in tailor-like fashion. Lars could be found working in his studio late at night painting and making special frames using the idea he originated by painting on a round canvas and encircling seascapes with thick rope which he obtained from ships and vessels in the New York Harbor for authenticity.

I enjoyed his works immensely, especially his process of layering paint in glazes to create depth of color.

He often said, "Beauty itself is the handwriting of the Lord; we should welcome it with every fair flower, beautiful sky, every creature, every fair face."

Lars loved all the arts, music, and the dance, as he, like Voltaire, felt, "All the arts are brothers each one is a light to the others."

Lars felt privileged as he believed the artistic gift was one of the rarest of all endowments, and his field was more God-like than science because while science discovers, art creates.

The words of the poet Susan Polis Schutz best describes what Lars captured on canvas:

Dancing flowers
Pounding boulders
Beating waves
Colliding clouds
Acrobatic tornado
Thunderous lightning
Fiery stars
Shining moon
Glowing rainbow
Peaceful sleep
Dancing

I have many of Lars' paintings in my home and offices which will constantly remind me of the words of Job 12:7-8:

But ask now the beasts, and they shall teach the;

and the fowls of the air, and they shall tell thee:
Or speak to the earth, and it shall teach thee:
and the fishes of the sea shall declare unto thee.

I am sure my colleagues join me in expressing condolences to his mother, Mrs. Cloatia Murphy, of Salisbury, Md., and his sisters, Conservilla and Evangeline, and to express admiration to his friends who encouraged and supported Lars in his courageous fight for life; namely, Frank Marrone, Raymond Carbone, and Anthony J. More.

Poetry has been called vocal painting—and Conrad J. Vuccolo offers his view that Lars' renderings on canvas are indeed silent poetry which make immortal all that is the best and most beautiful in our world—without question the symphony of life.

Well done, Lars Murphy. You have proven Albert Einstein's adage: "Only a life lived for others is a life worthwhile."●

● Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Speaker, during roll call vote 220 on the Stratton amendment to H.R. 6030, the Department of Defense authorizations bill for fiscal year 1983, I was at a meeting on the Senate side of the Capitol and was unavoidably detained. had I been present, I would have voted "yes."●

THE AMERICAN DEBATE

HON. WILLIAM F. CLINGER, JR.

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. CLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call attention to an opportunity for my colleagues to debate the issues of the day in the Lincoln-Douglas tradition.

At the invitation of C-SPAN, I recently appeared on "The American Debate," a unique program which permits viewers to pose questions to the debaters following an extensive discussion of a particular issue.

I debated the question of capital budgeting with Annelise Anderson, Associate Director of the Office of Management and Budget, and I think, in a civilized way, we were able to deal with the intricacies of the subject to the educational benefit of our viewers.

Clearly, the sponsors of the debate are willing to consider and encourage the discussion and debate of issues which may not be the overriding topic of the day, but nevertheless important. They are willing to consider topics which individuals in this body know and care about, possibly better than almost anyone else in this town. They are evenhanded in their selection of topics and participants.

I should like at this point to include a list of the 11 debates which have been held, indicating the subjects and the debaters. The list, I think, demonstrates what I have just said.

THE AMERICAN DEBATE

Date	Topic	Debaters
Apr. 25, 1982	Nuclear weapons freeze.	James Leach, R-Iowa; Sam Stratton, D-N.Y.

BUSINESS WEEK ARTICLE: "GAS PIPELINERS"

HON. WILLIAM E. DANNEMEYER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, on Monday, July 26, 1982, the Energy and Commerce Subcommittee on Fossil and Synthetic Fuels, of which I am a member, began a series of at least seven hearings on the natural gas market. On Monday, August 16, 1982, the subcommittee is scheduled to hear from representatives of the interstate and intrastate natural gas pipeline industries.

Both intrastate and interstate pipelines are facing serious problems. Intrastate pipelines are at a disadvantage in securing competitively priced natural gas supplies due to provisions of the Natural Gas Policy Act of 1978. Interstate pipelines are having difficulty marketing gas that is priced higher than alternative fuels, such as residual fuel oil, in part because of the isolated decontrol of deep gas. There are also differences between interstate pipelines in terms of the amount of price-controlled old gas under contract to given pipelines. This disparity creates unjustified inequities between consumers in various regions of the country.

These and other important pipeline issues are treated in an unusually insightful article which forms the cover story in the August 2, 1982, issue of Business Week. I highly recommend "Gas Pipeliners" to my colleagues for their review in advance of the upcoming hearings.

Mr. Speaker, I include the article at this point in the RECORD:

[From Business Week, Aug. 2, 1982]

GAS PIPELINERS

Soaring natural gas prices are dealing a grim, no-growth future to the $100 billion-a-year industry that carries gas from wells to electric utilities, chemical plants, and homeowners' stoves and furnaces. Protected for decades by federal regulations that kept gas prices low, the interstate gas business for the first time is facing what the oil industry has learned to cope with since the 1973 Arab oil embargo: conservation and competition with alternative fuels.

The gas industry had a taste of how scary competition could be last spring, when OPEC's prices began to crumble and some users switched to fuel oil. "All of a sudden, this absolute disaster scenario passed before the eyes of every pipeline executive in the country," says Boston energy consultant James T. Jensen. "They had visions of a massacre in the marketplace."

That massacre may already be well under way. General Motors Corp. and other large industrial gas users have installed boilers that can be switched from gas to other fuels. While the installations were prompted by fear of supply shortages in the 1970s, they now have given the consuming companies the ability to react quickly to price signals. "In many of our plants, we have dual fuel-burning capability, and we take advantage of the most competitive fuel, the one that's cheapest," says William Illuminati, GM's director of energy management. "The last five power plants we've built have coal-burning facilities, and all future plants will also. Coal is an abundant energy source, and we expect to use more of it."

The market battle already is pushing the pipeline industry into oil and gas exploration and production efforts as an alternative to the federally regulated and increasingly unattractive gas transmission business. At El Paso Co., for instance, return on capital employed in exploration and production of oil and gas last year came to a formidable 24 percent, against 11 percent for the company's pipelines and associated operations.

As prices soar, those companies with access to the remaining quantities of dirt-cheap gas scheduled to remain price-controlled indefinitely when other federal price ceilings end in 1985 will have a big competitive edge over others. This disparity may force Washington into a drastic overhaul of the patchwork pattern of regulating production and transportation of the fuel that supplies one-quarter of the nation's energy needs. "The system is breaking down," says Jack Malvey, assistant vice-president of Moody's Investors Services Inc. "No one knows where this whole thing will shake out."

Only a few years ago, the industry's main worry was how it would find sufficient reserves to meet future demand as long as the law continued to depress gas prices and exploration. But, prompted by fears of shortages severe enough to leave schoolchildren freezing and factories idle, Congress in 1978 enacted the Natural Gas Policy Act (NGPA). The law sought to erase an already wide gap between oil and gas prices, and it set off a rush for new gas supplies.

The price surge, however, has led many industrial gas users and electric utilities to shop elsewhere for energy, even though the outlook for adequate gas supply has improved significantly. With the recession also taking a bite out of demand, the amount of natural gas available to the nation's pipeline network has exceeded the 20 trillion cu. ft. consumed in the U.S. annually for the fourth straight year. This gas "bubble," until recently, was dismissed by most industry executives as only the temporary result of recession and of federal rules discouraging gas use by utilities and industries. Yet it may be far more long-lasting—and financially dangerous.

UNENFORCEABLE CONTRACTS

"There is this nagging feeling that [the gas bubble] may never go away," says Joel F. Zipp, a Washington attorney representing several pipeline companies. Yet because of terms included in many gas contracts for the past 15 years, a number of pipelines now are being forced to pay for gas that they have contracted to buy from producers but that they cannot resell to price-shocked utilities and industries. Thus, says Robert G. Uhler, a vice-president at National Economic Research Associates (NERA), the pipelines' "problem has gone from one of securing supply to one of unloading it. It's almost as simple as that."

Transco Energy Co., in fact, says it faces potential liabilities of "several hundred million dollars by the end of 1983" at its High Island gathering system in the Gulf of Mexico. Although Transco will not elaborate, reliable pipeline industry sources say the company's liability could reach $450 million. Transco maintains that many of its "take or pay" contracts are unenforceable, and it is making producers take legal action to prove otherwise. Meanwhile, it is paying only for the gas it takes, a move being closely watched by other pipeline operators. Says Arlon R. Tussing, an economist and industry consultant in Seattle: "Within a few years, the most fashionable slogan in the gas industry may be 'I can't take, and I won't pay, so sue me,'"

Federal rules have helped depress demand. Some gas customers, under what is known as the "incremental pricing" provision of the NGPA, are forced to pay higher prices than homeowners or electric utilities when they want to increase their use of gas. The regulation has helped price gas out of the market for some users, cutting into pipeline and distributor sales and earnings, and has given the industry a taste of what might be even more severe pressures ahead as alternative fuels begin attracting unrestricted gas users. A large number of contracts between gas producers and pipelines also contain provisions that could raise gas prices to uncompetitive levels after Jan. 1, 1985, the day many wellhead controls expire under the NGPA. "For a period of time—perhaps six months, perhaps longer—there will be a severe and probably painful disequilibrium in the markets," attorney Zipp says. "Some pipelines will suffer more than others, of course, but probably none will be totally free of the problem."

That process could be hastened if decontrol is given a boost. After more than a year of wrangling, it still is not clear whether Congress or the Reagan Administration will try to speed the pace of price decontrol, and no action is foreseen until after the fall elections. Yet the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission (FERC), which regulates the pipeline segment of the gas industry, remains interested in raising wellhead prices through administrative action. At the same time, however, state regulators are coming under increasing pressure from consumers to resist the automatic pass-along of soaring gas prices.

Since 1954, when the Supreme Court ruled that the price of gas could be regulated at the wellhead, gas prices have been lower, on a Btu-equivalent basis, than the fuels it competes with in residential, industrial, and commercial markets. But passage of the 1978 natural gas law set in motion a painful transition. In 1977 the wellhead price of 1,000 cu. ft. (Mcf) of gas was just half that of an equivalent amount of domestic crude. The NGPA was designed to bring gas prices in line with the higher oil prices resulting from the 1973 Arab embargo, but not the substantially higher level prevailing after the Iranian oil cutoff of 1979. However, falling oil prices and swiftly rising gas prices have brought gas into competition with petroleum much sooner than expected.

Gas is classified into a myriad of categories that can be divided into three basic groups. "Old gas," or reserves contracted for prior to April, 1977, is now destined to stay under price controls indefinitely, although its price will continue to be adjusted to account for inflation. Reserves discovered after April, 1977, are known as "new gas." Their prices have been allowed to rise gradually and will be deregulated in 1985. The last major category is "high-cost," that found below 15,000 ft. or in certain unusual geological formations.

The higher prices for new and high-cost gas were intended to spur exploration and arrest a deep and steady decline in U.S. gas reserves that had begun in 1967. One result: In 1981, according to preliminary reports, drilling added as much gas to U.S. reserves as was withdrawn. Some analysts believe that much more gas remains to be discovered in the lower 48 states and that decontrol of new gas less than two years hence will spur a new exploration surge. Coupled with increased exports from Canada expected later in the decade and small amounts of synthetic gas from coal, the U.S. would seem to have ample supplies through the 1980s.

The comfortable supply outlook is in sharp contrast to the situation of less than a decade ago, when 10 transmission companies were drawn into involvement with the $40 billion Alaska gas pipeline, a project that is now unlikely to proceed because it would deliver gas too costly to attract purchasers. American Natural Resources Co., meanwhile, is building a $2.4 billion coal gasification plant in North Dakota whose future market is risky enough to require federal loan guarantees. Once-promising foreign liquefied natural gas ventures are looking increasingly dim. El Paso last year wrote off a $365 million loss on its Algerian LNG project after a protracted dispute with Algeria over high export prices, and Panhandle Eastern Corp.'s $508 million investment in a separate Algerian LNG venture is threatened by a similar problem.

Yet some major investments in gas ventures continue. Work began this spring on the Trailblazer Pipeline System, a $550 million project backed by five transmission companies that will provide a link between the extensive Rocky Mountain Overthrust Belt gas fields of Utah and Wyoming and markets in the Midwest and East. Although the Overthrust Belt remains an important long-term source of gas, Trailblazer this fall will begin delivering as much as 1.6 billion cu. ft. per day of gas into an already glutted system.

PRICED OUT OF THE MARKET

Local utilities also seemed to be immune to price concerns in the 1970s. In fact, with a fear of shortages looming, many states prevented utilities from hooking up new customers. "The industry never had to worry much about selling [to utilities]," says Charles Eberst, executive vice-president for marketing, rates, and planning at MidCon Corp.'s Natural Gas Pipeline Co. Now, however, "what the industry faces is a marketing problem," says William T. McCormick Jr., president of Michigan Wisconsin Pipe Line Co.

Some pipelines are already learning just how high prices will depress demand. Michigan Wisconsin and Transco—each a major pipeline serving the East Coast and the Midwest—acknowledged in May that the unregulated gas from deep formations that they had been buying at as much as $10 per Mcf, the Btu equivalent of $58-per-bbl. oil, could no longer be sold. They told producers that for the foreseeable future, neither would pay more than $5 to $6 per Mcf for its deep gas. Sonat Inc.'s Southern Natural Gas Co. subsidiary made a similar move a month later.

The announcements reverberated through the booming gas fields of Louisiana and Oklahoma. Deep gas wells often tap into unusually large reservoirs, a key selling point to pipelines looking for long-lived reserves. But "we're seeing a lot less interest in the deep gas wells [because] there's a lot of deep gas drilling going on that just won't fly at $5 [per Mcf]," says E. L. Williamson, president of Louisiana Land & Exploration Co., a New Orleans-based oil and gas producer.

The average wellhead price of gas in February, the most recent month for which Energy Dept. statistics are available, was about $2.40 per Mcf. But every interstate pipeline has a portion of its supplies under contract with producers at federally controlled prices as low as 25¢ per Mcf—just above the 1973 national average wellhead price of 22¢ per Mcf. This "old" gas has permitted pipelines to buy some higher-priced deep gas and still maintain an average price below that of competing fuels. But the first-quarter decline in oil prices left Transco and Michigan Wisconsin Pipe Line with an average selling price higher than that of fuel oil—prompting some customers to switch.

Two other pipelines aggressively bought expensive deep gas, only to have the purchases come back to haunt them. Southern Natural has a troublesome 14 percent of its contracted gas volume with producers at an average price of $8.04 per Mcf. United Energy Resources Inc.'s United Gas Pipe Line Co. relies on deep gas for 9 percent of its needs. More than half of the customers served by United pipelines are industrial plants that can easily convert to other fuels.

Barring another major runup in world oil prices, the U.S. energy market will be even more competitive as gas price controls are gradually lifted. Because the interstate pipeline companies and local gas utilities are tightly regulated, wild earnings swings are unlikely. But through the rest of the 1980s, many will have a hard time growing. Most forecasters say that even when the economy turns around, gas consumption will at best stay flat through the decade. The pace of oil-to-gas conversions has slowed dramatically in recent months, and since 1972, gas consumption per capita in the residential market has declined 15 percent.

The electric utility and industrial sectors are the No. 1 market for gas. There, gas competes head-on with residual fuel oil and coal, and most forecasts indicate that gas demand will keep dropping. Data Resources Inc. projects utility gas demand will fall 14 percent, to 3.3 trillion cu. ft. per year, by the end of the decade. Federal law prohibits the construction of industrial or utility boilers that can burn only gas—a remnant of the shortage-plagued 1970s—but few would be built anyway because coal is plentiful and cheap relative to gas. "It's clear the gas business in the 1980s is going to be constrained by markets, not supply," says Michigan Wisconsin's McCormick.

The implications of that are foreboding. Under laws dating to 1938, the federal government every three years sets rates for interstate gas transmission companies sufficient to cover their costs of purchased gas plus a return on their investments in pipelines and other facilities. Between major tariff decisions, pipelines file requests every 6 or 12 months seeking to adjust rates to reflect changes in gas costs. A General Accounting Office study shows that the adjustments made little difference before passage of the 1978 natural gas law because wellhead prices were so tightly controlled. Between 1976 and 1982, however, the portion of an average user's bill taken up by the wellhead cost of gas shot up from 31 percent to 48 percent for homeowners and from 56 percent to 74 percent for electric utilities, according to Energy Dept. statistics. As a result, says the GAO, more rate-adjustment filings, "specifically those containing deregulated gas, are being challenged by outside parties."

In addition, when gas sales volumes decline, pipelines and distributors are allowed to seek general rate increases to make up for lost revenues. But in a declining market, "you end up running like hell just to stay in place," says on FERC official "You're constantly constantly caught between declining sales levels and the regulatory lag."

Transco President Kenneth L. Lay believes future pipeline growth will depend more heavily on "making our pricing mechanism much more responsive to market conditions. Those pipelines that can take the gas and deliver it the cheapest are going to come out on top." But under the NGPA, only 40 percent of today's gas reserves are going to be decontrolled at the beginning of 1985. Old gas makes up the remaining 60 percent, and the more cheap gas a pipeline has under contract, the lower its average selling price will be.

According to an Energy Dept. Survey, 43 percent of the gas Transco buys from producers is old. But compared with other major pipelines, Transco is coming up short. Tenneco Inc.'s Tennessee gas Transmission Co. can boast that 71 percent of its gas under contract is in the old-gas category. And Texas Eastern Corp.'s Texas Eastern Transmission Co. has a formidable 79 percent of its gas at an average price of just 86¢ per Mcf. That cushion of old gas provides it with a powerful advantage over other pipelines and alternative forms of energy. But pipeline systems lacking a significant old-gas cushion—and, by extension, the local distribution companies they supply—could face a substantial sales decline by 1985 or earlier even if oil prices rise moderately.

EQUAL FOOTING?

Three pipeline systems—Consolidated, Columbia, and United Gas—all have less than 40 percent of their gas under contract in the old category, according to the Energy survey. J. R. Templeton, senior vice-president of United, which wholesales gas primarily in the Southeast and to other pipeline companies, says, "We'd be better off if they'd decontrol all gas right now," putting all pipelines on an equal footing.

That is unlikely to happen. But some gas experts believe that by 1985, many of the existing contracts between producers and pipeline companies will have been renegotiated to reflect the new demand outlook. And contract revisions of an even more drastic nature may result.

In the 1960s and 1970s, pipelines accepted terms that are now proving nettlesome. Chief among these, pipeline executives say, are contracts with producers that contain provisions for automatic price increases on the date of decontrol in 1985. The Energy Dept. says these contract terms alone could push average wellhead gas prices up 88¢ per Mcf, and the anticipated price runup is the main reason why pipelines have opposed accelerated decontrol. But with gas already at prices approaching those of competing fuels, the notion of any automatic price increase in 1985 worries the pipelines. "If you let the price [of gas] go to 110 percent of fuel oil, you've got a choice of either going bankrupt or defaulting on the contracts. You can't take the gas without losing a hell of a lot of market share," says Tennessee Gas Transmission President Jack H. Ray.

The Interstate Natural Gas Assn., a lobbying group, has proposed a complete revision of the NGPA. But producers will test the legality of any tampering with contract terms, and pipelines may decide to walk away from contracts if prices suddenly soar, producing a blizzard of lawsuits or even congressional action. "If it ever got to the 11th hour, Congress would slap something together in a hurry, probably an extension of controls," says one gas industry attorney. "No one wants that to happen, but that's where any consensus ends."

CASH MACHINES

Even at today's rates, local gas distributors are the first to bear the brunt of any decline in gas demand. Many now argue that clear market signals are not transmitted back to gas producers quickly enough. "We bear all the marketing risk," says Joseph P. Thomas, executive vice-president of Chicago-based Peoples Gas Light & Coke Co., the nation's largest distributor.

Under present FERC rate structures, local gas utilities simply do not know what price its pipeline supplier is paying producers at the wellhead. This information is crucial in determining whether gas will be competitive. But Thomas says his cost of gas is obscured because in a pipeline's tariff—what the distributor pays the pipeline—gas prices are mixed in with other costs. MidCon Corp.'s Natural Gas Pipeline Co.—Peoples' supplier—and Panhandle Eastern have asked FERC, in effect, to change the way pipeline tariffs are structured so that the cost of gas is made clearly visible. Under such a system, they argue, it will be much easier to make accurate assessments of whether gas will be competitive. "The free-market segment of the industry, the producers, should bear the risk that their commodity may be unmarketable above a certain price," Thomas says.

No matter what FERC—or Congress—does with pricing, gas companies are likely to "continue to put their eggs in other baskets," using regulated pipelines as cash machines to finance more lucrative endeavors, says Moody's Malvey. That is not a new tactic. But Malvey believes it may be employed in coming years "with a vengeance."

Tenneco, by far the largest pipeline operator, is the prime example of this strategy (BW—Nov. 23). Oil and gas exploration and production's share of pretax operating income skyrocketed to 58 percent in 1981 from 17 percent a decade before, while gas transmission's share fell to 17 percent from 43 percent. Transco, meanwhile, invested $1.4 billion in oil and gas exploration and production from 1972 to 1981; this year, its exploration and production budget will come to $382 million. The push has given it 530 billion cu. ft. of reserves, against none at all in 1973, and 25 percent of Transco's interstate pipeline deliveries now come from its own wells. This lets Transco capture for itself a hefty share of the gas profits that previously went to other producers. Transco's pretax oil and gas production earnings skyrocketed to $118.5 million in 1981 from $4.9 million two years earlier.

"Earnings-per-share growth will come more and more from exploration," says Kurt H. Wulff, an energy analyst with Donaldson, Lufkin & Jenrette Inc. But pipelines that have expanded back into oil and gas can sometimes run into trouble. The GAO study notes that FERC has received complaints alleging that some pipelines are paying their own production divisions prices for decontrolled gas in excess of those paid to unaffiliated producers. Transco Exploration Co., an aggressive producer of decontrolled deep gas, had another sort of problem. It was one of the producers notified by another Transco unit, Transcontinental Gas Pipe Line Corp., that its high-priced gas was simply unacceptable to the transmission unit.

TROUBLE SPOTS

Geography will also present problems for the pipelines. With miles of pipe buried in the ground, they cannot move out of a depressed market. Pipelines serving economically distressed areas are already hurting, and unless the economy rebounds, boosting energy demand in the Midwest, Northeast, and Southeast, their situation will get worse as gas prices continue to climb. Areas of the nation served by pipelines with large amounts of cheap, controlled gas will suffer less than others. Thus, the result of decontrol under the NGPA will be "massive inequities involving significant transfers of wealth even among consuming regions," says NERA's Uhler.

MidCon's Natural Gas Pipleine, which delivers gas primarily in Illinois, admits it is overhauling its marketing strategy as demand shrinks. "We need to get our markets expanded into nontraditional areas," Vice-President Eberst says, including the lucrative Texas and Louisiana industrial belt primarily served by intrastate pipelines. "The Sunbelt will continue growing as an industrial area," Eberst says. El Paso, meanwhile, has 90 percent of its gas going to residential and commercial customers in Southern California. Even after writing off its Algerian LNG project, El Paso believes it will not feel the market pressure other pipelines will during the decade. "California should continue to be good to us," says Edward G. Najaiko, an El Paso senior vice-president.

Panhandle Eastern, a Houston-based company with two major pipelines bringing gas from the Southwest to Michigan and other portions of the recession-wracked industrial Midwest, saw its profits in gas transmission plunge 20 percent in the first quarter from those of a year earlier as total gas sales fell from 310 billion cu. ft. to 288 billion cu. ft.

Once gas prices are decontrolled and have settled—most experts look for a wellhead price of about 80% of the price of residual fuel oil on a Btu-equivalent basis—the next big battle in the industry may be over whether the pipelines should continue to be regulated as utilities. Consultant Tussing says: "Once price becomes the balancing factor between supply and demand and the principal allocator of gas among consumers, little of the remaining federal regulatory apparatus makes sense."

Gas companies will be competing for customers in consuming regions and for supplies at the wellhead. "Without the guaranteed rate of return they now get from regulators, pipelines will have to hustle to buy gas and hustle to sell gas" more aggressively than ever, benefiting consumers, Tussing adds. Although some gas industry experts question whether substantial gains in efficiency would result from deregulation of pipelines, the proposal is gathering steam.

"That's what the issue will be in 10 years," one pipeline executive says. But first, the gas industry must deal with problems presented when the NGPA expires. "When you get a close substitute [in terms of price], any industry is going to face some stiff competition. The problem with the gas industry is that they've never had to deal with that before," says NERA's Uhler. And the industry is already realizing it will not come through the transition process without scars. "We knew there was going to be some pain and suffering," says Jack E. Earnest, senior vice-president and general counsel at Texas Eastern. "Now we've just got to minimize the trauma." ●

VOTE "NO" ON LIMITS TO CONTRACTING OUT

HON. BERKLEY BEDELL

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Speaker, late in the day on Tuesday, as we rushed to adjourn, the Fazio amendment was added to H.R. 6030, thus limiting the ability of the Department of Defense to contract out to the private sector for goods and services. This was done without debate and without a record vote.

When we rise from the Committee of the Whole, I intend to seek a record vote on the Fazio amendment. That provision will cost taxpayers millions of dollars, and it should be defeated.

The Fazio amendment prevents the Defense Department from seeking the most cost-effective sources for civilian goods and services. It even prevents the Department from doing cost-effectiveness studies. Both the Secretary of Defense and the Director of the Office of Management and Budget say that restrictions on contracting out will cost taxpayers millions of dollars in lost opportunities for savings.

Defeat of the Fazio amendment is sought by all elements of the small business community. A "no" vote will show that we are concerned about fostering competition and improving Government efficiency.

At this point in the RECORD, Mr. Speaker, I wish to insert two items. The first is the text of the "Dear Colleague" letter ANDY IRELAND and I sent to all Members of the House this afternoon. The second is a copy of the letter I received today from the National Federation of Independent Business.

The letters follow:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., July 28, 1982.

URGENT—FLOOR ACTION TODAY

DEAR COLLEAGUE: When H.R. 6030 is reported from the Committee of the Whole House, we intend to seek a record vote on the Fazio amendment which restricts the Defense Department's ability to use civilian contractors for non-military activities. This amendment was added to the Defense authorization bill late last night, without a vote, during the rush to adjourn.

We urge you to join us in voting against the Fazio amendment. It hinders efforts to control costs at the Pentagon and will cost taxpayers millions of dollars in needless expenditures.

The Secretary of Defense recently wrote: "By subjecting about 400 of our commercial activities to the beneficial pressure of open competition in recent years, we have achieved annual savings of $84 million, made 12,000 military and civilian manpower authorizations available for other defense needs, and created nearly that many new jobs in the private sector. There are many more activities to be reviewed with great potential for more savings."

David Stockman, director of the Office of Management and Budget, yesterday said this about contracting out:

"(M)any of these commercial and industrial activities should be reviewed to determine the most economical way to obtain these goods and services. . . . Any restrictions in the Defense Authorization bill, H.R. 6030, on contracting out for goods and services would seriously impact . . . efforts to reduce the deficit and inhibit our aggressive program to eliminate waste and inefficiencies."

We ask you to join us in defeating the Fazio amendment. This vote is crucial to the small business community.

Among those joining us in seeking a "NO" vote on the Fazio amendment are the Defense Department, OMB, the National Federation of Independent Business, Small Business United, the American Consulting Engineers Council, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, and taxpayers who are concerned about reducing government waste and inefficiency.

Sincerely,

ANDY IRELAND,
BERKLEY BEDELL.

NATIONAL FEDERATION OF INDEPENDENT BUSINESS,
Washington, D.C., July 28, 1982.

Hon. BERKLEY BEDELL,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR BERKLEY: Since I am aware of your interest in contracting-out and in using taxpayer dollars wisely, I believe you share NFIB's concern over last night's passage of Congressman Vic Fazio's amendment to the DOD Authorization Bill, H.R. 6030.

As you now realize, Congressman Fazio's amendment not only adds $567 million for direct hiring of additional civilian employees, it prohibits money to be spent for cost comparison studies which are necessary for future contracting-out. This Amendment strikes at the very heart of OMB Circular A-76 and at every effort to spend Federal dollars more cost-effectively. It will, in effect, eliminate any new contracting-out to the private sector over the next two years.

A March, 1981, GAO report clearly states that there are 11,000 commercial or industrial activities at an estimated cost (to the taxpayers) of $19 billion annually being performed by the government that can be provided more cheaply and more effectively by the private sector. At this time when deficits and Federal spending are so much on the minds of the American people, it seems inconsistent for the House to put itself on the record against achieving such savings.

Inasmuch as this Amendment passed by a voice vote late in the evening's debate, while quite a few Members were absent from the House Floor, we feel certain that many of your colleagues are also distressed over the inclusion of the Fazio language in the Bill. They, like you, would probably like the opportunity to be recorded on this blantantly anti-small business and anti-private sector amendment.

In 1980, 67% of NFIB's membership indicated that they felt the government should be required to contract-out to the private sector for goods and services wherever it is cost-effective. Mr. Fazio's Amendment would stop in its tracks DOD's efforts to determine who could do the job better at the lowest cost. And, it is interesting to note that there is a growing body of statistics that indicate that cost comparison studies themselves have had the highly desirable effect of increasing government efficiency and cutting costs.

We support your desire to have a recorded vote on this issue and support your efforts. NFIB opposes the Fazio Amendment and we are confident that there are many Members who share our concern about the loss of business and the increased tax burden caused by government competition to small business. We urge you and your colleagues to vote against the Fazio Amendment.

Good luck and best wishes.

Sincerely,

JAMES D. "MIKE" MCKEVITT,
Director of Federal Legislation.●

WATT STRIKES OUT AGAIN

HON. JERRY M. PATTERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Interior Committee, I am a veteran of several struggles against Secretary of Interior James Watt's strange plans for our environment. He has proved to have strange ideas about people, too. Once Secretary Watt informed us that there were two kinds of people in the United States: liberals and Americans.

Now he seems to have added more distinctions. There are liberal Jews (who he believes are concerned primarily with the well-being of Israel) and nonliberal, non-Jewish Americans (who he believes are concerned primarily with the well-being of the United States). Presumably, this still leaves liberal non-Jews, who are apparently unconcerned with the well-being of anything except whales and pristine forests. What Mr. Watt really sees, of course, are two kinds of people—those who agree with him and those who do not.

As one who does not agree with Secretary Watt, with the publication of Secretary Watt's recent venture into foreign policy, I was again offended by the notion that only Secretary Watt's grim vision of the future can produce greater energy independence for the United States. There are still those of us who believe the strong evidence that conservation and nonpolluting, alternate energy sources are better ways to address our energy needs than Mr. Watt's dig-it-up-and-burn-it strategy.

I am more offended and frightened, however, by the bigotry inherent in the Secretary's apparent belief that Jewish Americans have more loyalty to Israel than to the United States. It reminds me of the days when anti-Catholics said that if we elected John F. Kennedy to be President, he would "take orders from the Pope in Rome, not the American people." Mr. Watt, if you're reading this, I want you to know we're all Americans first and appealing to groups of us through foreign embassies isn't going to sell your program any better than appealing to us directly has. Maybe the problem is with your program and not with us.●

R. CHRISTOPHER WHALEN ON THE SOVIET MILITARY THREAT FROM CUBA

HON. JACK F. KEMP

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, there is cause for alarm over the massive Soviet military buildup that has been taking place in Cuba. Twenty years after the Cuban missile crisis we find ourselves faced with a Cuban arsenal even more potent than the one that President Kennedy had to deal with in 1962.

Since 1962, the Soviets have gradually increased their military capability in Cuba, augmenting and upgrading it incrementally to avoid confrontation with the United States. For the most part, we have remained silent.

In an excellent article in Human Events, Chris Whalen describes how this happened and what it means for the future of U.S. foreign policy. Mr. Whalen, a former research assistant at the Heritage Foundation, is currently a legislative analyst with the House Republican Conference and one of the most promising and able young writers in Washington, D.C.

Mr. Whalen writes:

Since 1962 and especially since 1970, the U.S. has become unilaterally attached to the illusion of "stability" in the triangular American-Soviet-Cuban relationship, while the Soviets have steadily overturned all bilaterial "understandings."

I recommend his article to all of my colleagues.

[From the Human Events, July 24, 1982]

THE SOVIET MILITARY THREAT FROM CUBA

(By R. Christopher Whalen)

Over the past decade, the Soviet Union has reintroduced offensive weapons into Cuba, in direct violation of the 1962 agreement prohibiting their presence. these weapons are based both in and around Cuba, on planes, ships and missiles, and are operated today by the Soviet armed forces.

Using an incremental approach designed to avoid another confrontation with the United States, Moscow has slowly increased its military capability in Cuba to a level far in excess of the forces which provoked the 1962 missile crisis. The present level of Soviet activities in Cuba places the basic foundation of U.S. foreign policy—a policy which assumes peace and tranquility at home—in grave danger.

The return of the Soviet military to Cuba began in 1969, at sea, through visits by naval groups to the island. The Soviets escalated slowly, using older surface combatants, then gradually upgraded the mix to include missile-carrying cruisers and nuclear submarines.

In 1970 the Soviets finished the first phase of their buildup by completing the submarine base at Cienfuegos, an event which provoked a delayed American response and resulted in the 1970 "agreement" prohibiting the presence or servicing of nuclear submarines. The Soviets violated this "agreement" only six months later by sending a November-class nuclear attack submarine in February 1971, and later in May 1971 with an Echo II-class cruise missile submarine.

Washington did not respond to this blatant challenge, nor to the arrival of the other weapons systems—including nuclear-capable ships and bombers, Mig-27 aircraft, SA-6 missiles, and chemical weapons—which have since been introduced. Indeed, with the exception of the pathetic furor over the "combat brigade," America's leaders remained silent as the Kremlin rebuilt its military strength in Cuba.

The Soviets operate nearly 100 "Cuban" Mig-23 and 27 aircraft, the latter of which is an efficient, nuclear-capable attack plane. These planes are flown by Soviet and Eastern-bloc personnel and are deployed in hardened bunkers to preclude a preemptive American strike. Cuban-based Mig-27 aircraft would strike targets in Georgia, and, on a one-way flight, a Mig-27 could reach as far as Washington.

Moscow operates TU-95D "Bear" bombers from bases in Cuba on a rotational basis between the Caribbean and the Kola peninsula, patrolling the Atlantic coast of the United States and testing the response of U.S. air defenses by violating American airspace.

In addition, several airfields have been completed which are capable of handling the Soviet "Backfire" bomber; certain defense sources expect the Soviets to test the Reagan Administration soon by introducing one or two of these strategic bombers onto the island. From bases in Cuba a Backfire bomber can strike at targets in the United States and easily return to the Soviet Union.

Of greater significance than the Soviet-controlled combat aircraft is the free use of Cuba by the Soviets as a base of operations for their naval forces, including nuclear and conventional submarines. The Kremlin regularly deploys naval squadrons in the Caribbean and along the coast of the U.S. after resupply in Cuba. More importantly, since the early '70s the Soviets have maintained facilities to service and overhaul nuclear warheads carried by ballistic submarines.

At Cienfuegos there are extensive pier facilities for servicing and loading submarines, a floating depository for nuclear reactor waste, and a handling area for naval missiles.

Cienfuegos is linked by rail to a complex known as Punta Movida, where intelligence reports indicate nuclear warheads are serviced and stored; nuclear weapons for the Mig-27 could also be housed there. The area is off-limits to all Cubans and is guarded by the famous "combat brigade," in reality a KGB security unit previously assigned to guard Warsaw Pact nuclear stockpiles in Eastern Europe. Its combat configuration is purely superficial, a facade maintained by occasional manueuvers with the Cuban army. In addition to the security of the nuclear facility at Punta Movida, the "combat brigade" also is responsible for guarding a large Soviet communications facility southwest of Havana.

The importance of a Soviet submarine base in Cuba cannot be overemphiasized. Moscow's large submarine force has in the past been handicapped by limited access to the major ocean areas of the world. However, the presence of a base in Cuba extends the operational range of the Soviet attack fleet, brings their nuclear-capable ballistic and cruise missile boats within easy striking range of the mainland U.S., and greatly extends their time on-station.

How great is the threat from Cuba? Adm. Harry D. Train II, commander-in-chief of the Atlantic Fleet, said in a May 5, 1982, memo that a minimum of two carrier battle groups would be required "to contend early on with a Cuban threat." An ominous statement from the man charged with securing the Atlantic for American convoys to Europe, especially if one remembers that the same carriers we would use against Cuba are committed to the defense of Europe. The problem is clear: We have allowed the Soviets to place a trip wire at our doorstep.

Soviet aircraft, surface vessels and submarines operating from Cuban bases constitute a grave threat, both to ourselves and our weaker neighbors. The Soviet forces in and around Cuba, combined with Cuban-controlled missile and torpedo craft, comprise a potent sea-air military capability which can deny American ships along the Gulf coast access to the Atlantic.

The United States cannot afford to tolerate a hostile military presence in Cuba if we are serious about defending Europe, the Middle East, or anywhere else. How effective would our response be if at the opening of hostilities across the Atlantic a large part of our naval and air forces were busy defending against a Soviet threat from Cuba rather than supporting Europe's flank?

Roughly 14 years ago the Cuban revolution ended and a new period of foreign domination began—domination by the Soviet Union. Castro struck a deal late in 1968, transforming Cuba into a Socialist police state, a haven for terrorists and revolutionaries, and most importantly, a valuable base of operations for the Soviet armed forces. Soviet military activities in Cuba today threaten U.S. security and continue to grow despite previous Soviet-American agreements prohibiting the placement of "offensive weapons" in Cuba—agreements made in return for an American promise not to attack the island.

Since 1962, and especially since 1970, the U.S. has become unilaterally attached to the illusion of "stability" in the triangular American-Soviet-Cuban relationship, while the Soviets have steadily overturned all bilateral "understandings." The evolving Soviet-Cuban military relationship is a classic example of how Moscow uses words and time to achieve long-term objectives. They have increased the scale of their activities in Cuba slowly, with great sensitivity to any American response, and each time American reacted the Soviets quickly "submitted" to negotiations, and then continued to expand their military capability despite these same agreements.●

FLOOD CONTROL NEEDED FOR TOWN BROOK

HON. BRIAN J. DONNELLY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, it has become increasingly fashionable in this House and in the press to refer to all public works projects, and especially water projects, as "pork barrel" projects. This may make good headlines, but such demagogery is responsible for the failure to enact any serious, comprehensive water policy for the last several Congresses.

I urge my colleagues to pay attention to the following editorial published in the July 26, 1982, edition of the Patriot Ledger, Quincy, Mass. The editorial persuasively demonstrates the need for Federal flood control assistance to protect a vital part of a community. It also demonstrates the need for us to proceed according to the schedule of commitments made by the Federal Government over the last dozen years.

I hope reporters, editors, and my colleagues will take a close look at the merits of various projects such as this before yielding to the temptation to dismiss them one and all as needless, wasteful, "pork barrel" legislation.

[From the Patriot Ledger, Quincy, Mass., July 26, 1982]

TOWN BROOK

A decade ago, many Quincy and Braintree residents actively opposed plans for a new MBTA station in South Quincy and a huge new interchange on Route 3 to serve the T facility and improve access to Quincy Center.

Opposition focused on two concerns raised by the massive Federal-State projects: more traffic and the potential for more flooding in neighborhoods already flood prone.

But the residents were assured by transportation officials at the federal public hearings that the station and ramp projects would soon be followed by major flood control work along the source of the flood waters—Town Brook. And residents were assured at those federal hearings and in a federal environmental impact study that a planned extension of Upland Road (now Burgin Parkway) between Quincy Center and the new Route 3 ramps would prevent residential streets from being swamped in traffic.

The new Quincy Adams T station in South Quincy is just about complete; the Route 3 interchange is well along in construction. But the outlook for the promised flood control work is uncertain and as a result, there is a question whether the promised Burgin Parkway extension will be built any time soon.

U.S. Representative Brian J. Donnelly, of Dorchester, testified before a House public works subcommittee last week on behalf of the Town Brook project. But he is not optimistic. The money for the work is contained in what's consider a pork barrel bill that faces an uphill fight in Congress and an almost certain presidential veto.

As now planned, the Town Brook work would cost about $21 million; the biggest expense would be for a tunnel to carry overflow from the brook deep under Quincy Center toward Town River. The project is expensive, but after a dozen years of study and revisions, the Army Corps of Engineers is convinced it's worth building because of the millions of dollars it would save in property damage.

As part of the project, the MDC is committed to spend $5 million to install culverts to handle the overflow in the stretch from the Quincy Adams station to the Quincy Center tunnel. Those culverts would go under the planned Burgin Parkway extension.

It's only logical that plans call for installing the culverts before the road is built, rather than tearing up the pavement at some later date. But with the federal flood control project up in the air, it's difficult to see how the MDC or the Burgin Parkway extension can move ahead.

Unless federal money is approved, neighborhoods near the new T station and interchange face continued threats of floods and a new threat of being inundated by traffic when the interchange opens. The traffic troubles could be severe enough for Quincy and Braintree residents and officials to go to court to block the opening of the new station and ramps if the promised extension of Burgin Parkway remains on hold.

But it should not take court action to get federal and state officials to stand behind promises made to the public. Governor King and the State's congressional delegation should go all-out to make sure those promises are kept now. Town Brook is not a pork-barrel project, and Washington should not treat it like one.●

REFUSENIK STELLA GOLDBERG AND SOVIET EMIGRATION POLICIES

HON. DENNIS M. HERTEL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. HERTEL. Mr. Speaker, the attitudes and practices of the Soviet authorities continue to bewilder all observers of Soviet emigration policy. Today, I wish to call my colleagues' attention to the continuing harassment of Jewish refuseniks and the Soviets' calculated campaign to strangle the vitality of their own Jewish community.

Soviet Jews ask to leave the Soviet Union because of the rampant and vicious anti-Semitism fostered by the government apparatus. The Soviet Government continues to violate the Helsinki Agreement in the most blatant ways by denying the Jewish community linguistic, cultural, and religious rights, including the right to study and teach Hebrew. For Soviet Jews the Diaspora continues; they are the only major ethnic group in the Soviet Union to be denied a territory which would offer some support to their religious, national, and linguistic heritage. The Government itself, not content with subtle discrimination against it's Jewish citizens, engages in official anti-Semitic campaigns through the mass media. Statements such as the following are common:

Judaism is harmful to the Jewish believer because this belief sets him apart from other people, inculcates in him hostility towards other men and makes him oppose the world around him . . . Judaism is contrary to our communist morality, the aims of our society and the progress of modern life." (Radio Minsk, Program for Believers and Non-Believers, May 4, 1975)

The Zionists, fulfilling the role of shock troops of imperialism, strive to shake the foundations of the socialist multinational state, to set the peoples of the USSR against one another, and to sow the seeds of nationalism, chauvinism and antisemitism. And, on the other hand, to undermine the faith in the democratic character of the USSR in world public opinion." (Article in Moscow edition of Pravda, December 2, 1978)

"If it (the Torah) is considered from the standpoint of modern civilization and communist morality, it proves to be an unsurpassed text-book of bloodthirstiness, hypocrisy, treachery, perfidy and moral degeneracy—all the basest human qualities. (Book: Invasion Without Arms, Moscow, 1977, p. 40)

It is not surprising that Soviet Jews finally choose to leave a country which makes it very plain that it does not want them. But a cruel hoax results when a Soviet Jew applies to emigrate. He or she is not permitted to leave and at that point the regime begins a torturous, systematic program of harassment against the refusenik. They are fired from their place of employment, they are labeled a parasite and traitor to the state, their children and relatives are also subjected to searches and interrogation by Soviet authorities. Many are even charged with treason for merely requesting to emigrate; this charge can be made because in the Soviet criminal code it is an offense against the state to wish to emigrate.

Stella Goldberg is a particularly tragic case of a refusnik. Stella Goldberg with her teenage son has sought to emigrate since 1970. Ms. Goldberg is a musician, a concert pianist, who wishes to join her husband, Viktor Yoran, residing in Israel. Their son, Alexander, is now 14 years old and Mr. Yoran has not seen his son since November of 1968 when the boy was an infant. Ms. Goldberg has repeatedly been denied permission to leave and was removed from her position with the Moscow concert organization. She must support her family on the meager resources she can earn by giving piano lessons; she has forfeited her pension.

Ms. Goldberg and her family are not being allowed to emigrate because of sheer vengeance on the part of the Soviet Government. Mr. Yoran, a concert cellist, defected to the West while he was on a cultural exchange program. His wife, child, and aged mother are being denied emigration to punish Mr. Yoran for what the Soviets see as an impertinence, but the Soviets are themselves violating the Helsinki accords by making an issue of Mr. Yoran's emigration, for at Helsinki the Soviets agreed to the free movement of peoples. Now, the Soviets are violating the article concerning the reunification of families. It is obvious that in the case of the Goldberg-Yoran family the Soviets are simply being vindictive. Such perverse behavior is the mark of a truly corrupt government which delights in the sufferings of its own citizens and can be the only explanation as to why the humanitarian appeals by numerous individuals to the Soviet Government to allow the emigration of Stella Goldberg has fallen on deaf ears. The Goldberg family should be allowed to emigrate and to be reunited with Mr. Yoran.

Stella Goldberg and Viktor Yoran are just two of hundreds of thousands of Soviet Jews who are caught in this limbo, much like a Kafka dream of unreasonable and inhumane, even absurd, dimensions. In the recent year the Soviets have severely restricted emigration by refuseniks; they have cut the number of exit visas by 94 percent. In fact, in the first half of this year only 1,500 Jews have been allowed to leave the Soviet Union; this is in contrast to nearly 25,000 who were allowed to leave in the first half of 1979. I urge our administration to bring this unsatisfactory situation to the attention of the Soviets. We must not let the Soviets forget that they are violating every human rights agreement they have signed in the last 20 years. I add my voice to the chorus of concerned people calling on the Soviets to release Stella Goldberg, her son Alexander, and her mother-in-law Maria Tsirulnikova, and end their forced separation which has already lasted 14 years too long.●

DETROIT BLACK FUND, INC.

HON. JOHN CONYERS, JR.

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, during the 1960's, a deep popular frustration manifested itself in epidemic violence throughout our land. This frustration was made poignantly evident in Detroit during the summer of 1967. There were many responses to this frustration—some exacerbated it and others calmed it. At this time, I think it important to note a milestone in the history of an organization in my city which has done much in the way of easing people's fears of hunger, lack of shelter and a host of other basic human needs: The Detroit Black Fund, Inc.

Formed in 1970 as a response to the social turbulence of the 1960's, the Detroit Black United Fund is an alternative source for grassroots projects which aid the most disadvantaged in our society. Their involvement in such projects as the Concerned Citizens Council, Operation Get Down, the comprehensive youth training and community involvement program and the library development fund of Lewis Business College, to name a few, is often crucial to the existence and success of these much-needed programs.

Once again, a climate of deep frustration exists, fostered by indifference. Tomorrow, the Detroit Black United Fund will dedicate its new building. It is significant not only that the charity has grown large and important enough to build a new headquarters but also that in its growth, it has become more and not less concerned with the needs it initially set out to serve. I hope the administration and Congress take notice.

I applaud the efforts of the Detroit Black United Fund, Inc. and wish its continued success.●

GOP MISLEADS AMERICAN PUBLIC ON SOCIAL SECURITY CAMPAIGN

HON. EDWARD J. MARKEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues an article which appeared in the Boston Herald American on Sunday, July 18, 1982.

The Republican National Committee has purchased a million dollars or more of commercial time on local TV stations around the country in an effort to counteract public rejection of the Reagan attacks on social security. In these spots, the RNC is misleading the American public, and taking credit for something which they originally vehemently opposed. The Reagan administration, as we know, has tried repeatedly to delay COLA's and failed to do so only because of intense Democratic opposition in Congress.

Our outrage over this misleading campaign must not go unnoticed by the American public and I applaud the Boston Herald's effort to accurately inform the American public.

[From the Boston Herald American, July 18, 1982]

SOCIAL SECURITY—GOP SS CLAIMS FALSE

(By Wendell Coltin)

The Republican party's television commercial attempting to credit President Reagan for the 7.4 percent cost-of-living raise mandated in the Social Security law prompts this thought:

Perhaps Jimmy Carter should get the G.O.P.'s 58-city schedule for showing the commercials and add a trailer pointing out the biggest cost-of-living raise paid under the law was the 14.3-percent increase in July 1980. Under the Republican party's thinking, Carter would be deserving of twice as much credit.

Amusing as this attempt to win votes might be, it recalls the year (1972) President Richard Nixon sought to take credit for a 20-percent increase in Social Security benefits Congress voted over his "vigorous opposition." He had printed notices inserted in envelopes containing the fattened SS checks. As a result, the then chairman of the Senate Committee on Aging, Sen. Frank Church (Idaho) introduced a resolution to guard against such a thing happening again.

At a hearing in Newton July 8, Rep. Barney Frank (Mass.), member of the House Select Committee on Aging, recalled the Reagan administration's proposal last year to defer the cost-of-living raise for three months. It was withdrawn because of a strong nationwide protest.

Richard Rowland, executive Director of the Massachusetts Association of Older Americans, said of the TV commercial crediting Reagan for the 7.4 percent increase;

"It is misleading and politics at its worst. After all they did to step on Social Security and now try to claim credit for an automatic pass-through is too much."●

PRESERVE THE THEATER DISTRICT

HON. DONALD J. MITCHELL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. MITCHELL of New York. Mr. Speaker, today I have introduced H.R. 6885, a bill that would encourage preservation of the historic Broadway/Times Square Theater District in New York City by designating the area a national historic site.

The Theater District in the Broadway/Times Square area of New York has long been recognized as the primary site in the development and evolution of the American performing arts and represents an important and significant element in the cultural heritage of this country.

It is in recognition of the area's significance in the development of American theater and in recognition of its important historic associations and architectural characteristics that I am proposing it be designated a national historic site to be restored and maintained for legitimate theater purposes and to provide for the cultural enrichment and continued enjoyment and inspiration of this and future generations of Americans.

Historic sites in this country significant to the cultural fabric of the Nation are being lost or substantially altered with alarming frequency.

In March of this year, I cooperated with the well-known Broadway producer and founder of the New York Shakespeare Festival, Mr. Joseph Papp, and a number of actors and other members of the theater community in their efforts to prevent demolition of two grand, old, historically and architecturally significant Broadway theater houses—the Morosco and the Helen Hayes—by introducing H.R. 5873. Unfortunately, Congress was not able to act on that bill before both theaters were razed to make way for construction of a 50-story hotel.

The Morosco and the Helen Hayes are now irretrievably lost, but it is with the hope of preventing their fate for other important, legitimate theater houses that we have crafted this new bill.

Many have spoken out for preservation of the Theater District, such as WNBC-TV in New York did in an editorial comment aired on May 10, the text of which follows:

THE THEATERS STILL NEED PRESERVING

The judge did what he had to do and all those people who demonstrated a little illegally to try and stop the destruction of the Morosco and Helen Hayes theaters are going to remain free to entertain and sometimes inspire us on TV screens and stages. So ends another chapter in the battle for the theaters. But that's all it is, another chapter. Time is still pressing, and we saw in the last confrontation the power of the real estate interests.

When will the next beautiful old theater be in danger? Why, just as soon as someone has the plans and the money to put up still another towering structure and finds the theater to be in the way. That is what is going to happen unless those who believe that New York's theaters are among its greatest treasures put on the pressure. There are a number of ways to do it. The City Administration could act. The Landmark Commission could certainly do more than it has. These people seem prepared to designate anything down to a subway entrance as a landmark, why not the theater district? Whatever it is, action should be pressed now and continuously. This is a fight which has just begun.

Mr. Speaker, the bill I am introducing today is intended to encourage, through a combination of incentives and disincentives and with minimum Federal involvement, the restoration and preservation of Broadway's Theater District.

It is intended to be compatible with the efforts recently undertaken by the city and the New York Landmarks Commission for protection of the area, and I offer this proposed legislation toward that end.●

U.N. FUNDS TERRORISM

HON. JACK FIELDS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

● Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, in recent years the United Nations General Assembly has increased its support of such Soviet-supported terrorist organizations as the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO), the South West Africa People's Organization (SWAPO), and others. Each year the U.S. taxpayers contribute 25 percent of the total United Nations budget. These funds are included in the State Department budget, and the State Department withdraws the money from the U.S. Treasury and pays these hard-earned taxpayers dollars over to the United Nations General Assembly from time to time.

Soviet-supported terrorism is one of the Kremlins' deceitful strategies. The pattern is a familiar one—the Kremlin provides military advisers, weapons, and financial support to so-called local liberation groups in various parts of the world such as Central America, southern Africa, and the Middle East.

The U.N. General Assembly, which has been described by the Washington Post as an "institutional outrage," a "moral swamp" that "operates much of the time by the mob rule of a Third World majority in close alliance with its Communist bloc," is reported to spend over $100 million a year in supporting these Soviet-sponsored terrorist activities. Indeed, the cutting edge of Soviet expansionism in various parts of the world is Kremlin support of local terrorist organizations who are on Moscow's payroll.

U.N. General Assembly misuse of U.S. tax dollars to support terrorists violates U.S. laws and constitutional provisions intended to protect the U.S. taxpayer from misuse of funds by such organizations as the U.N. General Assembly. Recently I received a letter from the law firm of Shipley, Smoak & Henry which points up the legal questions presented by the United Nations' support of terrorists, and suggests a legislative proposal to protect the taxpayer. In response to their request that I make this known to my colleagues, their letter is as follows:

SHIPLEY SMOAK & HENRY,
Washington, D.C., July 21, 1982.

Hon. Jack Fields,
Member of Congress,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR JACK: Along with other American taxpayers, we are concerned about continued participation by the United States in the United Nations as long as the United Nations General Assembly misuses our hard-earned U.S. tax dollars to subsidize such pro-Soviet terrorist organizations as the South West Africa People's Organization (SWAPO) and the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) who are furthering Soviet-empire expansionism in southern Africa, the Middle East and other parts of the world. We hope you will make these views, which are personal and not necessarily the views of any client, known to your colleagues.

The United States was one of the original signatories to the United Nations Charter, which is a treaty that mandates "all members shall settle their international disputes by peaceful means in such a manner that international peace and security and justice are not endangered." (Ch. 1, Art. 2, Par. 3.) (emph. supp.)

Article VI, Sec. 2 of the Constitution provides in pertinent part, ". . . all treaties made . . . under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land."

Article I, Section 9, Clause 7 of the U.S. Constitution which provides that, "[n]o money shall be drawn from the treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by law."

In 22 U.S. Code ¶ 287e, Congress has provided for the continuing authorization of appropriations. That law provides in pertinent part, that "[t]here is hereby authorized to be appropriated annually to the Department of State . . . such sums as may be necessary for the payment by the United States of its share of the expenses of the United Nations." (emph. supp.)

Money spent by the U.N. to support the activities of self-proclaimed Marxist terrorist groups like SWAPO and PLO violates the U.N. Charter mandate to "settle international disputes by peaceful means," and such expenditures by the State Department are not "in consequence of appropriations made by law." It cannot be said that U.N. funds used to subsidize SWAPO and the PLO are "necessary" within the meaning of 22 U.S. Code ¶287e. Department of State disbursements to the U.N. for such purposes would seem to be illegal.

This year U.S. taxpayers will contribute $500 million to the U.N. budget—25% of the total. Thus 25¢ of each $1.00 the U.N. spends on SWAPO and the PLO and other terrorist organizations comes out of the pocket of U.S. taxpayers.

In light of these facts, would it not be in the U.S. national interest to:

(a) request the General Accounting Office to prepare a report to Congress on U.N. misuse of appropriated U.S. tax dollars to finance SWAPO, the PLO, and other terrorists; and

(b) include in all U.S. Department of State appropriations the following limitation:

"Provided, none of the funds authorized or appropriated hereby shall be disbursed by the Department of State except upon an undertaking by the United Nations General Assembly that none of such funds will be allocated to activities supporting the South West Africa People's Organization (SWAPO), the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO), or other known terrorist organizations."

Every taxpayer and voter in America will appreciate action by Congress in implementing the above suggestions.

Sincerely,

CARL L. SHIPLEY.●

SENATE COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Title IV of the Senate Resolution 4, agreed to by the Senate on February 4, 1977, calls for establishment of a system for a computerized schedule of all meetings and hearings of Senate committees, subcommittees, joint committees, and committees of conference. This title requires all such committees to notify the Office of the Senate Daily Digest—designated by the Rules Committee—of the time, place, and purpose of the meetings, when scheduled, and any cancellations or changes in the meetings as they occur.

As an additional procedure along with the computerization of this information, the Office of the Senate Daily Digest will prepare this information for printing in the Extensions of Remarks section of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on Monday and Wednesday of each week.

Any changes in committee scheduling will be indicated by placement of an asterisk to the left of the name of the unit conducting such meetings.

Meetings scheduled for Thursday, July 29, 1982, may be found in the Daily Digest of today's RECORD.
